The symphony concert of last evening, although excellent in some of its details, must have short shrift. This week, Miss Drasdill, the soloist, sang with good taste, but the voice lacked something of clearness and was often throaty or nasal. The Tannhäuser overture was grandly done, the great violin passage, for once, being clear and strong enough.

The symphony—Beethoven's fourth—was rather drily given in its first movement, and was somewhat hurried in its last.

The next programme offers:

Overture, (Il Seraglio).....Mozart
Concerto for Piano in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin.
Allegro maestoso—Romance. (Larghetto).—
Rondo. (Vivace).—

Mme. Schiller
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms.
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto—
Un poco Allegretto e grazioso—
Adagio Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio,
Più Allegro.—

Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt.
Mme. Schiller.

Menuet of will o' the wisp, } (Faust.) Berlioz,
Dance of sylphs, }
Hungarian March, }

MUSICAL GAZETTE

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was not a particularly interesting one, and the performances were not up to the standard of the preceding concerts of the series. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 4, which was rather heavily interpreted, and was made painful at times by the untunefulness of the wood wind. Miss Anna Drasdill was the soloist. She sang an aria by Mozart and one by Gluck, both which were given in that broad style that is so pleasing a characteristic of her singing. At the next concert Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the soloist, and will play Chopin's concerto in E minor and Liszt's Rhapsody No. 9. The symphony will be Brahms's No. 1, in C minor.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Prelude (Loreley), Bruch; aria ("Il curioso indiscreto"), Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music (Rosamunde), Schubert; aria ("Elena e Paride"), Gluck; overture (Tannhauser), Wagner. The performance was, in general, excellent, although the first and second movements were given in a rather dry style, and the last was played much too fast. There was, however, some excellent work done, especially by the strings, which did finely during the entire evening. The Tannhauser overture was better given than ever before in this city, the violins, especially, fully improving the opportunity and fulfilling the demands that were presented to them. Miss Anna Drasdill was the soloist, and gave the two uninteresting selections that are mentioned above. Both were sung, however, with much taste and intelligence, and in the latter she appeared to excellent advantage in all respects. Next Saturday evening the following programme will be presented, Madame Madeline Schiller being the soloist: Overture (Il Seraglio), Mozart; Concerto for Piano in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, Rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Menuet of Will o' the Wisp, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March, from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eleventh concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was—

Prelude to "Loreley".....Bruch
Aria, "Per pietà non ricercate" from "Il Curioso Indiscreto".....Mozart
Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Ballet-music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Aria, "O del mio dolce ardor" from "Paride e Elena".....Gluck
Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Miss Anna Drasdil was the singer.

Max Bruch's prelude to "Loreley," a gorgeous bit of orchestral color, which we believe was first given here by Mr. Theodore Thomas some years ago, was admirably played by the orchestra. The first two movements of the Beethoven symphony, too, were excellently well given, albeit that the strings, as a rule, showed somewhat too little regard for the due distinction between piano and pianissimo. The scherzo sounded rather heavy and elephantine, and seemed too carelessly played, notably by the wind instruments in the trio. The finale was played with much more security than last year, and whether the tempo was more moderate than then or not, the effect was less scrambling, saving at the place where the bassoons usually come to grief—a time-honored custom, which was religiously observed on this occasion. The playing of the "Tannhäuser" overture surprised us, and not agreeably. The wooden wind played coarsely, the bassoons being terribly prominent in the first part of the pilgrims' chorus, and the whole allegro, although begun with excellent discretion as to tempo, was played as roughly as might be, without regard for any of those elastic modifications of the tempo which are one of the characteristic requirements of Wagner's music. We cannot see the sense of Mr. Henschel's doubling up the tempo all at once at the last return of the pilgrims' motive (on trumpets and trombones). That the tempo at this point must have become twice as fast as before (or nearly so) is evident enough, but we cannot but think that this double rate of speed should be arrived at by gradual gradations. We noticed that the violins paid no attention whatever to the diminuendo marks in their persistent figure which accompanies the chant of the pilgrims. Upon the whole, not a good performance.

Miss Drasdil showed in her singing the one great excellence for which she has been noted—that of infectious warmth of feeling and power of dramatic expression—together with those besetting faults of which no amount of experience seems to have enabled her to rid herself. In the Mozart aria these faults rather overshadowed her one merit, but in the Gluck piece (which, by the way, concert programmes have hitherto lead us to believe was by Stradella) her genuine expressive faculty carried the day, and made it well worth while to endure her almost absolute lack of method.

The next programme is:

Overture to "Die Entführung".....Mozart.
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin.
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms.
Pianoforte solo, rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt.
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, } from "Faust".....Berlioz.
Dance of Sylphs, }
Hungarian March.

Mrs. Madeline Schiller will be the pianist.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eleventh concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra easily falls into the "enjoyment" class, according to the classification which we ventured to make last week. The programme contained no novelties, but every number was wholly interesting in its way and the concert was thoroughly delightful. It would, therefore, be superfluous to speak of the concert with any great detail, and moreover the crowded state of our columns this morning compels us to confine ourselves to general terms. The great work of the evening's list was, of course, Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was given with a combined vigor and delicacy, a clearness and self-consistency, that brought out its every beauty with distinctness. The performance was in striking contrast with that of the same work last year. The beautiful prelude to Bach's "Loreley" opened the concert, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music followed the symphony, both most effectively given; while the ever-welcome "Tannhäuser" overture, which had been chosen for the finale of the concert, was given with a brilliancy surpassing that of any performance of it ever given in this city since the days of the Thomas concerts, unless we except that given at Mr. Peck's concert last spring, under the same conductor, with his orchestra of last season. Nothing could be finer than the vigor and irreproachable clearness with which the exciting violin passage in the second part of the overture was given. Miss Anna Drasdil, who was the soloist, contributed an aria from Mozart and another from Gluck. She sang with fine breadth of style and general beauty of tone, but with a certain appearance of labor that we may readily assume to be due to weakness following recent illness, from which we understand she has been suffering.

The soloist engaged for the next concert is Madame Schiller, and the programme is here appended:

Overture, "Il Seraglio," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; piano solo, rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, dance of sylphs, Hungarian March, "Faust," Berlioz.

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme was performed in Music Hall Saturday evening on the occasion of the eleventh symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra this season: Prelude (Loreley), Bruch; aria ("Il curioso indiscreto"), Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music (Rosamunde), Schubert; aria ("Elena e Paride"), Gluck; overture (Tannhäuser), Wagner. This programme was well performed as a whole, though there were apparent more than the usual number of faults, which were seen and heard last season and not this. Such were the somewhat too mechanical rendering of the first two movements, and the too rapid playing of the last. But the orchestra showed itself to be in splendid training in general, from the manner in which it gave the Tannhäuser overture. This was never better performed in Boston, and received the recognition which it deserved. Miss Anna Drasdil was suffering from a cold, but sang with much taste and discretion the numbers assigned to her. Next Saturday evening the following programme will be presented, Madame Madeline Schiller being the soloist: Overture (Il Seraglio), Mozart; Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, Rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will o' the Wisps, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March, from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. Franklin

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eleventh concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was—
 Prelude to "Loreley".....Bruch
 Aria, "Per pietà non ricercate" from "Il Curioso Indiscreto".....Mozart
 Symphony in E-flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
 Ballet-music from "Rosamunde".....Schubert
 Aria, "O del mio dolce ardor" from "Paride e Elena".....Gluck
 Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
 Miss Anna Drasdil was the singer.

Max Bruch's prelude to "Loreley," a gorgeous bit of orchestral color, which we believe was first given here by Mr. Theodore Thomas some years ago, was admirably played by the orchestra. The first two movements of the Beethoven symphony, too, were excellently well given, albeit that the strings, as a rule, showed somewhat too little regard for the due distinction between piano and pianissimo. The scherzo sounded rather heavy and elephantine, and seemed too carelessly played, notably by the wind instruments in the trio. The finale was played with much more security than last year, and whether the tempo was more moderate than then or not, the effect was less scrambling, saving at the place where the bassoons usually come to grief—a time-honored custom, which was religiously observed on this occasion. The playing of the "Tannhäuser" overture surprised us, and not agreeably. The wooden wind played coarsely, the bassoons being terribly prominent in the first part of the pilgrims' chorus, and the whole allegro, although begun with excellent discretion as to tempo, was played as roughly as might be, without regard for any of those elastic modifications of the tempo which are one of the characteristic requirements of Wagner's music. We cannot see the sense of Mr. Henschel's doubling up the tempo all at once at the last return of the pilgrims' motive (on trumpets and trombones). That the tempo at this point must have become twice as fast as before (or nearly so) is evident enough, but we cannot but think that this double rate of speed should be arrived at by gradual gradations. We noticed that the violins paid no attention whatever to the diminuendo marks in their persistent figure which accompanies the chant of the pilgrims. Upon the whole, not a good performance.

Miss Drasdil showed in her singing the one great excellence for which she has been noted—that of infectious warmth of feeling and power of dramatic expression—together with those besetting faults of which no amount of experience seems to have enabled her to rid herself. In the Mozart aria these faults rather overshadowed her one merit, but in the Gluck piece (which, by the way, concert programmes have hitherto lead us to believe was by Stradella) her genuine expressive faculty carried the day, and made it well worth while to endure her almost absolute lack of method.

The next programme is:

Overture to "Die Entführung".....Mozart.
 Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin.
 Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms.
 Pianoforte solo, rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt.
 Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, } from "Faust".....Berlioz.
 Dance of Sylphs. }
 Hungarian March. }

Mrs. Madeline Schiller will be the pianist.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eleventh concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra easily falls into the "enjoyment" class, according to the classification which we ventured to make last week. The programme contained no novelties, but every number was wholly interesting in its way and the concert was thoroughly delightful. It would, therefore, be superfluous to speak of the concert with any great detail, and moreover the crowded state of our columns this morning compels us to confine ourselves to general terms. The great work of the evening's list was, of course, Beethoven's fourth symphony, which was given with a combined vigor and delicacy, a clearness and self-consistency, that brought out its every beauty with distinctness. The performance was in striking contrast with that of the same work last year. The beautiful prelude to Bach's "Loreley" opened the concert, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music followed the symphony, both most effectively given; while the ever-welcome "Tannhäuser" overture, which had been chosen for the finale of the concert, was given with a brilliancy surpassing that of any performance of it ever given in this city since the days of the Thomas concerts, unless we except that given at Mr. Peck's concert last spring, under the same conductor, with his orchestra of last season. Nothing could be finer than the vigor and irreproachable clearness with which the exciting violin passage in the second part of the overture was given. Miss Anna Drasdil, who was the soloist, contributed an aria from Mozart and another from Gluck. She sang with fine breadth of style and general beauty of tone, but with a certain appearance of labor that we may readily assume to be due to weakness following recent illness, from which we understand she has been suffering.

The soloist engaged for the next concert is Madame Schiller, and the programme is here appended:

Overture, "Il Seraglio," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; piano solo, rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, dance of Sylphs, Hungarian March, "Faust," Berlioz.

ELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme was performed in Music Hall Saturday evening on the occasion of the eleventh symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra this season: Prelude (Loreley), Bruch; aria ("Il curioso indiscreto"), Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music (Rosamunde), Schubert; aria ("Elena e Paride"), Gluck; overture (Tannhäuser), Wagner. This programme was well performed as a whole, though there were apparent more than the usual number of faults, which were seen and heard last season and not this. Such were the somewhat too mechanical rendering of the first two movements, and the too rapid playing of the last. But the orchestra showed itself to be in splendid training in general, from the manner in which it gave the Tannhäuser overture. This was never better performed in Boston, and received the recognition which it deserved. Miss Anna Drasdil was suffering from a cold, but sang with much taste and discretion the numbers assigned to her. Next Saturday evening the following programme will be presented, Madame Madeline Schiller being the soloist: Overture (Il Seraglio), Mozart; Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, Rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will o' the Wisps, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March, from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR. .

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Il Seraglio.) MOZART.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in E minor, op. 11. CHOPIN.
Allegro maestoso.—Romance. (Larghetto).—
Rondo. (Vivace).—

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 1, op. 68. BRAHMS.
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—
Un poco Allegretto e grazioso.—
Adagio; Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio. Più Allegro.—

PIANO SOLO.

RHAPSODY No. 9. LISZT.

MENUET OF WILL O'THE WISPS.

DANCE OF SYLPHES.

HUNGARIAN MARCH.

} (Faust.) BERLIOZ.

SOLOIST:

MME. MADELINE SCHILLER.

Mme. Schiller will use a Chickering Piano.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture, "Il Seraglio," Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Menuet of Will o' the Wisp, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. The attendance was the smallest of the season, at least a third of the seats being unoccupied—a fact doubtless due to the near approach of Christmas, with its demands upon so many of our people, and also, perhaps, to the rather uninteresting character of the programme. The performance was very long, continuing almost exactly two hours, and this, too, without the usual intermission, the second piano selection following directly after the long symphony. The work of the orchestra during the evening was generally very good, although there was throughout considerable discordant effect in the playing of the wooden wind instruments, and the light and delicate Menuet of the Will o' the Wisp was performed with great coarseness and roughness. All its peculiar airy and sprightly quality was lost, and it has never been heard here to poorer effect. The Hungarian march, however, was splendidly given—in fact, almost perfectly, and as well as we have ever heard it played. The opening overture was also well done, and the symphony as well as any body of men could be expected to give it. It is not a work, however, which makes demands upon much more than the technical skill of players, being altogether without charm or discoverable sentiment, and calling chiefly upon that quality of a musician which the Irish fiddler denominated as "main strength." It is powerful in a sense, to be sure, but its power seems physical rather than mental, and it leaves no fixed impression except that it is a very tiresome, rough and unmusical work. Repeated hearings might, as some of its admirers say, give a better opinion of it, but it is to be hoped that they will not be afforded.

Madame Madeline Schiller was the soloist of the evening, and appeared at her best. She always plays with sentiment, and in an easy, if somewhat artificial, style, is sure of herself and her instrument, and carries out her work with precision and brilliancy. If she sometimes seems to lack in power, it is evidently because, being a woman, she has not been endowed with as much physical strength as some of our male pianists. She has, also, a tendency to over-accented telling passages or short phrases, which sometimes detracts from the repose which characterizes most of her work. The long concerto was a hard test of her powers, but in the main she endured it well, and is to be credited, among other merits, with giving a clear and straightforward interpretation of the composition. Many of our pianists seem to consider Chopin altogether a sentimentalist—which he was in part, but not essentially—and lard him over until his music at their hands becomes cloying and mawkishly heavy. Madame Schiller never lacked in delicacy, but gave a more manly character to Chopin in this work than he is often credited with. The composition by Liszt was the better done of the two numbers, however, and its sustained technical difficulties were mastered with complete ease. The next concert will be given next Saturday evening, when the following programme will be performed: Overture scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde, and Firecharm from Die Walkure, Wagner; Symphony in C, Schubert. Mr. Henschel will be the soloist on this occasion.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, last night, was attended by the smallest audience of its present season. The symphony was Brahms's No. 1, a work which does not develop any new beauties upon more intimate acquaintance. It is a dreary, uninspired bit of learning, of which the greater portion is confusing and exasperating cacophony,—doubtless correct enough and scholarly enough, but painfully uninteresting except from a technical point of view. The composer seems to have been moved by no higher or deeper motive than to display his knowledge. There is much effort, but little sentiment, a great deal of brains and no heart whatever in the work, despite its correctness of form and its high reaching pretensions. It was spiritedly but noisily played, and not always with clearness. The wood wind again offended by its untunefulness. It surely cannot be a matter of great difficulty to cause the clarinets, oboes and bassoons to tune to a common pitch. The other orchestral selections were Mozart's overture to "The Seraglio," and the Minuet, Dance of Sylphs, and Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Faust," which were all excellently interpreted. The soloist was Madame Schiller, who played Chopin's Concerto in E-minor, and Liszt's Rhapsody No. 9. In the first Madame Schiller played with her wonted unimpeachable clearness, precision, and high degree of polish, and with a brilliancy that could scarcely be surpassed. The finale was given with a superb dash. The Liszt Rhapsody made severe demands upon the technical powers and the endurance of the artist, but she met them in both qualities with remarkable success, and fairly earned the hearty applause that rewarded her. Madame Schiller was recalled at the end of both her performances with great enthusiasm. At the next concert will be given Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52, and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mr. Henschel is to be the soloist, and will sing Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walkure."

We have heard a plan suggested that seems to us to be a most timely and sensible one, in regard to Mr. Higginson's avowed purpose of affording the people of Boston and vicinity the best possible opportunity to become familiar with orchestral music of a higher standard than is commonly afforded by such concerts as come within the means of the general public to attend, which is, that he can best do so by securing for the purpose the Charitable Mechanics' Hall, on Huntington avenue, for his concerts. A raised platform in the centre of the main floor, it is suggested, would afford a magnificent opportunity for an immense orchestra, and the concerts might be conducted at a profit, even at the lowest price now charged for the symphony concerts. The use of a floor cloth would allow promenading without annoyance, and the spacious gallery would give comfortable sittings to an audience of many thousands, all within hearing distance.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture, "Il Seraglio," Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Menuet of Will o' the Wisp, Dance of Sylphes and Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. The attendance was the smallest of the season, at least a third of the seats being unoccupied—a fact doubtless due to the near approach of Christmas, with its demands upon so many of our people, and also, perhaps, to the rather uninteresting character of the programme. The performance was very long, continuing almost exactly two hours, and this, too, without the usual intermission, the second piano selection following directly after the long symphony. The work of the orchestra during the evening was generally very good, although there was throughout considerable discordant effect in the playing of the wooden wind instruments, and the light and delicate Menuet of the Will o' the Wisp was performed with great coarseness and roughness. All its peculiar airy and sprightly quality was lost, and it has never been heard here to poorer effect. The Hungarian march, however, was splendidly given—in fact, almost perfectly, and as well as we have ever heard it played. The opening overture was also well done, and the symphony as well as any body of men could be expected to give it. It is not a work, however, which makes demands upon much more than the technical skill of players, being altogether without charm or discoverable sentiment, and calling chiefly upon that quality of a musician which the Irish fiddler denominated as "main strength." It is powerful in a sense, to be sure, but its power seems physical rather than mental, and it leaves no fixed impression except that it is a very tiresome, rough and unmusical work. Repeated hearings might, as some of its admirers say, give a better opinion of it, but it is to be hoped that they will not be afforded.

Madame Madeline Schiller was the soloist of the evening, and appeared at her best. She always plays with sentiment, and in an easy, if somewhat artificial, style, is sure of herself and her instrument, and carries out her work with precision and brilliancy. If she sometimes seems to lack in power, it is evidently because, being a woman, she has not been endowed with as much physical strength as some of our male pianists. She has, also, a tendency to over-accented telling passages or short phrases, which sometimes detracts from the repose which characterizes most of her work. The long concerto was a hard test of her powers, but in the main she endured it well, and is to be credited, among other merits, with giving a clear and straightforward interpretation of the composition. Many of our pianists seem to consider Chopin altogether a sentimentalist—which he was in part, but not essentially—and laid him over until his music at their hands becomes cloying and mawkishly heavy. Madame Schiller never lacked in delicacy, but gave a more manly character to Chopin in this work than he is often credited with. The composition by Liszt was the better done of the two numbers, however, and its sustained technical difficulties were mastered with complete ease. The next concert will be given next Saturday evening, when the following programme will be performed: Overture scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde, and Firecharm from Die Walkure, Wagner; Symphony in C, Schubert. Mr. Henschel will be the soloist on this occasion. Journal

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, last night, was attended by the smallest audience of its present season. The symphony was Brahms's No. 1, a work which does not develop any new beauties upon more intimate acquaintance. It is a dreary, uninspired bit of learning, of which the greater portion is confusing and exasperating cacophony,—doubtless correct enough and scholarly enough, but painfully uninteresting except from a technical point of view. The composer seems to have been moved by no higher or deeper motive than to display his knowledge. There is much effort, but little sentiment, a great deal of brains and no heart whatever in the work, despite its correctness of form and its high reaching pretensions. It was spiritedly but noisily played, and not always with clearness. The wood wind again offended by its untunefulness. It surely cannot be a matter of great difficulty to cause the clarinets, oboes and bassoons to tune to a common pitch. The other orchestral selections were Mozart's overture to "The Seraglio," and the Minuet, Dance of Sylphs, and Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Faust," which were all excellently interpreted. The soloist was Madame Schiller, who played Chopin's Concerto in E-minor, and Liszt's Rhapsody No. 9. In the first Madame Schiller played with her wonted unimpeachable clearness, precision, and high degree of polish, and with a brilliancy that could scarcely be surpassed. The finale was given with a superb dash. The Liszt Rhapsody made severe demands upon the technical powers and the endurance of the artist, but she met them in both qualities with remarkable success, and fairly earned the hearty applause that rewarded her. Madame Schiller was recalled at the end of both her performances with great enthusiasm. At the next concert will be given Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52, and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mr. Henschel is to be the soloist, and will sing Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walkure."

We have heard a plan suggested that seems to us to be a most timely and sensible one, in regard to Mr. Higginson's avowed purpose of affording the people of Boston and vicinity the best possible opportunity to become familiar with orchestral music of a higher standard than is commonly afforded by such concerts as come within the means of the general public to attend, which is, that he can best do so by securing for the purpose the Charitable Mechanics' Hall, on Huntington avenue, for his concerts. A raised platform in the centre of the main floor, it is suggested, would afford a magnificent opportunity for an immense orchestra, and the concerts might be conducted at a profit, even at the lowest price now charged for the symphony concerts. The use of a floor cloth would allow promenading without annoyance, and the spacious gallery would give comfortable sittings to an audience of many thousands, all within hearing distance.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twelfth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was—

Overture to "Die Entführung".....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Pianoforte solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt
Minuet of Will o' the Wisp. } from
Dance of Sylphs. } "Faust".....Berlioz
Hungarian March. }

Mrs. Madeline Schiller was the pianist.

The Brahms C minor symphony once more! This work is getting interesting; here we have been for four seasons or more, battering our head against it, and we stand now pretty much as we did in the beginning. We suppose we ought to write something about it now, but a terrible thought bids us pause. We remember to have seen somewhere in Schopenhauer that "when a head and a book carrom together, and a hollow sound is heard, it does not necessarily come from the book." Perhaps this saying applies as well to music as to literature. This symphony and our head have been carroming together for some time, and still we cannot write anything worth reading about it. So we write nothing at all, for it is really too much to ask of a critic to set to work deliberately, and with his eyes open, to prove that his own head is—no, you will admit that that would be more than Christian. For one thing, we can say that the symphony fascinates us; we cannot give it up as a bad job. It is the serpent, and we are the poor little fluttering bird that is spellbound by its glance. We hope to hear the work again and again, for the fight must be fought out until either understanding, or insanity is the result. But at present we can only cry out helplessly, "Symphonie, que me veux-tu?" The sparkling Mozart overture and the Berlioz pieces were truly delightful, and most excellently played.

Mrs. Schiller played the Chopin concerto with more than faultless technique. Such pearly clearness of execution is rare, even nowadays. One might hear many great pianists play, without being enchanted by so evenly beautiful a quality of tone as this lady drew from her Chickering last Saturday evening. But when we try to consider Mrs. Schiller's playing of the concerto as a musicianly rendering of the work, we hardly know what to say. It seemed in the first two movements as if the pianist had found in Chopin's music a source of a certain amount of emotional excitement, and were trying to give to the audience a sort of tone-picture of the personal emotions which the composition had called up in her. The regard she showed for correct phrasing, tempo, rhythm and all the, so to speak, material side of the composition was of the very slightest description. Except in the final rondo, we could see nothing in her performance but a vague and undetermined expression of personal feeling. The Liszt piece, however, she played superbly at all points. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.....Schumann
Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde and Firecharm, from "Die Walküre".....Wagner
Symphony in C.....Schubert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twelfth Programme of the Second Season.

The twelfth programme of the second season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mme. Madeline Schiller being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Il Seraglio".....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt
Minuet of Will o' the Wisp. } from
Dance of the Sylphs. } "Faust".....Berlioz
Hungarian March. }

It was rare pleasure to hear such an artist as Mme. Schiller with surroundings so well in harmony with her great abilities, and the recognition of her merits as a pianist was extremely gratifying to all who appreciate her thorough devotion to her art. In the concerto, the pianoforte score was given an interpretation full of intelligence and beauty, the phrasing throughout being almost faultless and the perfection of the pianist's method showing itself in every measure of the work. Mme. Schiller's playing has, judged by this effort, a breadth and character which it has never before shown, and the purity of her tones, the clearness and brilliancy of her touch and her wonderful technical abilities are as notable as ever. In the Liszt number, Mme. Schiller's playing was even more pleasing and spontaneous, and generous applause which recalled her after each of her appearances was fully merited by her triumphs during the evening. Repeated hearings of the symphony of the evening, the Brahms in C minor, fail to give an appreciation of its merits, save in the final movement, and the conviction is forced upon the listener that this was written first, in a fit of melodious inspiration, and the balance of the work added, from a sense of duty, and to complete its proportions. There is an iteration and reiteration of mere fragmentary ideas in all the other portions of the work, which makes it simply tiresome, and the opening movement is oddly suggestive of the Lord Chancellor's song, in "Iolanthe," descriptive of the effects of "Lying awake with a dismal headache." The orchestra did wonderfully good work in all this tiresome waste of endless harmony, and the audience appeared to appreciate its merits so far as they were apparent. The interpretation given the Berlioz selections from "La Damnation de Faust" would have delighted the composer, as all the distinct character so notable in all his writings was brought out with grand distinctiveness, the great Hungarian march being given with much the same vigor as when first played here under Mr. Lang's baton. The Mozart overture was one of the most enjoyable numbers of the evening.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Henschel is evidently determined to educate Boston up to Brahms. The name of that composer has enjoyed a very marked prominence among those of his contemporaries on the Symphony concert programmes of both seasons. We are not disposed to find fault with this partiality for a composer whose genius has won for him so honorable a place in the estimation of the highest critical authorities, particularly as much of his writing is so puzzling to the average amateur that, more than any other writer of the day, his works require frequent and repeated hearings to be generally comprehended. It is certainly a valuable educational privilege occasionally to hear music that so challenges study, is in many respects unique, and may possibly be thoroughly approved by the more highly developed taste of that future for which it is now the fashion to write. Therefore it must have been with considerable more than ordinary interest that many who heard Brahms's C minor symphony (No. 1, op. 68) last season braced themselves to the task of hearing it a second time at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. It must be said that the work is much more intelligible on a second hearing. We get a clearer idea of what the composer is driving at, so to speak, and his methods more generally justify themselves to the musical sense; but as to the final result achieved we are not disposed greatly to modify what was said of the symphony in this column last year. The work as a whole seems labored and pedantic, and its elaboration often quite out of proportion to the worth of the musical ideas which are supposed to form its basis. Of genuine inspiration there is little, unless the term may be applied to the exceptional power of so torturing the gamut as to smother every trace of tonality while preserving the outward semblance of musical form. Although the construction of the work is annoyingly involved, close attention will discover a substantial coherency in each of the three movements. But what we have said of the work as a whole, must be materially modified with respect to certain portions of it, notably the last movement, which has much symmetry, after the modern standard, is full of beautiful ideas, and develops to a very high pitch of grandeur. Here the giant hand of the composer is seen almost constantly. Here for the first time he condescends to indulge his hearer with pure, beautiful and boldly pronounced melody which he "works up" into the rest of his scheme with sublime effect. The splendid use of iteration and variation, and the masterly orchestration give the movement a power akin to some of the finales of classic symphonies. It must be presumed, with Mr. Henschel's leaning towards the music of Brahms and his exceptional advantages for studying it, that his efficient orchestra performed the symphony for all it is worth.

The other purely orchestral numbers of the programme were Mozart's "Il Seraglio," overture, very neatly played, and the minuet Dance of Sylphs, and Hungarian march from the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust." The minuet was given rather coarsely, but the other two selections were played most brilliantly. Madame Madeline Schiller, the pianist, furnished the solo part of the concert, Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's ninth "rhapsody." In both selections she was heard at her very best. Her technical ability was very brilliantly displayed in each instance. The Liszt "rhapsody" was given not only with the utmost accuracy and clearness throughout its most difficult passages, but with almost masculine vigor and freedom. As for the lovely concerto, one must be hard to suit if he could ask for a more delightful interpretation of it. Beneath Madame Schiller's firm but delicate touch, not one of its exquisite beauties was lost or dimmed. Each of the lady's efforts was honored with storms of applause. The audience on Saturday evening was the smallest of the season, and the concert was the longest, lasting until five minutes of ten o'clock.

At the next concert Mr. Henschel will be his own soloist, and this is the programme:—

Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; Wotan's "Farewell to Brünnhilde" and "Firecharm," "Die Walküre," Wagner; symphony in C, Schubert.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. — The smallest audience of the present season assembled in Music Hall on Saturday evening in attendance upon the twelfth symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra. The small audience was doubtless due in great part to the proximity of Christmas, though it may well be conjectured that many remained away, repelled by the uninteresting appearance of the programme. This latter was as follows: Overture, "Il Seraglio," Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisp, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. To those who remained away from the performance of this programme a word of consolation may be given in the statement that they would probably not have enjoyed it had they been present. With here and there a pleasant interval the orchestra did not appear at its best throughout the long evening. During most of the time there was a positive disagreement between the wood and brasses, while at times he strings scraped harshly, even coarsely on the tympanum of the ear. This was particularly noticeable in the beautiful "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisp," which completely lost its airy and delicate quality in the roughness of the performance. The overture was fairly well done, and the symphony was, it may be presumed, well enough rendered. But the inherent trouble was the selection of such a work as the latter. There appears to be but little for the musician or the music appreciator to seize upon in the way of sentiment or feeling of any kind. Instead, there is a dreary waiting for the technical skill and force of the players to be exhausted. How can any one possess an interest in such a performance, unless indeed he be a violinist or horn blower himself. Let us hope for more interesting selections from Mr. Henschel, hereafter. Madame Schiller, the soloist for the occasion, interpreted Chopin's and Liszt's music with much skill and beauty of expression, and with the Hungarian March, which was splendidly performed by the orchestra, shows out as the bright particular spots of a dull evening. At the next concert, Saturday evening, December 30, Mr. Henschel himself will be the soloist, and the following programme will be given: Overture scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde, and Firecharm from Die Walküre, Wagner; Symphony in C, Schubert.

Facts and Fancies on Page Three.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twelfth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was—

Overture to "Die Entführung".....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Pianoforte solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps. { from
Dance of Sylphs. { "Faust".....Berlioz
Hungarian March. {

Mrs. Madeline Schiller was the pianist.

The Brahms C minor symphony once more! This work is getting interesting; here we have been for four seasons or more, battering our head against it, and we stand now pretty much as we did in the beginning. We suppose we ought to write something about it now, but a terrible thought bids us pause. We remember to have seen somewhere in Schopenhauer that "when a head and a book carrom together, and a hollow sound is heard, it does not necessarily come from the book." Perhaps this saying applies as well to music as to literature. This symphony and our head have been carroming together for some time, and still we cannot write anything worth reading about it. So we write nothing at all, for it is really too much to ask of a critic to set to work deliberately, and with his eyes open, to prove that his own head is—no, you will admit that that would be more than Christian. For one thing, we can say that the symphony fascinates us; we cannot give it up as a bad job. It is the serpent, and we are the poor little fluttering bird that is spellbound by its glance. We hope to hear the work again and again, for the fight must be fought out until either understanding, or insanity is the result. But at present we can only cry out helplessly, "Symphonie, que me veux-tu?" The sparkling Mozart overture and the Berlioz pieces were truly delightful, and most excellently played.

Mrs. Schiller played the Chopin concerto with more than faultless technique. Such pearly clearness of execution is rare, even nowadays. One might hear many great pianists play, without being enchanted by so evenly beautiful a quality of tone as this lady drew from her Chickering last Saturday evening. But when we try to consider Mrs. Schiller's playing of the concerto as a musicianly rendering of the work, we hardly know what to say. It seemed in the first two movements as if the pianist had found in Chopin's music a source of a certain amount of emotional excitement, and were trying to give to the audience a sort of tone-picture of the personal emotions which the composition had called up in her. The regard she showed for correct phrasing, tempo, rhythm and all the, so to speak, material side of the composition was of the very slightest description. Except in the final rondo, we could see nothing in her performance but a vague and undetermined expression of personal feeling. The Liszt piece, however, she played superbly at all points. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.....Schumann
Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde and Firecharm, from "Die Walküre".....Wagner
Symphony in C.....Schubert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twelfth Programme of the Second Season.

The twelfth programme of the second season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mme. Madeline Schiller being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Il Seraglio".....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt
Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps. { from
"Dance of the Sylphs," { "Faust".....Berlioz
Hungarian March. {

It was rare pleasure to hear such an artist as Mme. Schiller with surroundings so well in harmony with her great abilities, and the recognition of her merits as a pianist was extremely gratifying to all who appreciate her thorough devotion to her art. In the concerto, the pianoforte score was given an interpretation full of intelligence and beauty, the phrasing throughout being almost faultless and the perfection of the pianist's method showing itself in every measure of the work. Mme. Schiller's playing has, judged by this effort, a breadth and character which it has never before shown, and the purity of her tones, the clearness and brilliancy of her touch and her wonderful technical abilities are as notable as ever. In the Liszt number, Mme. Schiller's playing was even more pleasing and spontaneous, and generous applause which recalled her after each of her appearances was fully merited by her triumphs during the evening. Repeated hearings of the symphony of the evening, the Brahms in C minor, fail to give an appreciation of its merits, save in the final movement, and the conviction is forced upon the listener that this was written first, in a fit of melodious inspiration, and the balance of the work added, from a sense of duty, and to complete its proportions. There is an iteration and reiteration of more fragmentary ideas in all the other portions of the work, which makes it simply tiresome, and the opening movement is oddly suggestive of the Lord Chancellor's song, in "Iolanthe," descriptive of the effects of "Lying awake with a dismal headache." The orchestra did wonderfully good work in all this tiresome waste of endless harmony, and the audience appeared to appreciate its merits so far as they were apparent. The interpretation given the Berlioz selections from "La Damnation de Faust" would have delighted the composer, as all the distinct character so notable in all his writings was brought out with grand distinctiveness, the great Hungarian march being given with much the same vigor as when first played here under Mr. Lang's baton. The Mozart overture was one of the most enjoyable numbers of the evening.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Henschel is evidently determined to educate Boston up to Brahms. The name of that composer has enjoyed a very marked prominence among those of his contemporaries on the Symphony concert programmes of both seasons. We are not disposed to find fault with this partiality for a composer whose genius has won for him so honorable a place in the estimation of the highest critical authorities, particularly as much of his writing is so puzzling to the average amateur that, more than any other writer of the day, his works require frequent and repeated hearings to be generally comprehended. It is certainly a valuable educational privilege occasionally to hear music that so challenges study, is in many respects unique, and may possibly be thoroughly approved by the more highly developed taste of that future for which it is now the fashion to write. Therefore it must have been with considerable more than ordinary interest that many who heard Brahms's C minor symphony (No. 1, op. 68) last season braced themselves to the task of hearing it a second time at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. It must be said that the work is much more intelligible on a second hearing. We get a clearer idea of what the composer is driving at, so to speak, and his methods more generally justify themselves to the musical sense; but as to the final result achieved we are not disposed greatly to modify what was said of the symphony in this column last year. The work as a whole seems labored and pedantic, and its elaboration often quite out of proportion to the worth of the musical ideas which are supposed to form its basis. Of genuine inspiration there is little, unless the term may be applied to the exceptional power of so torturing the gamut as to smother every trace of tonality while preserving the outward semblance of musical form. Although the construction of the work is annoyingly involved, close attention will discover a substantial coherency in each of the three movements. But what we have said of the work as a whole, must be materially modified with respect to certain portions of it, notably the last movement, which has much symmetry, after the modern standard, is full of beautiful ideas, and develops to a very high pitch of grandeur. Here the giant hand of the composer is seen almost constantly. Here for the first time he condescends to indulge his hearer with pure, beautiful and boldly pronounced melody which he "works up" into the rest of his scheme with sublime effect. The splendid use of iteration and variation, and the masterly orchestration give the movement a power akin to some of the finales of classic symphonies. It must be presumed, with Mr. Henschel's leaning towards the music of Brahms and his exceptional advantages for studying it, that his efficient orchestra performed the symphony for all it is worth.

The other purely orchestral numbers of the programme were Mozart's "Il Seraglio," overture, very neatly played, and the minuet Dance of Sylphs, and Hungarian march from the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust." The minuet was given rather coarsely, but the other two selections were played most brilliantly. Madame Madeline Schiller, the pianist, furnished the solo part of the concert, Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's ninth "rhapsody." In both selections she was heard at her very best. Her technical ability was very brilliantly displayed in each instance. The Liszt "rhapsody" was given not only with the utmost accuracy and clearness throughout its most difficult passages, but with almost masculine vigor and freedom. As for the lovely concerto, one must be hard to suit if he could ask for a more delightful interpretation of it. Beneath Madame Schiller's firm but delicate touch, not one of its exquisite beauties was lost or dimmed. Each of the lady's efforts was honored with storms of applause. The audience on Saturday evening was the smallest of the season, and the concert was the longest, lasting until five minutes of ten o'clock.

At the next concert Mr. Henschel will be his own soloist, and this is the programme:—

Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; Wotan's "Farewell to Brünnhilde" and "Firecharm," "Die Walküre," Wagner; symphony in C, Schubert.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. — The smallest audience of the present season assembled in Music Hall on Saturday evening in attendance upon the twelfth symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra. The small audience was doubtless due in great part to the proximity of Christmas, though it may well be conjectured that many remained away, repelled by the uninteresting appearance of the programme. This latter was as follows: Overture, "Il Seraglio," Mozart; Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. To those who remained away from the performance of this programme a word of consolation may be given in the statement that they would probably not have enjoyed it had they been present. With here and there a pleasant interval the orchestra did not appear at its best throughout the long evening. During most of the time there was a positive disagreement between the wood and brasses, while at times the strings scraped harshly, even coarsely on the tympanum of the ear. This was particularly noticeable in the beautiful "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisp," which completely lost its airy and delicate quality in the roughness of the performance. The overture was fairly well done, and the symphony was, it may be presumed, well enough rendered. But the inherent trouble was the selection of such a work as the latter. There appears to be but little for the musician or the music appreciator to seize upon in the way of sentiment or feeling of any kind. Instead, there is a dreary waiting for the technical skill and force of the players to be exhausted. How can any one possess an interest in such a performance, unless indeed he be a violinist or horn blower himself. Let us hope for more interesting selections from Mr. Henschel, hereafter. Madame Schiller, the soloist for the occasion, interpreted Chopin's and Liszt's music with much skill and beauty of expression, and with the Hungarian March, which was splendidly performed by the orchestra, shows out as the bright particular spots of a dull evening. At the next concert, Saturday evening, December 30, Mr. Henschel himself will be the soloist, and the following programme will be given: Overture scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde, and Firecharm from Die Walküre, Wagner; Symphony in C, Schubert.

136 THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, (Il Seraglio.)Mozart
 Concerto for Pianoforte, in E minor, op. 11,Chopin.
 Allegro maestoso—Romance. (Larghetto).—
 Rondo. (Vivace).—
 Mme. Schiller
 Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68,Brahms.
 Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto—
 Un poco Allegretto e grazioso—
 Adagio Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio,
 Più Allegro.—
 Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9,Liszt.
 Mme. Madeleine Schiller.
 Menuet of will o' the wisps, } (Faust.) Berlioz.
 Dance of sylphes, }
 Hungarian March, }

The evidences of Christmas were at yesterday's concert in the shape of many empty seats, but those who attended were repaid by a programme of especial excellence, although longer, by almost half an hour, than the previous ones have been.

The Mozart Overture went excellently in its first part, but in the slow passages the flute and clarinet fell a trifle behind the beat. In the concerto Mme. Schiller displayed wonderful technique, but scarcely the delicacy and sweetness which one desires in a Chopin selection. Her performance was admirably clear, and free from the mawkishness with which Chopin is too often invested by his interpreters, but in the embellishments of the first movement there could have been much less emphasis employed. The second movement was, with the exception of some forcible left hand accents in the second section, much more refinedly given, and its final diminuendo was very artistically executed. In the last movement the strong rhythm of the themes called for more accent than in the other two, and Madame Schiller was most successful in it. In the Liszt number the pianist absolutely electrified the audience by the great bravura which she displayed throughout the work. The runs which precede the final movement were clearly and beautifully given, and throughout the entire first portion the theme was brought out in its various guises (and disguises) in a manner that must have made it intelligible to every auditor. It is a double pleasure to hear a symphony of Brahms conducted by Mr. Henschel. In the first place, it is given con amore, for the leader seems to love this school; and secondly, it is given as from "one having authority," since the conductor has studied the tempi of Brahms' works with more than usual care, and has been honored with the personal friendship and suggestions of the composer. There is a great difference in the musical value of the different movements. The first seems the most labored and the least spontaneous. The third is the most intelligible, the second the most beautiful, and the last the grandest. The majesty and power of this final movement decidedly dwarfs the effect of the other three. In the performance of last night the first movement was somewhat marred by the great prominence of the double basses, which also obliterated some of the color of the bassoons in the very deepest register. The oboe work in the second movement calls for praise, as also that of the clarinet.

Their melodies against staccato accompaniment showed Brahms in his simplest yet not least effective vein. The finale with its constant references to subjects in the previous movements, its wonderfully effective development, and great use of trombones was broadly given. The effect of the horns and trombones in noble awe-inspiring harmony is similar to what Wagner attempts in portions of the Parsifal Prelude. But there are no efforts made to attach a set significance to the various portions of the movement, although it could tell a story as strongly as any Wagnerian work, filled with catalogued motives. But Brahms allows his work to stand on the basis of pure music, and its right to be so judged is proved by its continuity, its well-chosen themes, and their superb treatment. The last movement won much applause, but it was evident that the work still puzzled many and must be repeatedly heard before it finds its way into popular favor. The Berlioz numbers were grandly played, save the first, which was not given with that delicacy which Thomas used to invest it with. The march was never better done. The next programme offers:

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, E. op. 52,Schumann
 Andante con moto; Allegro—Scherzo (Vivo)—Allegro molto vivace vivace—
 Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde and
 Firecharm. (Die Walküre.)Wagner
 Mr. Henschel.
 SYMPHONY in C,SCHUBERT
 Andante; Allegro ma non troppo. Più moto—
 Andante con moto—Scherzo (Allegro vivace)—
 Finale. (Allegro vivace)—

Saturday's Symphony Concert.

The smallest audience of the season greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall Saturday evening. That does not by any means imply that the audience was small; but the hall did not have that over-crowded appearance which it usually wears on these occasions. Mozart, Chopin, Brahms, Berlioz and Liszt—the man who could not find variety enough in the works of these masters must be hard indeed to please. As a consequence the programme of Saturday evening was evidently duly appreciated. Mozart's "Il Seraglio" overture began the concert. It was a welcome, though not very familiar guest in the concert room. Chopin's E minor pianoforte concerto, as interpreted by Madeline Schiller, awoke the greatest enthusiasm of the evening. And seldom indeed have the delicate, romantic passages of this fine work received in this city, at least, a more sympathetic and appreciative rendering.

It cannot be denied, however, that this lady is unequal to the task of making the piano theme stand out with sufficient distinctness when the orchestra accompaniment is loud. She has, it is true, a firm, effective touch for a woman's hand, but her playing can be much better appreciated in a solo than in a concerto. The "romance" of the concerto was splendidly given and received its merited recognition from the audience. Later in the evening when Mme. Schiller played Liszt's ninth rhapsody her great success secured for her a very flattering encore. The symphony was Brahms' first. It was played with much scratchiness whenever the strings had any energetic work to do, but aside from this, which is indeed a serious drawback when too frequently displayed, as was the case last evening, the work was very well done. Berlioz' odd minuet of "Will o' the Wisp" and other selections from the "Damnation of Faust" brought the concert to a close. The programme for next week is as follows: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, Schumann; "Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde and Firecharm" (Die Walküre), Wagner; Symphony in C, Schubert. Soloist, Mr. Henschel.

137 WILHELM MUELLER.

Wilhelm Mueller, solo violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Braunschweig, Germany, when his father, Karl Mueller, a musician of good reputation, was conductor of the opera orchestra of His Royal Highness the Duke of Braunschweig. Young Mueller early began to develop the musical taste that was to shape his future career, and commenced the study of music while very young. At the age of fourteen he entered the opera orchestra of the Duke of Braunschweig as violoncellist. Mueller commenced his musical career in company with his brothers as court-quartette at Meiningen. This quartette traveled through Germany, France, Holland, Denmark, Italy, &c., everywhere attaining the greatest success.

From 1869 to 1879 he was royal concert master at the Imperial Opera at Berlin, and at the same time professor at the Royal High School of music at Berlin. During this time the celebrated violinist, Joachim, persuaded Wm. Mueller to join him in organizing a string quartette, by which they achieved universal reputation.

He received many titles and marks of distinction from the courts of Europe, among which may be noted the order of the Saxon Ernestine House, bestowed upon him by His Majesty the Emperor of Germany and His Royal Highness the Duke of Saxony, and he enjoys the distinction of being solo violoncello to His Majesty the Emperor of Germany.

He arrived in New York in the year 1880, where he became a member of the Philharmonic Society, and leading violoncellist of Thomas' and Dr. Damrosch's orchestras. He has now severed his connections with New York and has decided to remain in this city permanently, where he is engaged as first and solo violoncellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and has organized a string quartette, composed of Signor Leandro Campanari, as first violin; Mr. Julius Akeroyd, as second violin; Mr. Daniel Kuntz, as viola, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, as violoncello. The success of Chamber Music Concerts in Berlin, Vienna and Leipzig, which are patronized by the nobility of Europe, has led to the belief that Chamber Music Concerts would also be well patronized and successful in this country. Herr Mueller will undoubtedly be a valuable addition to our small force of good violoncellists.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, op. 52. SCHUMANN.

Andante con moto; Allegro.—Scherzo. (Vivo.)—Allegro molto vivace.—

WOTAN'S FAREWELL TO BRÜNNHILDE AND

FIRECHARM. (Die Walküre.) WAGNER.

SYMPHONY in C. SCHUBERT.

Andante; Allegro ma non troppo. Più moto.—

Andante con moto.—Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—

Finale. (Allegro vivace).—

SOLOIST :

MR. HENSCHEL.

WOTAN'S FAREWELL.

WAGNER.

(SCENE—The top of a rocky height. In the fight between SIEGMUND and HUNDING, BRÜNNHILDE, contrary to WOTAN's orders had tried to give SIEGMUND the victory, but WOTAN prevented this by breaking SIEGMUND's sword in two with his spear. SIEGMUND fell. WOTAN, to punish BRÜNNHILDE for her disobedience, determines to banish her from the troop of Walkyries, and, in great anger, announces to her this decision.)

Farewell, thou cherished, loveliest child!
Thou once the life
and light of my heart,
Farewell! Farewell! Farewell!
Loth I must leave thee;
no more in love
may I grant thee my greeting;
henceforth my maid
ne'er more with me rideth nor waiteth wine to reach me.
When I relinquish thee, my beloved one;
thou laughing delight of mine eyes:—
thy bed shall be lit
by torches more brilliant than ever for bridal have burned.
Fiery gleams shall girdle the fell, with terrible scorchings
scaring the timid,
who, cowed, may cross not Brünnhilde's couch.
To one alone falleth the bride,
one freer than I, a god!

These eyes so lustrous and clear, which oft in love I have kissed, when warlike longings won my lauding, or when with lipings of heroes leal thy honied lips were inspired:— these effulgent, glorious eyes, whose flash my gloom oft dispelled,
when hopeless cravings
my heart discouraged, or when my wishes
toward wordly pleasure from wild warfare were turning:
their lustrous gaze lights on me now,
as my lips imprint
this last farewell!
On blissfullest mortal beam they anon:
the grief suffering god shall never henceforth behold them.
Now, heart-torn,
he gives thee his kiss and taketh thy godhood away.

Loki, hear!
listen and heed!
as I found thee at first in fiery shape,
as thou fleddest me headlong in hovering glimmer, as I then bound
bind I thee now!
Appear, wavering spirit!
and spread me thy flame round this fell.
Loki! Loki! appear!

(He strikes thrice with his spear on a rock, from which a stream of fire issues swelling to a flood of fire, which WOTAN directs to surround the rocky cliffs completely.)

He who my spear in spirit feareth
ne'er springs thro' this fiery bar.

(He turns slowly away, looking back mournfully at the form of BRÜNNHILDE.)

Translated by F. CORDER.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Three selections, from Schumann, Wagner and Schubert respectively, comprised the programme of Saturday evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but the performance, nevertheless, fully consumed the usual time allotted for these concerts. It would not be much out of the way to say that two symphonies were given on this occasion, for the Schumann work, with which the concert opened (op. 52), although designated by the composer as an "overture, scherzo and finale," would easily pass for a little symphony with the great mass of music lovers, who care little whether the traditional symphonic form is retained so long as the symphonic spirit is preserved. What the Schumann work lacked in length was fully compensated for by Schubert's crowning work in C major, which was given without abridgement, its performance completely occupying the last hour of the concert. Then again, the Wagner selection—Wotan's farewell to Brünnhilde and the "Fire-charm" from "Die Walküre"—was in a sense a double number, however inseparable its vocal and orchestral parts. But in spite of the narrow limits of the programme the performance of it proved to be by no means monotonous. It would not be easy to select three composers whose works, when heard in alternation, present more agreeable contrasts of material and style than the three named, or to select three works more typically representative of their respective authors than these.

The charming Schumann work was performed almost faultlessly. The tempi were judiciously taken and firmly held, and the work of the orchestra was delightfully clear, delicate and expressive. In the Wagner number Mr. Henschel was the soloist, yielding his baton for the time to the experienced hand of Mr. Listemann. Mr. Henschel sang in his own broad and noble style, the somewhat untamed timbre of his voice rather adding to its effectiveness than otherwise, when uttering the lines of Wagner's semi-barbaric hero. At times, however, in the midst of some of the more massive orchestral passages, his voice had less than usual of that penetrating power which we are accustomed to expect from it in such a situation, and failed to maintain its proper place in the ensemble. The orchestral work in this selection was admirable, but in the "Fire-charm" scene, the magic circle of flame did not leap and sparkle with the brilliancy which Mr. Thomas's orchestra used to impart to it. As for the Schubert symphony, it must be confessed that the length of the work did not appear as "heavenly" as usual on this occasion. There was a lamentable lack of finish and delicacy about much of the performance, and it went on at times in such a happy-go-lucky way that one was tempted to think that the conductor's thoughts were wandering away from his work. The passages for the wind instruments in particular, which are of such very high importance in Schubert's works, were often very inadequately given, being not sufficiently clear or pronounced, and consequently obscured by the strings. If there were any one present who had never before heard the symphony he must have got a very imperfect idea of its glories. Portions of the work, it may be admitted, were given very beautifully, notably the opening movement, which was performed with a noble dignity, a clearness and nice sense of proportion that made it highly effective. The audience at this concert was one of the largest of the season.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, E. op. 52.....Schumann
Andante con moto; Allegro—Scherzo (Vivo)—Allegro molto vivace—
Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde and
Fire-charm. (Die Walküre.).....Wagner
Mr. Henschel.
Symphony in C.....Schubert.
Andante; Allegro ma non troppo. Più moto—
Andante con moto—Scherzo (Allegro vivace)—
Finale. (Allegro vivace)—

The programme looks short enough on paper, but when one devotedly follows the repeat marks of the Symphony that work becomes long enough for a concert in itself. It has become fashionable to speak of Schubert's "heavenly length," but still the fact remains that he used repetition to excess, and his works would be the gainers by a judicious avoidance of some of the repeats. A similar reform has been made in the performance of some of Handel's longer oratorios, and with less reason, for the omission of the reprise in Handelian arias destroys the symmetry, and kills an important contrast. With Schubert no such violation would occur.

The tempo of the last movement of the symphony was somewhat too rapid, and the thrilling effect of the titanic unison accents of the full orchestra was weakened by their rapidity.

The violin running figures in the first part, and their quaint rhythmic figures in the second part of this movement, were clear, crisp and effective.

In the second movement the oboe work was not as good as usual, and somewhat weakened the effect of the andante. The first movement was well rendered, although the bright rustic themes might have gained somewhat by a more elastic tempo.

The Schumann work with which the concert opened was splendidly done. The responses between the woodwind and strings was well shaded and given with great steadiness. The last movement in the work was wisely taken in a moderate tempo (it is often given too fast), and the nobility and breadth of its finale gained by this treatment.

In the Wagner aria Mr. Listemann took the baton, and was greeted with much applause as he came forward. He kept the orchestra well in hand through the intricacies of the work, and much of the success which attended the numbers was due to him.

Mr. Henschel was not as evenly great as he has been in his Wagnerian selection of last season—Pogner's Address. Often the voice was crushed beneath the heavy orchestration, an event which seldom occurred in the broader rendering which Remmert has often given here. Mr. Henschel was, however, at his very best in the finale. The excellent manner in which the orchestra portrayed the flicker of the flames and the impressive character of the entire interlude, (the chromatic runs in deepest register of wood-wind were excellent,) seemed to inspire the vocalist to loftier exertions and from the invocation to Loki, and especially from the sweeter theme, which is heard already in the orchestra during the first portion of this number—Wes memes speeres spitze fürchtet—the broad and noble delivery of tone could scarcely have been improved upon.

The next concert introduces Mr. Lang as soloist, and gives the following programme:

Overture. (Hebrides.).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45.....Rubinstein.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven.
Polacca Brillante for Pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt.
Overture, (Le Carnaval Romain.).....Berlioz.

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sketch
Schubert's Great Symphony in C, an Extract from "Die Walküre" and a Schumann Overture.

The concert last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra owed its chief attraction to the fact that it was almost wholly devoted to the production of Schubert's symphony in C, that truly colossal work which formed the climax of the composer's achievements in this department.

The symphony has always been numbered nine, but such strong reasons have been shown for believing that Schubert wrote a previous one which has not yet been discovered, that it may be doubted whether it is not more properly number ten. The symphony in C was composed or commenced in March, 1828, and Schubert died in the following November.

A gap of nearly three years separated it from its predecessor, which appears to have been written at Gastein in the end of August, 1825, though, owing to some strange chance, the score has for a time vanished, and we do not even know the key of the work. It was, however, dedicated to the Musical Society of Vienna in September, 1826, in a letter still existing in the society's archives, and is mentioned in their minutes, and some day it will no doubt be discovered and played.

The symphony in C major is indeed the culminating work of Schubert's life. It may not have the peculiar tone of tender melancholy that marks the two movements in B minor (No. 8) and the Entr'actes in Rosamunde, but there is about it a force and majesty, a wealth of invention and a variety of treatment, a command over the resources of the orchestra and a tremendous energy, which make it one of the most astonishing productions in the whole range of music. No doubt to its general acceptance, but it is a drawback which disappears after a moderate acquaintance. Extension, or repetition, was a quality of Schubert's artistic nature as much as compression was of Mozart's. When he has invented a fine passage he never seems happy till he has had it all over again, and made all his friends share in his good fortune. But to be long is not always to be tedious; and a piece of music, like a poem, may be long because it contains a great number of fine themes treated with infinite variety and ever-fresh charm.

Its Length is a Certain Drawback

Shortly after the completion of this work, Schubert presented the MS. score to the Musik-verein of Vienna, a society for the encouragement of music, with which he had relations, and in whose library it still remains. By them it was tried; but its difficulties, in the then state of musical execution, were found so great that, after a few rehearsals, it was laid aside, apparently at the advice of the composer himself, and so remained till the visit of Robert Schumann to Vienna in 1838. He carried it off to Leipzig. Mendelssohn was at that time conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts, and to him Schumann communicated his discovery. The result was its performance and enthusiastic reception in Leipzig on the 22d March, 1839, and its publication (in January, 1850) by Messrs. Breitkopf and Hartel.

The Original Manuscript

of the symphony is now in the library of the Musik-verein in Vienna. The volume consists of 218 pages of oblong quarto. The handwriting, like Schubert's usual autograph, is perfectly neat and distinct, except where it has been altered by himself. The alterations are confined almost entirely to the first three movements, but in these they abound. The fact of their existence at all is remarkable, because in general Schubert did not make alterations. His scores are usually very free from them. He appears to have written under the influence of a kind of immediate inspiration, without rough sketches or any of the other preparatory processes to which other great musicians commonly resorted, and when once written he seems, as a rule, not to have returned to his work. Indeed the rapidity with which his compositions succeeded one another was enough to render this impossible. In the opera of "Fierrabras," the first act, consisting of 304 large pages, fully scored, was written in six days, between the 25th and 31st of May, 1823; the second act, 300 pages, in five days, between the 31st of May and the 5th of June. The last movement of one of his quartets, by no means restricted in length, was

Dashed Off in the Dead of Night

In three hours and a half, as is carefully marked by Schubert himself. And as each of these compositions was no sooner completed than his fiery genius hurried him on to another, it is obvious that he could have had no opportunity of correcting. The C major symphony, however, alone of all his symphonies, is an exception to this rule. He seems to have felt that it was to be his last and greatest work, and to have acted accordingly. It was almost literally the "Song of the Swan." It was composed in March, and on November 19 he was no longer alive. The first three movements are crowded with after-thoughts—the lovely opening phrase for the horns, which forms the theme of the introduction, has been altered; so has the first subject of the allegro—and that after a considerable part of the movement was completed, so that the correction has had to be made over and over again. In the andante there are many alterations of minor moment; but the most remarkable of all is that in the scherzo, where sixteen bars of new and most original matter are crammed in between those of the completed work. The fiery finale alone is free from corrections, the hand of the composer seeming to have hurried over it at as rapid a pace as that of the glorious music itself.

Last night the capacity of the orchestra was taxed to its utmost to give a clear and legible reading of the score at the rapid pace which Mr. Henschel led them in.

Most of the Movements.

The scherzo and the finale were the most notable examples of this. Otherwise the work was splendidly performed. It is scarcely necessary to say of a work brought out under Mr. Henschel's baton that it was given in its integrity, and that no repetition mark was disregarded throughout. It has become the fashion in some quarters to slight such directions where the work is long, but we are glad to see that Mr. Henschel is not inclined to follow it.

Another great event of the evening was Mr. Henschel's singing of Wotan's farewell to Brunnhilde from the first division of "Die Ring der Nibelungen." Mr. Listemann directed, and the wonderful effects of the orchestration were brought out with ample clearness. The dignity and force of Mr. Henschel's singing was apparent to everybody, and he received an enthusiastic recall. The programme began with Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale (op. 52), which was given extremely well.

The programme for next week will be:

Overture (Hebrides).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Polacca Brillante for pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt
Overture (Le Carnaval Romain).....Berlioz
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a large audience. It opened with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, which was admirably interpreted. This was followed by "Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde," and "The Firecharm," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," with Mr. Henschel in the vocal solo. It is scarcely necessary to add that he sang it with strong dramatic fire and artistic taste; but the thing itself taken out of its proper setting has no meaning, and the repetition of the leading phrase in the "Firecharm" becomes ineffably monotonous without the scenic effect it is intended to illustrate and emphasize. "The Farewell" is well worth the hearing for its own sake, but the rest is exceedingly flat and tiresome as a mere orchestral selection. The performances ended with Schumann's Symphony in C, to whose "heavenly length" some injustice has been done by calling the work the tenth symphony, when it might be called the eleventh in addition. It was given entire, even to the unnecessary repeat in the first movement. The interpretation of this masterpiece was one of the most inadequate of the season thus far. Taken altogether, it was a coarse and noisy, and in the Andante rough and almost vulgar. There was no tenderness whatever in the reading of this movement, and the difference in pitch between the wood wind, which seems to have become chronic in this orchestra, did not make the rendering any more delicate in effect. The scherzo was rasped unmercifully by the strings, and was painfully barren of contrasts in color and expression. The playing of the finale was not lacking in spirit, but it was given in a blatant and confused style that made its length and its many repetitions almost unbearable. We have rarely listened to a more inartistic performance of a great symphony than this proved to be. It was Mr. Henschel's first pronounced failure of the season. Before concluding, we would call attention to a very bad habit into which the orchestra have fallen, in tuning their instruments noisily between the movements of a symphony. It should be remedied without delay. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for piano, in G, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony, C-minor, Beethoven; Polacca Brillante, for piano, Weber-Liszt; Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

Franklin
THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—One of the largest audiences of the season listened to the thirteenth Symphony Concert by the Boston Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The programme included Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52, "Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde," and the "Firecharm," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mr. Georg Henschel was the soloist of the occasion, and yielding the conductor's baton to the accomplished Mr. Bernard Listemann, after the overture, sang Wagner's music, in the main, to the satisfaction of the audience. In "Wotan's Farewell," however, it cannot be denied that his voice was not big enough to resist the overpowering effect of the orchestra, though skilfully conducted, and many of his notes and words were utterly lost by reason of indistinctness. But the "Firecharm" was very finely sung, every tone being clearly delivered in his excellent interpretation. The Schumann overture was delightfully performed, the orchestra giving to it much beauty of expression. If as much could be said for the manner in which the Schubert Symphony was performed this concert might rank with the best thus far given this season. As it was, it came near being the poorest. It is possible that the great length of the work induced Mr. Henschel, after the first movement—which by the way was finely given—to set his musicians going at a pace which would shorten up the time of its delivery. If so, it was a mistake, for people would rather not have heard it at all, than in the unfortunate fashion in which they did. The best player in the world cannot properly play music like the Schubert Symphony in such a nervous hurry, unless indeed they are as active in their physical movements as monkeys. The result of this haste on Saturday evening was a rasping roughness and comingling discordance of strings, wood and brass, which was exasperating enough. At the next concert, Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist, and the following the programme: Overture (Hebrides), Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture (Le Carnaval Romain), Berlioz.

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schubert's Great Symphony in C, an Extract from "Die Walküre" and a Schumann Overture.

The concert last evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra owed its chief attraction to the fact that it was almost wholly devoted to the production of Schubert's symphony in C, that truly colossal work which formed the climax of the composer's achievements in this department.

The symphony has always been numbered nine, but such strong reasons have been shown for believing that Schubert wrote a previous one which has not yet been discovered, that it may be doubted whether it is not more properly number ten. The symphony in C was composed or commenced in March, 1828, and Schubert died in the following November.

A gap of nearly three years separated it from its predecessor, which appears to have been written at Gastein in the end of August, 1825, though, owing to some strange chance, the score has for a time vanished, and we do not even know the key of the work. It was, however, dedicated to the Musical Society of Vienna in September, 1826, in a letter still existing in the society's archives, and is mentioned in their minutes, and some day it will no doubt be discovered and played.

The symphony in C major is indeed the culminating work of Schubert's life. It may not have the peculiar tone of tender melancholy that marks the two movements in B minor (No. 8) and the Entr'actes in Rosamunde, but there is about it a force and majesty, a wealth of invention and a variety of treatment, a command over the resources of the orchestra and a tremendous energy, which make it one of the most astonishing productions in the whole range of music. No doubt to its general acceptance, but it is a drawback which disappears after a moderate acquaintance. Extension, or repetition, was a quality of Schubert's artistic nature as much as compression was of Mozart's. When he has invented a fine passage he never seems happy till he has had it all over again, and made all his friends share in his good fortune. But to be long is not always to be tedious; and a piece of music, like a poem, may be long because it contains a great number of fine themes treated with infinite variety and ever-fresh charm.

Its Length is a Certain Drawback

Shortly after the completion of this work, Schubert presented the MS. score to the Musik-verein of Vienna, a society for the encouragement of music, with which he had relations, and in whose library it still remains. By them it was tried; but its difficulties, in the then state of musical execution, were found so great that, after a few rehearsals, it was laid aside, apparently at the advice of the composer himself, and so remained till the visit of Robert Schumann to Vienna in 1838. He carried it off to Leipzig. Mendelssohn was at that time conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts, and to him Schumann communicated his discovery. The result was its performance and enthusiastic reception in Leipzig on the 22d March, 1839, and its publication (in January, 1850) by Messrs. Breitkopf and Hartel.

The Original Manuscript

of the symphony is now in the library of the Musik-verein in Vienna. The volume consists of 218 pages of oblong quarto. The handwriting, like Schubert's usual autograph, is perfectly neat and distinct, except where it has been altered by himself. The alterations are confined almost entirely to the first three movements, but in these they abound. The fact of their existence at all is remarkable, because in general Schubert did not make alterations. His scores are usually very free from them. He appears to have written under the influence of a kind of immediate inspiration, without rough sketches or any of the other preparatory processes to which other great musicians commonly resorted, and when once written he seems, as a rule, not to have returned to his work. Indeed the rapidity with which his compositions succeeded one another was enough to render this impossible. In the opera of "Fierrabras," the first act, consisting of 304 large pages, fully scored, was written in six days, between the 25th and 31st of May, 1823; the second act, 300 pages, in five days, between the 31st of May and the 5th of June. The last movement of one of his quartets, by no means restricted in length, was

Dashed Off in the Dead of Night

In three hours and a half, as is carefully marked by Schubert himself. And as each of these compositions was no sooner completed than his fiery genius hurried him on to another, it is obvious that he could have had no opportunity of correcting. The C major symphony, however, alone of all his symphonies, is an exception to this rule. He seems to have felt that it was to be his last and greatest work, and to have acted accordingly. It was almost literally the "Song of the Swan." It was composed in March, and on November 19 he was no longer alive. The first three movements are crowded with after-thoughts—the lovely opening phrase for the horns, which forms the theme of the introduction, has been altered; so has the first subject of the allegro—and that after a considerable part of the movement was completed, so that the correction has had to be made over and over again. In the andante there are many alterations of minor moment; but the most remarkable of all is that in the scherzo, where sixteen bars of new and most original matter are crammed in between those of the completed work. The fiery finale alone is free from corrections, the hand of the composer seeming to have hurried over it at as rapid a pace as that of the glorious music itself.

Last night the capacity of the orchestra was taxed to its utmost to give a clear and legible reading of the score at the rapid pace which Mr. Henschel led them in.

Most of the Movements.

The scherzo and the finale were the most notable examples of this. Otherwise the work was splendidly performed. It is scarcely necessary to say of a work brought out under Mr. Henschel's baton that it was given in its integrity, and that no repetition mark was disregarded throughout. It has become the fashion in some quarters to slight such directions where the work is long, but we are glad to see that Mr. Henschel is not inclined to follow it.

Another great event of the evening was Mr. Henschel's singing of Wotan's farewell to Brunnhilde from the first division of "Die Ring der Nibelungen." Mr. Listemann directed, and the wonderful effects of the orchestration were brought out with ample clearness. The dignity and force of Mr. Henschel's singing was apparent to everybody, and he received an enthusiastic recall. The programme began with Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale (op. 52), which was given extremely well.

The programme for next week will be:

Overture (Hebrides).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45. Rubinstein
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Polacca Brillante for pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt
Overture (Le Carnaval Romain).....Berlioz
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a large audience. It opened with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, which was admirably interpreted. This was followed by "Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde," and "The Firecharm," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," with Mr. Henschel in the vocal solo. It is scarcely necessary to add that he sang it with strong dramatic fire and artistic taste; but the thing itself taken out of its proper setting has no meaning, and the repetition of the leading phrase in the "Firecharm" becomes ineffably monotonous without the scenic effect it is intended to illustrate and emphasize. "The Farewell" is well worth the hearing for its own sake, but the rest is exceedingly flat and tiresome as a mere orchestral selection. The performances ended with Schumann's Symphony in C, to whose "heavenly length" some injustice has been done by calling the work the tenth symphony, when it might be called the eleventh in addition. It was given entire, even to the unnecessary repeat in the first movement. The interpretation of this masterpiece was one of the most inadequate of the season thus far. Taken altogether, it was a coarse and noisy, and in the Andante rough and almost vulgar. There was no tenderness whatever in the reading of this movement, and the difference in pitch between the wood wind, which seems to have become chronic in this orchestra, did not make the rendering any more delicate in effect. The scherzo was rasped unmercifully by the strings, and was painfully barren of contrasts in color and expression. The playing of the finale was not lacking in spirit, but it was given in a blatant and confused style that made its length and its many repetitions almost unbearable. We have rarely listened to a more inartistic performance of a great symphony than this proved to be. It was Mr. Henschel's first pronounced failure of the season. Before concluding, we would call attention to a very bad habit into which the orchestra have fallen, in tuning their instruments noisily between the movements of a symphony. It should be remedied without delay. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for piano, in G, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony, C-minor, Beethoven; Polacca Brillante, for piano, Weber-Liszt; Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—One of the largest audiences of the season listened to the thirteenth Symphony Concert by the Boston Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The programme included Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52, "Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde," and the "Firecharm," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mr. Georg Henschel was the soloist of the occasion, and yielding the conductor's baton to the accomplished Mr. Bernard Listemann, after the overture, sang Wagner's music, in the main, to the satisfaction of the audience. In "Wotan's Farewell," however, it cannot be denied that his voice was not big enough to resist the overpowering effect of the orchestra, though skilfully conducted, and many of his notes and words were utterly lost by reason of indistinctness. But the "Firecharm" was very finely sung, every tone being clearly delivered in his excellent interpretation. The Schumann overture was delightfully performed, the orchestra giving to it much beauty of expression. If as much could be said for the manner in which the Schubert Symphony was performed this concert might rank with the best thus far given this season. As it was, it came near being the poorest. It is possible that the great length of the work induced Mr. Henschel, after the first movement—which by the way was finely given—to set his musicians going at a pace which would shorten up the time of its delivery. If so, it was a mistake, for people would rather not have heard it at all, than in the unfortunate fashion in which they did. The best player in the world cannot properly play music like the Schubert Symphony in such a nervous hurry, unless indeed they are as active in their physical movements as monkeys. The result of this haste on Saturday evening was a rasping roughness and comingling discordance of strings, wood and brass, which was exasperating enough. At the next concert, Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist, and the following the programme: Overture (Hebrides), Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture (Le Carnaval Romain), Berlioz.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 5, in C-minor. It was played, on the whole, in a heavy and lumbering manner, with much coarseness in the strings, and at times much unsteadiness and consequent confusion in the orchestra generally. The first movement, marked Allegro con brio, was given without any brio whatever, and at a pace considerably slower than we have ever heard it taken before, with a result that deprived it of much of its appropriate spirit. The slow movement received the best treatment, the scherzo the worst, especially in the trio, the opening bars of which were sawed out unmercifully by the basses. The finale nearly came to disaster once or twice, owing to want of unity among the strings. Mr. Henschel is not keeping up to the excellent record he made in the earlier concerts of the series. The other orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture, carefully, though perhaps too noisily played, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which was spiritedly interpreted. The soloist was Mr. B. J. Lang, who performed Rubinstein's Concerto in G, No. 3, and Liszt's transcription of Weber's Polacca Brillante. The concerto Mr. Lang rendered with taste and brilliancy. In the opening movement there was perhaps a lack of freedom in style, but the reading was scholarly and impressive. The adagio was finely phrased, and played throughout with sweetness and delicacy. The difficult finale was given with great fire, but with a careful deliberation now and then which was not favorable to the effect of the more brilliant passages. Taken altogether, however, the performance was strong and interesting, and fairly earned the applause that greeted it at the end. The polacca was played with delightful grace and elegance of phrasing. Mr. Lang was recalled amid great enthusiasm after each performance. At the next concert the symphony will be Raff's "Lenore." A new overture by Mr. G. W. Chadwick will be heard for the first time. Mr. W. J. Winch is to be the soloist.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme included Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52, "Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde" and the "Firecharm," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," and Schubert's Symphony in C. This programme is brief in the reading, but was long enough in the hearing, since the last selection was almost interminable. Much has been said of Schubert's "heavenly length," and however one may take exception to the adjective, this particular symphony suggests heaven in one respect, that its duration seems eternal. Little need be said of its performance on this occasion, which was, on the whole, inartistic, coarse and tiresome. There were numerous moments, and not a few sustained periods, of good work, but in general effect the performance must be set down as one of the least satisfactory that Mr. Henschel has led during the season. He set the orchestra a tremendous pace in most of the movements, so that the result was roughness, and much scraping and harsh blowing. The wooden wind instruments, in particular, demonstrated a fault which seems to be settled with them, and were not in tune with the other instruments. The opening Schumann number was exquisitely performed, and none of the faults shown in the symphony were demonstrated.

In the Wagner selections Mr. Listemann conducted the orchestra, Mr. Henschel appearing as the soloist. Mr. Henschel sang excellently, although his voice was not massive enough to hold its own at all times against the strong effects of the orchestra. In the "Firecharm," however, his delivery and interpretation could hardly have been bettered. The next concert introduces Mr. Lang as soloist, and gives the following programme: Overture (Hebrides), Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture (Le Carnival Romain), Berlioz.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 5, in C-minor. It was played, on the whole, in a heavy and lumbering manner, with much coarseness in the strings, and at times much unsteadiness and consequent confusion in the orchestra generally. The first movement, marked Allegro con brio, was given without any brio whatever, and at a pace considerably slower than we have ever heard it taken before, with a result that deprived it of much of its appropriate spirit. The slow movement received the best treatment, the scherzo the worst, especially in the trio, the opening bars of which were sawed out unmercifully by the basses. The finale nearly came to disaster once or twice, owing to want of unity among the strings. Mr. Henschel is not keeping up to the excellent record he made in the earlier concerts of the series. The other orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture, carefully, though perhaps too noisily played, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, which was spiritedly interpreted. The soloist was Mr. B. J. Lang, who performed Rubinstein's Concerto in G, No. 3, and Liszt's transcription of Weber's Polacca Brillante. The concerto Mr. Lang rendered with taste and brilliancy. In the opening movement there was perhaps a lack of freedom in style, but the reading was scholarly and impressive. The adagio was finely phrased, and played throughout with sweetness and delicacy. The difficult finale was given with great fire, but with a careful deliberation now and then which was not favorable to the effect of the more brilliant passages. Taken altogether, however, the performance was strong and interesting, and fairly earned the applause that greeted it at the end. The polacca was played with delightful grace and elegance of phrasing. Mr. Lang was recalled amid great enthusiasm after each performance. At the next concert the symphony will be Raff's "Lenore." A new overture by Mr. G. W. Chadwick will be heard for the first time. Mr. W. J. Winch is to be the soloist.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme included Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52, "Wotan's Farewell to Brünnhilde" and the "Firecharm," from Wagner's "Die Walküre," and Schubert's Symphony in C. This programme is brief in the reading, but was long enough in the hearing, since the last selection was almost interminable. Much has been said of Schubert's "heavenly length," and however one may take exception to the adjective, this particular symphony suggests heaven in one respect, that its duration seems eternal. Little need be said of its performance on this occasion, which was, on the whole, inartistic, coarse and tiresome. There were numerous moments, and not a few sustained periods, of good work, but in general effect the performance must be set down as one of the least satisfactory that Mr. Henschel has led during the season. He set the orchestra a tremendous pace in most of the movements, so that the result was roughness, and much scraping and harsh blowing. The wooden wind instruments, in particular, demonstrated a fault which seems to be settled with them, and were not in tune with the other instruments. The opening Schumann number was exquisitely performed, and none of the faults shown in the symphony were demonstrated.

In the Wagner selections Mr. Listemann conducted the orchestra, Mr. Henschel appearing as the soloist. Mr. Henschel sang excellently, although his voice was not massive enough to hold its own at all times against the strong effects of the orchestra. In the "Firecharm," however, his delivery and interpretation could hardly have been bettered. The next concert introduces Mr. Lang as soloist, and gives the following programme: Overture (Hebrides), Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture (Le Carnival Romain), Berlioz.

146

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Music Hall was fairly well filled on Saturday night on the occasion of the fourteenth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following programme was performed: Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca Brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. Beethoven's fifth symphony is well known to Boston, where it has long been a prime favorite, but it is doubtful if its admirers will go again to hear it should Mr. Henschel announce its repetition by the orchestra under his baton. At all events the work was not read and it was not performed on Saturday evening as it has been accustomed to be given heretofore in Music Hall. It is useless to point out the many defects of its performance. They may be comprehended in the statement that the work was given in a coarse, confused, flurried and harsh manner almost from first to last. The endeavor appeared to be to make a sensation rather than impression on the part of the conductor. If so, Mr. Henschel should be given to understand without delay, that such a style for Beethoven will not do for Boston. It may be that the conductor is correct in his methods, and his listeners of Saturday night all wrong. But it will take so many years for us to unlearn and give up convictions that there should be some feeling, delicacy of expression, and above all, some meaning thrown into such a work as the fifth symphony, that it would be hardly worth while to make the attempt to believe otherwise for the present. The two overtures were finely played, which showed what the orchestra could do when properly led, and Mr. Lang's selections for the piano were beautifully rendered with the well-known taste and skill of that gentleman. At the next concert Mr. William J. Winch will be the soloist, and the following programme will be performed: Overture, "Dance Kobold," Reinecke; Recitative and air, "Joshua," Handel; Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177. I. "Love's Happiness"; II. "Separation"; III. "Reunion in Death," Raff; Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10, G. W. Chadwick (M. S., first time), conducted by the composer; Siegmund's Love Song, "Die Walkure," Wagner; Hungarian Dance, set by Brahms.

Traveler Jan 8, 83

147

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Hebrides.)	MENDELSSOHN.
CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in G. No. 3, op. 45. Moderato con moto.—Andante.—Allegro. Presto.—	RUBINSTEIN.
SYMPHONY in C minor. No. 5, op. 67. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.— Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—	BEETHOVEN.
POLACCA BRILLANTE FOR PIANO-FORTE.	WEBER-LISZT.
OVERTURE. (Le Carnaval Romain.)	BERLIOZ.

SOLOIST:

MR. B. J. LANG.

Mr. Lang will use a Chickering Piano.

At the last Concert of this season, on MARCH 31st, 1883.

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

(No. 9)

will be performed.

Ladies and Gentlemen desirous of singing in the Chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose now at MR. PECK'S OFFICE, MUSIC HALL.

THE LIST WILL BE CLOSED AT 6 P. M. ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 16TH, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus-Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M., on

TUESDAYS, January 30th, and February 6th.

MONDAY, February 12th.

TUESDAY, February 20th.

MONDAYS, February 26th, and March 5th.

TUESDAYS, March 13th, 20th, and 27th.

at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal only.

J. P. LYMAN.
Secretary.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture. (Hebrides.) Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45. Rubinstein.
Moderato con moto.—Andante.—Allegro. Presto.—

Mr. B. J. Lang.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67. Beethoven.
Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—
Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—

Polacca Brillante for Pianoforte. Weber-Liszt.
Mr. Lang.

Overture, (Le Carnaval Romain.) Berlioz.

The concerto was the best performed number of last night's concert. Mr. Lang played with greater ease and steadier shading than at the recent Philharmonic Concert. His octave work was free from over emphasis, and the elbow action was less noticeably employed, its place being taken by a quieter but more effective wrist action in these passages. The scale runs of the first movement were especially remarkable for true delicacy of touch and shading. The floritura (much of it in arpeggios) preceding the closing theme was of excellent quality. The second movement was without a flaw save for a trifle of roughness in the orchestral accompaniment. In the dashing passages of the finale Mr. Lang made his best effects, but in the closing theme there was again something of dryness and hardness audible. In the polacca the lighter passages were very daintily rendered, but the heavier portions demanded something of Neupert's bravura style. More power was needed.

The Symphony was badly played. For once we were astonished at a lack of discipline in the orchestra, and a laissez-aller style in the conductor. Often the attack of phrases was anticipated by impetuous violinists, and all through the work there was a roughness and rasping apparent that destroys all possible enjoyment of the beautiful symphony.

The first figure was given with almost a comical suddenness and seemed to have a demoralizing effect upon the violins, and in the counter subject the horn almost broke. The wood wind was steadier than usual and the movement grew better towards its close, gradual unity coming over the incoherent mass. The second movement suffered from slovenly shading, and in the third the rapid passage of the contra basses was terribly rough and coarse. Part of this was owing to the prominent position occupied by these performers in Mr. Henschel's orchestra (which in such a passage makes the tone disproportionate) and part was due to the fact that the phrase was taken too loud throughout, as well as too rapidly. There is scarcely need of going through all the details of omission and commission. The symphony, which has had many an excellent reading and performance at the Harvard and other orchestral concerts, was on this occasion very nearly butchered. It is time to ask whether all the advantages which Mr. Henschel has enjoyed, have been thoroughly used, when, with excellent artists under him, and with exceptional opportunities for rehearsals, etc., the result falls so far beneath the work of less fortunately situated conductors, with smaller and less artistic orchestras. Comparison of different readings would be a great boom to the Boston musical public just now. We had one such instance with the Schubert unfinished symphony. If the public could now hear a thorough reading of the Schubert Symphony in C, and of Beethoven's fifth, we should hear less about the malice of critics and the injustice of the press. Mr. Henschel has proved himself a singer of great emotional power and true artistic perception; a composer of thorough knowledge and great cleverness, but, although he has had a long experiment, he has not yet proved himself a great conductor. The Carnaval

Overture was spiritedly and dashing given as the finale of the concert. The next programme will introduce Mr. William J. Winch as soloist, and gives the following works:

Overture. (Dame Kobold.) Reinecke.
Recitative and Air. (Joshua.) Handel.
Symphony in E. (Lenore.) No. 5, op. 177. Raff.

I. Love's Happiness. Allegro.—Andante quasi Lirghetto.—
II. Separation. Marchtime.—

III. Reunion in Death. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.)
[After G. Bürger's "Lenore."]

Thalia, Overture to an Imaginary Comedy, op. 10.
G. W. Chadwick.

(MS. First time.)
Conducted by the Composer.

Sigmund's Love-Song. (Die Walküre.) Wagner.
Hungarian Dance, set by Brahms.
Vivace. (No. 6.)

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Music Hall was fairly well filled on Saturday night on the occasion of the fourteenth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following programme was performed: Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca Brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. Beethoven's fifth symphony is well known to Boston, where it has long been a prime favorite, but it is doubtful if its admirers will go again to hear it should Mr. Henschel announce its repetition by the orchestra under his baton. At all events the work was not read and it was not performed on Saturday evening as it has been accustomed to be given heretofore in Music Hall. It is useless to point out the many defects of its performance. They may be comprehended in the statement that the work was given in a coarse, confused, flurried and harsh manner almost from first to last. The endeavor appeared to be to make a sensation rather than impression on the part of the conductor. If so, Mr. Henschel should be given to understand without delay, that such a style for Beethoven will not do for Boston. It may be that the conductor is correct in his methods, and his listeners of Saturday night all wrong. But it will take so many years for us to unlearn and give up convictions that there should be some feeling, delicacy of expression, and above all, some meaning thrown into such a work as the fifth symphony, that it would be hardly worth while to make the attempt to believe otherwise for the present. The two overtures were finely played, which showed what the orchestra could do when properly led, and Mr. Lang's selections for the piano were beautifully rendered with the well-known taste and skill of that gentleman. At the next concert Mr. William J. Winch will be the soloist, and the following programme will be performed: Overture, "Dame Kobold," Reinecke; Recitative and air, "Joshua," Handel; Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177. I. "Love's Happiness"; II. "Separation"; III. "Reunion in Death," Raff; Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10, G. W. Chadwick (M. S., first time), conducted by the composer; Sigmund's Love Song, "Die Walküre," Wagner; Hungarian Dance, set by Brahms.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and a Rubenstein Piano Concerto, with Mr. Lang as Soloist.

The weather had some though not a very serious effect upon the size of the audience which attended the fourteenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. The chief event of the occasion, or at least that which one had a good right to expect would be the chief event, was the production for the second time under Mr. Henschel's baton of that most individual creation of Beethoven's genius, the C-minor symphony. The work of conductor and orchestra was by no means beyond criticism. The symphony was very roughly handled in matters of detail. Many passages which should have been delicate were coarse, and the rasping of the strings disagreeably prominent throughout. This last is one of the most faulty features of the regular work of the orchestra. Instead of improving, it seems to grow worse, if possible, with each concert. Whenever there is any passage which calls for energy and precision among the heavier strings the audience is treated to an unmistakable reminder of very unmusical subjects. Whether this effect is partly due to the arrangement of the orchestra—which elevates the double basses into a prominent position—or not, it is useless to discuss. It is a fact, however, that other orchestras have shown that this is not a necessary concomitant of energy and precision, and it seems as though Mr. Henschel might induce some improvement in the matter. Aside from this Mr. Henschel's tempi were, in the first and second movements, too rapid and irregular. The rapidity might, perhaps, be pardoned, but the irregularity is inexcusable. As a marked instance of this, on resuming the tempo one after the più moto passage, near the close of the andante movement, Mr. Henschel's time was noticeably slower than it was when he began the movement. The last two movements were in excellent taste, and the closing movement especially was free from most of the imperfections which characterized the preceding portions of the work.

Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist. He was received with evident satisfaction and unmistakable enthusiasm. Rubinstein's concerto for piano-forte in G afforded him an excellent opportunity to exhibit the rich results of years of training and study. His performance was mechanically perfect. Further than that there is not much to be said. After the performance of the concerto he was recalled twice. This was likewise true after his playing of a second number later in the evening, which was a truly brilliant piece of work. Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture and Berlioz' "Le Carnaval Romain," the first of which began and the second of which brought the concert to a close, were well given and do not call for special mention. The programme for the next concert will be as follows:

Overture (Dame Kobold).....Reinecke
Recitative and air (Joshua).....Händel
Symphony in E (Lenore), No. 5, op. 177.....Raff
I. "Love's Happiness."
II. "Separation."
III. "Reunion in Death."
[After G. Burger's "Lenore,"]
Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10.....G. W. Chadwick
[MS. First time.]
Conducted by the composer.
Siegismund's Love-song (Die Walkure).....Wagner
Hungarian Dance, set by.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. William J. Winch.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair size, considering the inclemency of the weather. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca Brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. The chief attraction in this programme was the symphony, the most admired of all Beethoven's works in this field of writing, but much of its beauty disappeared under the hands of the conductor and orchestra. The deepest meaning and finest effects of the work were hardly expressed at all, and the work throughout was given in a harsh, coarse way, which was intolerable to the many in the audience who knew from previous experience how it should have been performed. There was also a great deal of confusion in the orchestra, and more than once one of the violin players produced harshness by the inexcusable carelessness of striking his strings before the other violins were called upon by the conductor to respond. The well-known passages for bass strings were scraped and blurred out of all reason, and once or twice in the finale the confusion was such as to make one wonder what was being played. The andante was the movement best performed, but much of the remarkable beauty and grace of even this was lost. In spite of all these defects, however, it was not noticed that the conductor was dissatisfied with their occurrence or tried to rectify them. It is to be hoped that such failures are not to become common; nevertheless, it is evident from the last few concerts that more care and study are needed. The two overtures in the programme were well played, although the first was somewhat over-voiced. Mr. Lang's pianoforte numbers were played with care and generally with fine feeling, although in the more difficult parts of the concerto the solicitude of the performer seemed to be more for a demonstration of mechanical than artistic skill. As a whole his work was interesting, but best, as it seemed, in the second number, whose demands were not so numerous or exacting. The next programme will be as follows: Overture, "Dame Kobold," Reinecke; Recitative and air, "Joshua," Händel; Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177: I. "Love's Happiness;" II. "Separation;" III. "Reunion in Death;" Raff; Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10, G. W. Chadwick, (M. S., first time), conducted by the composer; Siegmund's Love Song, "Die Walkure," Wagner; Hungarian Dance, set by Brahms, soloist, Mr. William J. Winch.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was—
Overture, "The Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Polacca Brillante for pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

Mr. Henschel's conception of the C Minor symphony is still what it was last year. However much one may like to see a man push a firm conviction through to the end, one's admiration for such unswerving persistency is likely to be all the warmer if one happens to agree with him. In the present instance we have the misfortune not to agree with Mr. Henschel. His reading of the first movement and the Scherzo still sounds to our ears unjustifiably slow and heavy. We can see nothing in the text which we can imagine suggesting so slow a tempo. The would-be poetic fable of "Thus fate knocks at the door" in connection with the theme of the first movement (a transcendental exegesis upon which Beethoven expended some rather Rabelaisian humor, when it was communicated to him) might lead some musical fledgling to take the movement in this way; but such trifling can have little influence upon a musician like Mr. Henschel. We would far rather look upon his slow tempo as an over-done protest against the rattling pace at which the movement is sometimes fiddled out, and which is quite as bad in the opposite way. In the finale Mr. Henschel is only a trifle more deliberate than the majority of conductors, and we can easily feel his conception to be adequate; only we should have liked to hear the closing presto pushed a little faster. As for the second movement, andante con moto (the italics are our own), we hail Mr. Henschel's reading with the utmost enthusiasm, saving in one particular, which we will specify later. Here we are compelled to go somewhat into details, the point being an important one. This andante con moto is almost universally played without the "moto;" the general tendency is to sentimentalize the whole movement as much as possible, to play it very slow; we find even so usually exact a man as Berlioz referring to it casually as the "adagio" of the C-minor symphony, so ingrained is this popular feeling that the movement is a "sentimental" one. As it is commonly played, one finds in it all the lagrime and sospiri of a Donizetti cavatina. This languishing conception of the movement is not difficult to account for. Be it remembered that the C-minor symphony was practically the first great work of Beethoven that made its way across the German border; it more than any other composition was the first to excite popular enthusiasm for Beethoven in France, in America, and we think also in England. It did for Beethoven just what "The Serenade" did for Schubert, it first unlocked the hearts of the outside world to his genius. For a long time in Boston and New York, when people said "Beethoven," they meant the C minor symphony, just as when they said "Schubert," they meant "The Serenade." And it was especially the slow movement in the symphony that aroused this general enthusiasm. Now it was unavoidable that this slow movement should at first appeal most strongly to the popular heart, not by virtue of what was most characteristically Beethovenish in it, but by virtue of what people saw in it that was most consonant with their accustomed habit of musical thought and feeling. People always value a work of art, not so much for what is really in it, as for what they can get out of it; and it was not unnatural that what people first found in this movement was a beautiful melody which they instinctively felt to be of the same character as the melodies in other slow movements to which they were accustomed; of the same character, only more beautiful. That, in thus emphasizing the sentimental possibilities of this melody, in making it conform to the then standard character of slow movements, they were really wiping out all its most characteristically Beethovenish traits, and, so to speak, vulgarizing it could not well occur to their minds. We take this to have been the real origin of the "sentimental" conception of the andante in the C-minor symphony, which has obtained in America. Mr. Henschel has been the first conductor, to our knowledge, who has distinctly combated this conception in a practical way. He rids the movement of that utterly un-Beethovenish, lackadaisical sentiment which most conductors think to descry in it. As he plays it, it is grand, almost march-like, full of vital strength and vigor; one can at last feel the real Beethoven in it.

Curiously enough, however, just at the crisis of the movement Mr. Henschel falls back into the old namby-pamby version, and plays it just as almost everybody else does. At a certain point in the movement, Mr. George Grove says, "On the last repetition" of one of the leading motives, "Beethoven, by a slight alteration of the notes, a trifling extension of the phrase, and a management of nuance all his own, has produced one of the most pathetic and beautiful effects possible. Immediately after this touching farewell, as if ashamed of being seen with the tears on his cheek, he urges the Basses into crescendo arpeggios, and ends the movement with a loud crash and an ordinary cadence." Beautiful indeed, but to our mind absolutely false! If there be pathos in this passage it is not Beethoven's pathos. Bellini or Donizetti might weep tears of appealing pathos in appoggiaturas of the ninth and eleventh over a subdominant, but Beethoven wept otherwise. In the first place the whole passage is marked forte; then there are two forzandos on the second beat of successive measures, which violently break the rhythm, and put all pathos effectually to flight. We have never heard these sforzando marks noticed by any orchestra, as little by Mr. Henschel's as by others. But just play them as they are written, and see what becomes of your pathetic tears. To

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and a Rubenstein Piano Concerto, with Mr. Lang as Soloist.

The weather had some though not a very serious effect upon the size of the audience which attended the fourteenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. The chief event of the occasion, or at least that which one had a good right to expect would be the chief event, was the production for the second time under Mr. Henschel's baton of that most individual creation of Beethoven's genius, the C-minor symphony. The work of conductor and orchestra was by no means beyond criticism. The symphony was very roughly handled in matters of detail. Many passages which should have been delicate were coarse, and the rasping of the strings disagreeably prominent throughout. This last is one of the most faulty features of the regular work of the orchestra. Instead of improving, it seems to grow worse, if possible, with each concert. Whenever there is any passage which calls for energy and precision among the heavier strings the audience is treated to an unmistakable reminder of very unmusical subjects. Whether this effect is partly due to the arrangement of the orchestra—which elevates the double basses into a prominent position—or not, it is useless to discuss. It is a fact, however, that other orchestras have shown that this is not a necessary concomitant of energy and precision, and it seems as though Mr. Henschel might induce some improvement in the matter. Aside from this Mr. Henschel's tempi were, in the first and second movements, too rapid and irregular. The rapidity might, perhaps, be pardoned, but the irregularity is inexcusable. As a marked instance of this, on resuming the tempo one after the piano passage, near the close of the andante movement, Mr. Henschel's time was noticeably slower than it was when he began the movement. The last two movements were in excellent taste, and the closing movement especially was free from most of the imperfections which characterized the preceding portions of the work.

Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist. He was received with evident satisfaction and unmistakable enthusiasm. Rubinstein's concerto for piano-forte in G afforded him an excellent opportunity to exhibit the rich results of years of training and study. His performance was mechanically perfect. Further than that there is not much to be said. After the performance of the concerto he was recalled twice. This was likewise true after his playing of a second number later in the evening, which was a truly brilliant piece of work. Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture and Berlioz' "Le Carnaval Romain," the first of which began and the second of which brought the concert to a close, were well given and do not call for special mention. The programme for the next concert will be as follows:

Overture (Dante Kobold).....Reinecke
Recitative and air (Joshua).....Handel
Symphony in E (Lenore), No. 5, op. 177.....Raff
I. "Love's Happiness."
II. "Separation."
III. "Reunion in Death."
 (After G. Burger's "Lenore.")
Thalia, overture to an imaginary
comedy, op. 10.....G. W. Chadwick
 [MS. First time.]
Conducted by the composer.
Siegfried's Love-song (Die Walkure).....Wagner
Hungarian Dance, set by.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. William J. Winch.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair size, considering the inclemency of the weather. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; Polacca Brillante for pianoforte, Weber-Liszt; Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz. The chief attraction in this programme was the symphony, the most admired of all Beethoven's works in this field of writing, but much of its beauty disappeared under the hands of the conductor and orchestra. The deepest meaning and finest effects of the work were hardly expressed at all, and the work throughout was given in a harsh, coarse way, which was intolerable to the many in the audience who knew from previous experience how it should have been performed. There was also a great deal of confusion in the orchestra, and more than once one of the violin players produced harshness by the inexcusable carelessness of striking his strings before the other violins were called upon by the conductor to respond. The well-known passages for bass strings were scraped and blurred out of all reason, and once or twice in the finale the confusion was such as to make one wonder what was being played. The andante was the movement best performed, but much of the remarkable beauty and grace of even this was lost. In spite of all these defects, however, it was not noticed that the conductor was dissatisfied with their occurrence or tried to rectify them. It is to be hoped that such failures are not to become common; nevertheless, it is evident from the last few concerts that more care and study are needed. The two overtures in the programme were well played, although the first was somewhat over-nervous. Mr. Lang's pianoforte numbers were played with care and generally with fine feeling, although in the more difficult parts of the concerto the soliloquy of the performer seemed to be more for a demonstration of mechanical than artistic skill. As a whole his work was interesting, but best, as it seemed, in the second number, whose demands were not so numerous or exacting. The next programme will be as follows: Overture, "Dante Kobold," Reinecke; Recitative and air, "Joshua," Handel; Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177: I. "Love's Happiness;" II. "Separation;" III. "Reunion in Death;" Raff; Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10, G. W. Chadwick, (M. S., first time), conducted by the composer; Siegmund's Love Song, "Die Walkure," Wagner; Hungarian Dance, set by Brahms, soloist, Mr. William J. Winch.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was—
Overture, "The Hebrides".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45.....Rubinstein
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Polacca Brillante for pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".....Berlioz
Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

Mr. Henschel's conception of the C Minor symphony is still what it was last year. However much one may like to see a man push a firm conviction through to the end, one's admiration for such unswerving persistency is likely to be all the warmer if one happens to agree with him. In the present instance we have the misfortune not to agree with Mr. Henschel. His reading of the first movement and the Scherzo still sounds to our ears unjustifiably slow and heavy. We can see nothing in the text which we can imagine suggesting so slow a tempo. The would-be poetic fable of "Thus fate knocks at the door" in connection with the theme of the first movement (a transcendental exegesis upon which Beethoven expended some rather Rabelaisian humor, when it was communicated to him) might lead some musical fiddling to take the movement in this way; but such trifling can have little influence upon a musician like Mr. Henschel. We would far rather look upon his slow tempo as an over-done protest against the rattling pace at which the movement is sometimes fiddled out, and which is quite as bad in the opposite way. In the finale Mr. Henschel is only a trifle more deliberate than the majority of conductors, and we can easily feel his conception to be adequate; only we should have liked to hear the closing presto pushed a little faster. As for the second movement, andante con moto (the italics are our own), we hail Mr. Henschel's reading with the utmost enthusiasm, saving in one particular, which we will specify later. Here we are compelled to go somewhat into details, the point being an important one. This andante con moto is almost universally played without the "moto;" the general tendency is to sentimentalize the whole movement as much as possible, to play it very slow; we find even so usually exact a man as Berlioz referring to it casually as the "adagio of the C-minor symphony," so ingrained is this popular feeling that the movement is a "sentimental" one. As it is commonly played, one finds in it all the lagrime and sospiri of a Donizetti cavatina. This languishing conception of the movement is not difficult to account for. Be it remembered that the C-minor symphony was practically the first great work of Beethoven that made its way across the German border; it more than any other composition was the first to excite popular enthusiasm for Beethoven in France, in America, and we think also in England. It did for Beethoven just what "The Serenade" did for Schubert, it first unlocked the hearts of the outside world to his genius. For a long time in Boston and New York, when people said "Beethoven," they meant the C minor symphony, just as when they said "Schubert," they meant "The Serenade." And it was especially the slow movement in the symphony that aroused this general enthusiasm. Now it was unavoidable that this slow movement should at first appeal most strongly to the popular heart, not by virtue of what was most characteristically Beethovenish in it, but by virtue of what people saw in it that was most consonant with their accustomed habit of musical thought and feeling. People always value a work of art, not so much for what is really in it, as for what they can get out of it; and it was not unnatural that what people first found in this movement was a beautiful melody which they instinctively felt to be of the same character as the melodies in other slow movements to which they were accustomed; of the same character, only more beautiful. That, in thus emphasizing the sentimental possibilities of this melody, in making it conform to the then standard character of slow movements, they were really wiping out all its most characteristically Beethovenish traits, and, so to speak, vulgarizing it could not well occur to their minds. We take this to have been the real origin of the "sentimental" conception of the andante in the C-minor symphony, which has obtained in America. Mr. Henschel has been the first conductor, to our knowledge, who has distinctly combated this conception in a practical way. He rides the movement of that utterly un-Beethovenish, lackadaisical sentiment which most conductors think to descry in it. As he plays it, it is grand, almost march-like, full of vital strength and vigor; one can at last feel the real Beethoven in it.

Curiously enough, however, just at the crisis of the movement Mr. Henschel falls back into the old namby-pamby version, and plays it just as almost everybody else does. At a certain point in the movement, Mr. George Grove says, "On the last repetition" of one of the leading motives, "Beethoven, by a slight alteration of the notes, a trifling extension of the phrase, and a management of nuance all his own, has produced one of the most pathetic and beautiful effects possible. Immediately after this touching farewell, as if ashamed of being seen with the tears on his cheek, he urges the Basses into crescendo arpeggios, and ends the movement with a loud crash and an ordinary cadence." Beautiful indeed, but to our mind absolutely false! If there be pathos in this passage it is not Beethoven's pathos. Bellini or Donizetti might weep tears of appealing pathos in appoggiaturas of the ninth and eleventh over a subdominant, but Beethoven wept otherwise. In the first place the whole passage is marked forte; then there are two forzandos on the second beat of successive measures, which violently break the rhythm, and put all pathos effectually to flight. We have never heard these forzando marks noticed by any orchestra, as little by Mr. Henschel's as by others. But just play them as they are written, and see what becomes of your pathetic tears. To our mind the passage speaks of triumph, and by no means of weeping. The Mendelssohn and Berlioz overtures were brilliantly played.

152

Of Mr. Lang's playing of the Rubinstein concerto much might be written. A performance in which much was so fine, and fine too in no common way, calls for the carefullest judgment. Never have that exquisite care for details and that far-seeing glance which detects the due relation of every detail to the whole, for which Mr. Lang is conspicuously noted, shown themselves in a more brilliant light. Never have we heard a pianist who seemed, in every phrase he played, to be looking forward so plainly to the next one. Every element in fine playing seemed palpably there, and in its proper place—delicacy, fire, refinement, verve and vigor. Yet, with all this, we could not but feel that Mr. Lang's exquisite art might have been a little more concealed. Although we felt almost everything he did to be just right, we could not rid ourselves of the instinctive feeling that he played thus, or thus, because he knew it to be right, rather than because he felt it to be so. He seemed to be playing from conviction rather than from impulse, and one felt all these wondrously beautiful effects to have been pre-calculated. No doubt they should be pre-calculated, and the pianist who plays wholly from impulse and not from conviction goes fatally astray in most cases; but this precalculation should remain a secret between the pianist and the piece he plays; the listener should not suspect it. For one thing, we may have been forced to listen to Mr. Lang somewhat coldly by our absolute inability to feel any enthusiasm for Rubinstein's concerto. It is a work which has always left us cold, with the best will in the world to admire it. In the Liszt-Weber polacca we were carried away at once by both player and music. The performance was utterly superb.

The next programme is—

Overture to "Dame Kobold".....Reinecke
Recitative and air from "Jephtha".....Händel
Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177.....Raff
Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10 (MS. First time).....G. W. Chadwick
Conducted by the Composer.
Siegmund's Love-Song from "Die Walküre".....Wagner
Hungarian Dance, set by.....Brahms
Vivace (No. 6).

Mr. William J. Winch will be the singer.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fourteenth Programme of the Second Season's Series.

The 14th programme of the second season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, the soloist being Mr. B. J. Lang, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture ("Hebrides").....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45.....Rubinstein
Symphony in G minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
"Polacca Brillante" for pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt
Overture ("Le Carnaval Romain").....Berlioz

Mr. Lang's contributions to the programme proved the strong attraction of the evening, as he has rarely been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. In the melodious concerto the full beauty of the pianoforte score was brought out with a clearness and brilliancy that could hardly have been bettered. The graceful interpretation of the andante was one of the most notable features of the performance, and the final movement aroused the enthusiasm of the audience to such an extent that it found expression in the most generous applause. The Weber-Liszt "Polacca," however, illustrated the brilliancy of the player's method even more distinctly, as the composition was given with admirable spirit, and so thoroughly with the orchestra throughout as to add immensely to the effect. At the conclusion of each of his numbers Mr. Lang was recalled to acknowledge the applause awakened by his efforts. The presentation of the symphony, notably in the two first movements, was not altogether satisfactory, the musicians showing a lack of steadiness in portions of their work, and a number of errors being made by individual players which detracted largely from the general result. The famous passage for the double basses was given with strong effect, and the triumphal march was played with fine precision, though with some lack of finish. The two overtures were admirably well played, the fantastic beauties of that by Berlioz giving a brief and pleasing ending to the evening's programme.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

While the ninth symphony of Beethoven may justly be conceded to be the greatest of the immortal series, in the sense in which the term is generally used with relation to musical composition, his fifth will doubtless always be a favorite with the large majority of musedom. The choral symphony compels to reverence by its appeal to one's sense of sublimity, awe and mystery, while the C-minor work speaks directly to the heart with the "still small voice" that is more divinely potent than the terrors of the storm or the glories of the sunset. To those, therefore, whose hearts are like to that of "a little child," this work never grows old, but is always heard with a kind of spiritual delight not unlike that which the religious devotee finds in a simple but impressive church service, conducted "decently and in order." Like the devotee, too, when anything occurs to mar the serenity of the occasion his spiritual sensibilities receive a shock which the worldly-minded could not understand. Considering, therefore, the great familiarity of this beautiful symphony with Boston people, and the many fine interpretations of it which they have enjoyed, the performance given it by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert on Saturday evening must have left, with many of those present, an impression not wholly free from pain. Yet to the child-like heart, not yet caloused with the habit of aggressive criticism,—and this we insist is the highest mood in which to listen to good music,—the performance should have been far worse than it was to fail of giving much delight. It would require very rough treatment indeed wholly to crush out the noble beauties which shine from every measure of this work. But one may retain the child-like spirit after he has acquired the intellect of maturity and the nice faculty of discrimination that comes only with education, and such a one, without being consciously in a critical mood, will instinctively judge a given performance by the standards established in his mind by previous interpretations of the same work. The larger portion of the audience of Saturday evening was, we may presume, composed of this musically educated class, and to them the performance of the symphony, with all its good features, must have brought a modicum of disappointment. In some respects the work was not given as well as last season. There was much the same lack of consistency in the conductor's reading as before, but last year the orchestra was well under the conductor's control and followed faithfully where he led, and its delivery was reasonably smooth, tuneful and sympathetic. This year, however, the orchestral treatment was generally harsh in tone, often coarse and slovenly in expression and lacking in unity of time. The performance had some stirring and well worked-up "effects," but this is about the last work in which "effects," in the present accepta-

tion of the term, are in order. It was, in a word, sensational rather than artistic, when it was not positively tame. The great latent efficiency of the orchestra was, however, illustrated in many single passages, notably in the difficult passage for the contra-basses in the third movement, which was given with remarkable accuracy and precision, though with an unwelcome roughness of tone. This orchestra has given such good performances of the earlier Beethoven symphonies this season that its work on this occasion was a surprise and hence a double disappointment.

The other purely orchestral numbers—Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture at the beginning of the programme, and the "Carnaval Romain" overture of Berlioz, at its close—were excellently performed, particularly the latter, in which class of composition this orchestra rarely fails to acquit itself brilliantly. Mr. B. J. Lang, the soloist of the evening, played, with orchestral support, Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in G (No. 3, op. 45), and Liszt's piano transcription of Weber's "Polacca Brillante." In both selections he displayed to very high advantage his fine taste, scholarly insight and finished technique. In the polacca, however, he played with something more of freedom than in the concerto, though his style lacks that last degree of intensity requisite for the most satisfactory interpretation of Liszt in his most frenzied moments.

For the next concert Mr. William J. Winch has been engaged for soloist, and the programme is as follows:—

Overture, "Dame Kobold," Reinecke; recitative and air, "Joshua," Handel; symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177, Raff; "Thalia," overture to an imaginative comedy, op. 10. (MS. first time.) G. W. Chadwick; (conducted by the composer.) Siegmund's Love Song, "Die Walküre," Wagner, Hungarian Dance, No. 6, set by Brahms.

At the last concert of this season, on March 31, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed. Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion are invited to write their names and address in a book provided for this purpose now at Mr. Peck's office, Music Hall. The list will be closed at 6 p. m. on January 16, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

our mind the passage speaks of triumph, and by no means of weeping. The Mendelssohn and Berlioz overtures were brilliantly played.

Of Mr. Lang's playing of the Rubinstein concerto much might be written. A performance in which much was so fine, and fine too in no common way, calls for the carefullest judgment. Never have that exquisite care for details and that far-seeing glance which detects the due relation of every detail to the whole, for which Mr. Lang is conspicuously noted, shown themselves in a more brilliant light. Never have we heard a pianist who seemed, in every phrase he played, to be looking forward so plainly to the next one. Every element in fine playing seemed palpably there, and in its proper place—delicacy, fire, refinement, verve and vigor. Yet, with all this, we could not but feel that Mr. Lang's exquisite art might have been a little more concealed. Although we felt almost everything he did to be just right, we could not rid ourselves of the instinctive feeling that he played thus, or thus, because he knew it to be right, rather than because he felt it to be so. He seemed to be playing from conviction rather than from impulse, and one felt all these wondrously beautiful effects to have been pre-calculated. No doubt they should be pre-calculated, and the pianist who plays wholly from impulse and not from conviction goes fatally astray in most cases; but this precalculation should remain a secret between the pianist and the piece he plays; the listener should not suspect it. For one thing, we may have been forced to listen to Mr. Lang somewhat coldly by our absolute inability to feel any enthusiasm for Rubinstein's concerto. It is a work which has always left us cold, with the best will in the world to admire it. In the Liszt-Weber polacca we were carried away at once by both player and music. The performance was utterly superb.

The next programme is—

Overture to "Dame Kobold".....Reinecke
Recitative and air from "Jephtha".....Händel
Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177.....Raff
Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10 (MS. First time).....G. W. Chadwick
Conducted by the Composer.
Siegmond's Love-Song from "Die Walküre"....Wagner
Hungarian Dance, set by.....Brahms
Vivace (No. 6).

Mr. William J. Winch will be the singer.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fourteenth Programme of the Second Season's Series.

The 14th programme of the second season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, the soloist being Mr. B. J. Lang, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture ("Hebrides").....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 3, op. 45.....Rubinstein
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
"Polacca Brillante" for pianoforte.....Weber-Liszt
Overture ("Le Carnaval Romain").....Berlioz

Mr. Lang's contributions to the programme proved the strong attraction of the evening, as he has rarely been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. In the melodious concerto the full beauty of the pianoforte score was brought out with a clearness and brilliancy that could hardly have been bettered. The graceful interpretation of the andante was one of the most notable features of the performance, and the final movement aroused the enthusiasm of the audience to such an extent that it found expression in the most generous applause. The Weber-Liszt "Polacca," however, illustrated the brilliancy of the player's method even more distinctly, as the composition was given with admirable spirit, and so thoroughly with the orchestra throughout as to add immensely to the effect. At the conclusion of each of his numbers Mr. Lang was recalled to acknowledge the applause awakened by his efforts. The presentation of the symphony, notably in the two first movements, was not altogether satisfactory, the musicians showing a lack of steadiness in portions of their work, and a number of errors being made by individual players which detracted largely from the general result. The famous passage for the double basses was given with strong effect, and the triumphal march was played with fine precision, though with some lack of finish. The two overtures were admirably well played, the fantastic beauties of that by Berlioz giving a brief and pleasing ending to the evening's programme.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

While the ninth symphony of Beethoven may justly be conceded to be the greatest of the immortal series, in the sense in which the term is generally used with relation to musical composition, his fifth will doubtless always be a favorite with the large majority of musedom. The choral symphony compels to reverence by its appeal to one's sense of sublimity, awe and mystery, while the C-minor work speaks directly to the heart with the "still small voice" that is more divinely potent than the terrors of the storm or the glories of the sunset. To those, therefore, whose hearts are like to that of "a little child," this work never grows old, but is always heard with a kind of spiritual delight not unlike that which the religious devotee finds in a simple but impressive church service, conducted "decently and in order." Like the devotee, too, when anything occurs to mar the serenity of the occasion his spiritual sensibilities receive a shock which the worldly-minded could not understand. Considering, therefore, the great familiarity of this beautiful symphony with Boston people, and the many fine interpretations of it which they have enjoyed, the performance given it by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its concert on Saturday evening must have left, with many of those present, an impression not wholly free from pain. Yet to the child-like heart, not yet caloused with the habit of aggressive criticism,—and this we insist is the highest mood in which to listen to good music,—the performance should have been far worse than it was to fall of giving much delight. It would require very rough treatment indeed wholly to crush out the noble beauties which shine from every measure of this work. But one may retain the child-like spirit after he has acquired the intellect of maturity and the nice faculty of discrimination that comes only with education, and such a one, without being consciously in a critical mood, will instinctively judge a given performance by the standards established in his mind by previous interpretations of the same work. The larger portion of the audience of Saturday evening was, we may presume, composed of this musically educated class, and to them the performance of the symphony, with all its good features, must have brought a modicum of disappointment. In some respects the work was not given as well as last season. There was much the same lack of consistency in the conductor's reading as before, but last year the orchestra was well under the conductor's control and followed faithfully where he led, and its delivery was reasonably smooth, tuneful and sympathetic. This year, however, the orchestral treatment was generally harsh in tone, often coarse and slovenly in expression and lacking in unity of time. The performance had some stirring and well worked-up "effects," but this is about the last work in which "effects," in the present accepta-

tion of the term, are in order. It was, in a word, sensational rather than artistic, when it was not positively tame. The great latent efficiency of the orchestra was, however, illustrated in many single passages, notably in the difficult passage for the contra-basses in the third movement, which was given with remarkable accuracy and precision, though with an unwelcome roughness of tone. This orchestra has given such good performances of the earlier Beethoven symphonies this season that its work on this occasion was a surprise and hence a double disappointment.

The other purely orchestral numbers—Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture at the beginning of the programme, and the "Carnaval Romain" overture of Berlioz, at its close—were excellently performed, particularly the latter, in which class of composition this orchestra rarely fails to acquit itself brilliantly. Mr. B. J. Lang, the soloist of the evening, played, with orchestral support, Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in G (No. 3, op. 45), and Liszt's piano transcription of Weber's "Polacca Brillante." In both selections he displayed to very high advantage his fine taste, scholarly insight and finished technique. In the polacca, however, he played with something more of freedom than in the concerto, though his style lacks that last degree of intensity requisite for the most satisfactory interpretation of Liszt in his most frenzied moments.

For the next concert Mr. William J. Winch has been engaged for soloist, and the programme is as follows:—

Overture, "Dame Kobold," Reinecke; recitative and air, "Joshua," Handel; symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177, Raff; "Thalia," overture to an imaginative comedy, op. 10. (MS. first time.) G. W. Chadwick; (conducted by the composer.) Siegmund's Love Song, "Die Walküre," Wagner, Hungarian Dance, No. 6, set by Brahms.

At the last concert of this season, on March 31, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed. Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion are invited to write their names and address in a book provided for this purpose now at Mr. Peck's office, Music Hall. The list will be closed at 6 P. M., on January 16, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

OWING to a severe indisposition, MR. WINCH is unable to appear, and

MRS. E. HUMPHREY ALLEN has kindly consented to sing

CONCERT AIR. MENDELSSOHN.

AND

SONGS WITH PIANO.

(a) Nur wer die Sehnsucht keunt. TSCHAIKOWSKY.

(b) An der Linden. JENSEN.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Dame Kobold.) REINECKE.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Jeptha.) HÆNDEL.

SYMPHONY in E. (Lenore.) No. 5, op. 177. RAFF.

I. LOVE'S HAPPINESS. Allegro.—Andante quasi Larghetto.—

II. SEPARATION. Marchtime.—

III. REUNION IN DEATH. Introduction and Ballad. (Allegro.)
[After G. Bürger's "Lenore."]

THALIA, OVERTURE TO AN IMAGINARY COMEDY. op. 10. G. W. CHADWICK.
(MS. First time.)

Conducted by the Composer.

SIEGMUND'S LOVE-SONG. (Die Walküre.) WAGNER.

HUNGARIAN DANCE, set by BRAHMS.
(No. 5.)

SOLOIST:

MR. WILLIAM J. WINCH.

At the last Concert of this season, on MARCH 31st, 1883,

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

(No. 9)

will be performed.

Ladies and Gentlemen desirous of singing in the Chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose now at MR. PECK'S OFFICE, MUSIC HALL.

THE LIST WILL BE CLOSED AT 6 P. M. ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 16TH, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus-Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M., on

TUESDAYS, January 30th, and February 6th.

MONDAY, February 12th.

TUESDAY, February 20th.

MONDAYS, February 26th, and March 5th.

TUESDAYS, March 13th, 20th, and 27th.

at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal only.

J. P. LYMAN,
Secretary.

PASTE OVER

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday evening, had for its distinguishing feature a new MS. work by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, which received its first public performance here on this occasion—or, to speak with strict regard to fact, at the public rehearsal on the previous afternoon. The composer conducted in person. The title of the work is "Thalia," and this composition was described on the programme as an "overture to an imaginary comedy." One naturally likes to know more definitely than this brief description reveals the intended significance of much that occurs in such a work, but that is a minor consideration in face of the fact that the work is very strong in a purely musical sense, and would not fail of exciting great interest even if quite devoid of a title. With this slight suggestion of its meaning, however, the imagination can easily discern many of the elements of a dignified comedy, both serious and humorous. The work is chiefly remarkable, however, for the striking originality both of its themes and their orchestral treatment, and for the musicianly skill shown in the development of the thoughts. The allegro, which follows an imposing and melodious introduction, is strongly humorous in character, though some of the effects introduced border closely on the bizarre. The closing portion of the overture, where its leading themes are blended produces a fine climax, strongly suggestive of the happy working-out of a comedy plot, and final introduction of all its characters in a closing stage picture as the curtain falls. The overture is full of life and spirit, and not devoid of surprises, as it should be adequately to reflect the vicissitudes of a strong playing comedy. The instrumentation, as we have intimated, shows great ability, yet at times it struck us as a little obscure, as though the effect of the instruments had not always been rightly calculated, but it is very possible that this was the fault of the orchestra rather than of the work itself. It is to be hoped that we may have an opportunity to hear this interesting production again before the season shall have closed. Mr. Chadwick was twice recalled with great heartiness and was presented with a huge laurel wreath.

The symphony of the evening was Raff's "Lenore," founded on G. Bürger's poem of that name. This symphony, which Mr. Theodore Thomas first introduced here several years ago, and which has since become pleasantly familiar to our concert patrons, is one of the most enjoyable specimens of modern "programme" music, partly for the reason, doubtless, that, though it professes to deal with incidents and persons, it treats these in a large degree subjectively, that is, it makes very prominent the interpretation of emotions, which is the highest function of music. The symphony was performed with a good deal of brilliancy, but by no means with all the delicacy and poetry that could have been desired. It was received with very remarkable enthusiasm for such a work. Nearly every movement was followed by repeated bursts of applause, compelling Mr. Henschel to bow his acknowledgments again and again. The two other purely instrumental selections on the programme were Reinecke's "Dame Kobold" overture at the opening of the concert and a strikingly beautiful Hungarian dance (No. 5) by Brahms, both of which were admirably performed. Mr. William J. Winch had been engaged as the soloist of the concert, but owing to severe indisposition was unable to appear, and Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen was secured, apparently on short notice, to fill his place. She sang, with orchestral accompaniment, a concert air by Mendelssohn, and, to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, two lieder by Tschaiakowsky and Jensen respectively. The Mendelssohn air was sung with admirable breadth and power, and the lieder with all that peculiar charm which has given this singer such a flattering prominence in the interpretation of this class of music.

For the next concert Miss Katherine Van Arnhem has been engaged as soloist, and this will be the programme:—

A Faust overture, Wagner; aria ("Ah perfido!"), Beethoven; symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn; songs with piano: "Scenes Alsacennes" (new, first time), Massenet.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The symphony was Raff's "Lenore," which, though not interpreted with as fine effect as it has been on many previous occasions in this city, had, nevertheless, passing fair treatment. The differences in pitch between the various wind instruments again made themselves unpleasantly felt. Something surely can be done to obviate this evil. In passages where the wood play alone, the effect is sometimes painfully distressing. There was the usual tendency to hurry the tempo, but we do not think it was wholly Mr. Henschel's fault. He was led away by the first violins, which were driven into a quicker time, and carried the conductor along with them. The chief interest of the concert centred in Mr. G. W. Chadwick's new overture, "Thalia," a brilliant, masterly, and highly effective work, and in some respects the most perfect he has as yet given to the public. The themes are of marked originality, are melodious and pleasing to a high degree, and are charmingly worked out. The instrumentation is very rich and noble, though perhaps now and then a little too heavy. The opening slow movement is full of grace and dignity, and beautiful in its harmonies and thematic development. The allegro is admirable in its flow and spirit, with something of a humorous character, and is abundant in dash and fire. The concluding portion, in which the theme of the slow movement and two other subjects are blended, is both ingenious and effective. It was performed under the composer's own direction and achieved an immediate and well deserved success. He was recalled three times, and presented with a gigantic wreath of laurel. We trust this fine and musicianly work may have another performance in order that the beauties which were inevitably missed upon a first hearing may meet with recognition. The other orchestral selections were Reinecke's overture to "Dame Kobold," clearly and well performed, and a Hungarian Dance by Brahms. The soloist was Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen, who consented to replace Mr. W. J. Winch, who was kept away by a severe indisposition. Mrs. Allen sang a concert aria by Mendelssohn with the good taste, judgment, and purity of style that characterize all her work, and met with her usual success and large share of applause. She also contributed songs by Tschaiakowsky and Jensen, both which she sang with charming effect. At the next concert the symphony will be Mendelssohn's in A minor, No. 3, and a new suite by Massenet will be given for the first time here. The soloist will be Miss Katherine Van Arnhem.

AND VAN ARNHEM.

ed is a Chickering.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifteenth concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was—
Overture, "Dame Kobold".....Reinecke
Concert Air, "Infelice".....Mendelssohn
Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177.....Raff
Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy,
op. 10.....G. W. Chadwick
(MSS. First time).
Conducted by the composer.

Songs with pianoforte.
(a) "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt". Tschalkowsky
(b) "An der Linden". Jensen
Hungarian Dance, set by.....Brahms
(No. 5).

Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen was the singer.

Mr. William J. Winch was down on the programme to sing an air from Handel's "Jephtha" and Siegmund's Love-Song from "Die Walküre," but the announcement was made on an additional slip of paper that he would be prevented from appearing by a severe indisposition, and that Mrs. Allen had kindly consented to sing in his stead.

Reinecke's bright, sparkling overture was capably played. The seething violin passages, an orchestral effect imitated from Schumann, but decidedly improved here, were given with consummate brilliancy; how the violinists' wrists must have ached, though! Raff's "Lenore" was played clearly and vigorously, and was evidently much enjoyed by the audience. The performance, however, lacked something of that virtuosity which makes the most of isolated phrases, and we could not help feeling that, without such "stage strokes" the symphony is rather uninteresting as a whole. The straightforward, honest playing of the orchestra laid bare all the triviality of the work. The Brahms dance was superbly given, and made a most brilliant effect. Mr. Chadwick's new overture took all hearts by storm. Judging merely from first impressions, we have nothing but admiration to express. The tuneful, melodious character of the themes, the ingenuity with which one brilliant effect is made to follow close upon the heels of another, the sharply drawn, but never exaggerated, contrasts of coloring, and, above all, the genial, Hellenic cheerfulness of the whole fill the listener with delight. And be it noted that the composer has done two things in which young writers are rarely successful. He has taken the theme of the opening slow movement, a theme of wholly graceful, romantic character, and brought it back at the close amid a blaze of glory, without falling into that mere mock-grandeur and spouting bathos which are too often the result of this sort of "apotheosis." Again, he has used a very full orchestra, the richest of scoring, in a work of intrinsically light character, gaining thereby an oriental gorgeousness of color, but without overloading the work, and without recalling the coarse blare of a brass band—a feat by no means too common nowadays, and the successful performance of which implies a rare knowledge of the orchestra. The overture was played with that peculiar brilliancy and effectiveness which one often notices when composers conduct their own works; it was as if Mr. Chadwick were playing the whole thing himself. Mrs. Allen sang Mendelssohn's "Infelice" in her purest and most artistic style, and with delightful effect. The pair of smaller songs, admirably accompanied by Mr. Henschel, were charmingly sung.

SYMPHONY CONCERT. 1882

The First Performance of "Thalia"—The Balance of the Programme.

The chief interest of the fourteenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening centred about the first performance of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's "Thalia, an overture to an imaginary comedy." It was interesting because of the attention which is certain to be attracted to the first production of any work by a Boston composer, and also because this composer happens to be a young man of decided talents, who has already given promise of a brilliant future. The work, though it may be difficult to divine just what the composer had in his mind when he wrote it, proved to be deserving, and was treated in a somewhat original manner. It was received with great enthusiasm. Mr. Chadwick was recalled twice and presented with a wreath of laurels by his admirers. He conducted in person, which was not perhaps the most judicious thing for him to have done. The orchestra, being unused to his style of leading, were not so steady as they would have been under Mr. Henschel's baton.

The symphony was that pleasing piece of programme music by Raff—the Lenore symphony. It was presented in a very creditable manner. The strings for once forgot their wonted roughness, and the pianissimo passages were actually given with a great deal of delicacy. Mr. William J. Winch, who was to have been the soloist of the evening, was unable to appear, and his place was pleasantly filled by Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen, who sang a concert air by Mendelssohn, as well as two songs with the piano. She was received with accustomed favor. The programme for the next week is as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; aria (Ah perfido!), Beethoven; symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn; songs with piano; "Scenes Alsaciennes" (new, first time), Massenet. Soloist, Miss Katherine Van Arnhem.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, gave its fifteenth concert in the present series at Music Hall on Saturday night. The audience, though not as large as previous ones, was enthusiastic in the extreme, and applauded everything, very like a lyceum assembly. The following programme was performed: Overture ("Dame Kobold"), Reinecke; "Concert Air," Mendelssohn; Symphony in E (Lenore), No. 5, op. 177, Raff; Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10, G. W. Chadwick; songs with piano (a), Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, Tschalkowsky (b) An der Linden, Jensen; Hungarian dance, No. 5, set by Brahms. Mr. Wm. J. Winch had been engaged as the soloist, but on account of severe hoarseness, was unable to sing. In his place appeared Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen who sang with orchestral accompaniment the concert air by Mendelssohn, and, to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, the two lieder by Tschalkowsky and Jensen respectively, with the most delightful expression and effect. The event of most interest, however, was the overture, which was played for the first time in public and under the direction of the author. The work was most favorably received, as it deserved to be; for as far forth as a first hearing could tell it was the finest composition of the character which Mr. Chadwick has yet given among some very fine ones. Its chief characteristic was originality, mingled with almost perfect harmony. It was excellently performed by the orchestra. The other orchestral numbers were well given, including even the symphony which was played with better effect than any of those given during the past four or five weeks. The following programme, with Miss Katherine Van Arnhem as the soloist, will be performed at the sixteenth concert next Saturday evening: A Faust Overture, Wagner; Aria (Ah Perfido), Beethoven; Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn, songs with piano; Scenes Alsaciennes (new, first time), Massenet; Remembrance of a Sunday in an Alsacian Village; Morning—In the Cabaret—Under the Linden Tree.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

A FAUST OVERTURE. WAGNER.

"The God that in my breast is owned
Can deeply stir the inner sources;
The God, above my powers enthroned,
He cannot change eternal forces.
So, by the burden of my days oppressed,
Death is desired, and Life a thing unblest."
Goethe's Faust, Act I, Scene IV.
(Bayard Taylor's Translation.)

SCENA ED ARIA. (Ah perfido!) BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in A minor, No. 3, op. 56. MENDELSSOHN.

Introduction and Allegro agitato. Scherzo. (Vivace non troppo.)
Adagio cantabile. Allegro guerriero and Finale maestoso.—

SONGS WITH PIANO.

DICHTERLIEBE. Nos. 1, 2, 3. SCHUMANN.

SCENES ALSACIENNES. [New. First time.] * MASSENET.

Sunday Morning.—In the cabaret.—Under the Linden tree.—Sunday Evening.—

* See last page.

SOLOIST :

MISS KATHERINE VAN ARNHEM.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifteenth concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was—
Overture, "Dame Kobold".....Reinecke
Concert Air, "Infelice".....Mendelssohn
Symphony in E, "Lenore," No. 5, op. 177.....Raff
Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy,
op. 10....G. W. Chadwick
(MSS. First time).

Conducted by the composer.

Songs with pianoforte.

(a) "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt", Tchaikowsky
(b) "An der Linden".....Jensen
Hungarian Dance, set by.....Brahms
(No. 5).

Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen was the singer.

Mr. William J. Winch was down on the programme to sing an air from Handel's "Jephtha" and Sigmund's Love-Song from "Die Walküre," but the announcement was made on an additional slip of paper that he would be prevented from appearing by a severe indisposition, and that Mrs. Allen had kindly consented to sing in his stead.

Reinecke's bright, sparkling overture was capably played. The seething violin passages, an orchestral effect imitated from Schumann, but decidedly improved here, were given with consummate brilliancy; how the violinists' wrists must have ached, though! Raff's "Lenore" was played clearly and vigorously, and was evidently much enjoyed by the audience. The performance, however, lacked something of that virtuosity which makes the most of isolated phrases, and we could not help feeling that, without such "stage strokes" the symphony is rather uninteresting as a whole. The straightforward, honest playing of the orchestra laid bare all the triviality of the work. The Brahms dance was superbly given, and made a most brilliant effect. Mr. Chadwick's new overture took all hearts by storm. Judging merely from first impressions, we have nothing but admiration to express. The tuneful, melodious character of the themes, the ingenuity with which one brilliant effect is made to follow close upon the heels of another, the sharply drawn, but never exaggerated, contrasts of coloring, and, above all, the genial, Hellenic cheerfulness of the whole fill the listener with delight. And be it noted that the composer has done two things in which young writers are rarely successful. He has taken the theme of the opening slow movement, a theme of wholly graceful, romantic character, and brought it back at the close amid a blaze of glory, without falling into that mere mock-grandeur and spouting bathos which are too often the result of this sort of "apotheosis." Again, he has used a very full orchestra, the richest of scoring, in a work of intrinsically light character, gaining thereby an oriental gorgeousness of color, but without overloading the work, and without recalling the coarse blare of a brass band—a feat by no means too common nowadays, and the successful performance of which implies a rare knowledge of the orchestra. The overture was played with that peculiar brilliancy and effectiveness which one often notices when composers conduct their own works; it was as if Mr. Chadwick were playing the whole thing himself. Mrs. Allen sang Mendelssohn's "Infelice" in her purest and most artistic style, and with delightful effect. The pair of smaller songs, admirably accompanied by Mr. Henschel, were charmingly sung.

SYMPHONY CONCERT. slow

The First Performance of "Thalia"—The Balance of the Programme.

The chief interest of the fourteenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening centred about the first performance of Mr. G. W. Chadwick's "Thalia, an overture to an imaginary comedy." It was interesting because of the attention which is certain to be attracted to the first production of any work by a Boston composer, and also because this composer happens to be a young man of decided talents, who has already given promise of a brilliant future. The work, though it may be difficult to divine just what the composer had in his mind when he wrote it, proved to be deserving, and was treated in a somewhat original manner. It was received with great enthusiasm. Mr. Chadwick was recalled twice and presented with a wreath of laurels by his admirers. He conducted in person, which was not perhaps the most judicious thing for him to have done. The orchestra, being unused to his style of leading, were not so steady as they would have been under Mr. Henschel's baton.

The symphony was that pleasing piece of programme music by Raff—the Leonore symphony. It was presented in a very creditable manner. The strings for once forgot their wonted roughness, and the pianissimo passages were actually given with a great deal of delicacy. Mr. William J. Winch, who was to have been the soloist of the evening, was unable to appear, and his place was pleasantly filled by Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen, who sang a concert air by Mendelssohn, as well as two songs with the piano. She was received with acclamations. The programme for the next week is as follows: A Faust overture, Wagner; aria (Ah perfido!), Beethoven; symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn; songs with piano; "Scenes Alsaciennes" (new, first time), Massenet. Soloist, Miss Katherine Van Arnhem.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, gave its fifteenth concert in the present series at Music Hall on Saturday night. The audience, though not as large as previous ones, was enthusiastic in the extreme, and applauded everything, very like a lyceum assembly. The following programme was performed: Overture ("Dame Kobold"), Reinecke; "Concert Air," Mendelssohn; Symphony in E (Lenore), No. 5, op. 177, Raff; Thalia, overture to an imaginary comedy, op. 10, G. W. Chadwick; songs with piano (a) Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, Tchaikowsky (b) An der Linden, Jensen; Hungarian dance, No. 5, set by Brahms. Mr. Wm. J. Winch had been engaged as the soloist, but on account of severe hoarseness, was unable to sing. In his place appeared Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen who sang with orchestral accompaniment the concert air by Mendelssohn, and, to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, the two lieder by Tchaikowsky and Jensen respectively, with the most delightful expression and effect. The event of most interest, however, was the overture, which was played for the first time in public and under the direction of the author. The work was most favorably received, as it deserved to be; for as far forth as a first hearing could tell it was the finest composition of the character which Mr. Chadwick has yet given among some very fine ones. Its chief characteristic was originality, mingled with almost perfect harmony. It was excellently performed by the orchestra. The other orchestral numbers were well given, including even the symphony which was played with better effect than any of those given during the past four or five weeks. The following programme, with Miss Katherine Van Arnhem as the soloist, will be performed at the sixteenth concert next Saturday evening: A Faust Overture, Wagner; Aria (Ah Perfido), Beethoven; Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn, songs with piano; Scenes Alsaciennes (new, first time), Massenet; Remembrance of a Sunday in an Alsatian Village; Morning—In the Cabaret—Under the Linden Tree.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

A FAUST OVERTURE. WAGNER.

"The God that in my breast is owned
Can deeply stir the inner sources;
The God, above my powers enthroned,
He cannot change eternal forces.
So, by the burden of my days oppressed,
Death is desired, and Life a thing unblest."
Goethe's Faust, Act I, Scene IV.
(Bayard Taylor's Translation.)

SCENA ED ARIA. (Ah perfido!) BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in A minor, No. 3, op. 56. MENDELSSOHN.

Introduction and Allegro agitato. Scherzo. (Vivace non troppo.)
Adagio cantabile. Allegro guerriero and Finale maestoso.—

SONGS WITH PIANO.

DICHTERLIEBE. Nos. 1, 2, 3. SCHUMANN.

SCENES ALSACIENNES. [New. First time.] * MASSENET.

Sunday Morning.—In the cabaret.—Under the Linden tree.—Sunday Evening.—

* See last page.

SOLOIST:

MISS KATHERINE VAN ARNHEM.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

SCENA ED ARIA.

BEETHOVEN.

Ha! faithless one thou goest? forth with thy traitor form!
I hate thee! and be this then thy last, thy last farewell.
Ha! was there e'er a greater tyrant, man, than thou?
Thankless and false one, go! from me thou may'st flee,
The avenging gods thou canst not escape.
Just are they in their wrath and merciful.
All, all unite to strike the false oppressor.
Shadows attend thee, with thee my shades keep pace.
Awaits the day of vengeance.
My soul with joy thy coming sorrow, thy craven terror vieweth,
As darts on thee the lightning.
Ah! no! ah! stay your hands O gods avenging!
Spare the guilty, your scorn descend on me!
Chang'd may he be; I, never; be it mine to shield him.
For him, him only live I, for him would perish!

ARIA:

Go not, go not, do not leave me.
Ah! leave me never, life for me is life with thee.
Can I without thee live!
Ah! thou knowest but thy dear presence rescues from the grave.
Ah yes but thy presence saves from death, etc.
Cruel one, thou tak'st my life, then without mercy is thy heart
Such the love that thou despisest!
So for love thou render'st pain.
Still, perhaps the voice of mercy pleads for me within thy breast.
Ah! ah! cruel, will naught move thee?
Ah! my life with thee thou takest.
Without mercy is thy heart for my love so free and faithful.
For my love what bitter pain, pain and woe my soul reward,
For love so priceless thou dost give.
Dost thou not feel one regret or thought of pity for my woe.
Ah! remain, for in your breast still must love be; do not go.
Whisper light sweet hope mid sorrow he will again love thee, etc.
Do not go, for my life, my life art thou.

DICHTERLIEBE,

SCHUMANN.

I.

'Twas in the lovely month of May:
When blossoms deck the grove,
Oh then it was that in my heart
I felt the birth of love!

'Twas in the lovely month of May,
Loud sang the feathered choir,
Oh then it was I breathed to her
My longing and desire!

II.

Where'er my bitter teardrops fall,
The fairest flowers arise,
And into choirs of nightingales
Are turned my bosom's sighs.

And if thou love me, thine shall be
The fairest flowers that spring,
And at thy windows evermore
The nightingales shall sing.

III.

The rose and the lily, the sun and the dove,
I sigh to them oft in the fervour of love.
I love them no more, for I worship alone
The fair one, the dear one, the true one, mine own.

Oh she is the essence, the fountain of love,
My rose and my lily, my sun and my dove.

PASTE OVER

THE SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the sixteenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, comprised three orchestral numbers: A "Faust" overture by Wagner, founded on a passage from Göthe's "Faust," act 1, scene 1, in which the hero declares life unblest and expresses a longing for death; Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and "Scenes Alsaciennes," by Massenet, which latter was performed for the first time in this city. Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, the soloist of the evening, sang, with orchestral support, the scena and aria "Ah, perfido" of Beethoven, and, with Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 of Schumann's "Poet's Love" songs. Wagner's "Faust" overture, which, we believe, is not new here, but has not been heard for a long time, is one of the most beautiful of the composer's works in this form. Perhaps no other of his orchestral writings is better adapted to soften the antipathy of opponents of his the Wagnerian school; for while every passage, every phrase, is thoroughly Wagnerish, the work has so much real poetry of sentiment, it so truthfully expresses the particular mood which forms its subject, and, withal, is such a masterly bit of orchestral coloring of a kind unknown to earlier composers, that no one with a particle of musical feeling could withstand its power. The overture was played grandly. The performance of the symphony was less satisfactory, but on the whole had a good deal to be commended. Lack of perfect agreement of pitch between the wind and the strings and an unwelcome coarseness and disregard of the finer shades of expression were its chief faults. Massenet's new work is "programme" music, pure and simple. Its several divisions are entitled, in the order named, "Sunday Morning," "In the Cabaret," "Under the Linden Tree," and "Sunday Evening." The printed programme went into a more detailed description of the several scenes, so that the audience had plenty of chance to compare intelligently the intention with the effect. For a work of its class this is really delightful, in spite of several extreme strokes of realism, notably in the last division, where, in the midst of the merry scenes on the street, the clock is supposed to strike eight, and the roll of drums and sound of trumpets are the signal for all the villagers to retire to their homes. To indicate this episode the gay music of the orchestra is suddenly stopped, and from the anteroom proceeds the trumpet call, mingling with eight actual strokes on a deep-toned bell, after which the music proper is resumed. Such a device, introduced without the slightest musical connection with the context, but, on the contrary, rudely breaking the spell of the music, is of course contemptibly puerile both in conception and execution. Nevertheless the body of the work is charming for the manner in which it catches the spirit of the scenes depicted, its captivating melodies and rhythms, and not least, the very skillful use of instrumental combination. The picture of the Sunday morning scenes is particularly happy, and the scene between two lovers "under the linden," wherein the lovers' dialogue is represented by a duet between a cello and clarinet, is very beautiful. The work was given with the utmost brilliancy.

Miss Van Arnhem fairly won a very warm reception by her singing. While neither her voice nor artistic powers are great enough to compel the enthusiastic admiration which our greatest prima donnas call out, she is nevertheless endowed with native vocal power and equipped with artistic accomplishments sufficient to give her a very honorable rank among her associates on the lyric stage.

The Beethoven scena and aria were given with much dramatic fire and with very just feeling, and her charming interpretation of the Schumann songs showed her to hardly less advantage in quite a different direction.

At the next concert Mr. Carl Baermann appears for the second time as soloist in this series, the programme being as follows:—

Overture ("Alfonso and Estrella"), Schubert; concerto for piano-forte in G No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; symphony in C minor ("Scandinavian"), [new, first time], Frederic H. Cowen; piano solo (a) "Der Lindenbaum," Schubert-Liszt; (b) "Rackoezy" march, Liszt; introduction ("The Master-Singers of Nuremberg"), Wagner.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Mendelssohn Symphony, and Miss Katherine Van Arnhem as Soloist.

The programme for the seventeenth symphony concert last evening began with Wagner's characteristic Faust overture, which was very well played. Miss Katherine Van Arnhem was the soloist. She is possessed of a sympathetic, pure voice, but not quite powerful enough for so large a hall as that in which she appeared last night. Her highest notes, though always clear, were not strong. She sang a Beethoven scena and aria, and two songs with the piano by Schumann. The latter pieces, given with a great deal of expression and understanding, created the best impression.

The symphony was Mendelssohn's third in A minor, popularly known as the "Scotch Symphony." This splendid work was generally well given. Mr. Henschel certainly deserves much praise for his steady and judicious conducting. It is a fact, however, that the orchestra was not sufficiently familiar with the work to notice the finer and more delicate shadings, especially in the first movement. Many of these marks were utterly disregarded. The second and third movements received better treatment. The concert concluded with a new piece of pure "programme" music by Massenet, heard here for the first time. Although it stoops to some effects which are decidedly cheap, such as the striking of the 8 o'clock bell in an ante-room, it cannot be denied that "Scenes Alsaciennes" is a work of much merit. As the programme contained a complete description of what the music was intended to depict, the audience was spared the agony of forcing their imaginations beyond a certain extent.

The programme for the next concert will be: Overture (Alfonso and Estrella), Schubert; concerto for pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven (Cadenzas by Carl Baermann); symphony in C minor (Scandinavian), Frederic H. Cowen (new, first time); piano solo, a. Der Lindenbaum, Schubert-Liszt; b. Rackoezy March, Liszt; introduction (The Master-Singers of Nuremberg), Wagner; soloist, Professor Carl Baermann.

A new overture by Mr. G. W. Chadwick will be performed at an early concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This suggests to us the fact that Mr. Chadwick's symphony has had but one hearing here. It would be a graceful acknowledgment of its merits if either of our orchestras were to accord it another performance.

use a Chickering Piano.

SCENES ALSACIENNES.

MASSENET.

SUNDAY MORNING.

.....How delightful it is to remember the Alsatian village on a Sunday morning....The streets deserted—before the houses some dear old people warming themselves in the sun....The simple church....the religious chants in the distance.....

IN THE CABARET.

And in the broad main street the Cabaret with its little round windows framed in lead.....and the rosebush on the wall.....

There, Comrade! To your health!....And the song of the Garde-Schuetzen going off to shoot at the target.....Oh the merry life and the gay companions!

UNDER THE LINDEN TREE.

Still farther away the long avenue of linden trees in whose shades there walk peacefully—in the silence of a summer afternoon—a loving couple.... she leaning towards him and softly murmuring: "Will you love me always?...."

SUNDAY EVENING.

And in the evening the wide market place....what noise, what motion! Everybody is in the doorways.....bands of pretty young blondes in the streets....they dance to national songs.....Hark!....Eight o'clock!....The roll of drums, the sound of trumpets.....the retreat!....And after the last sound is extinguished, the women call the children home, the old folks light their good big pipes and to the sound of the fiddle the merry dance begins again with renewed joyfulness....

162
NUARY 21, 1883.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

- A Faust Overture.....Wagner.
"The God that in my breast is owned
Can deeply stir the inner sources;
The God, above my powers enthroned,
He cannot change eternal forces.
So, by the burden of my days oppressed,
Death is desired, and Life a thing unblest."
—Goethe's Faust, Act I., Scene IV.
[Bayard Taylor's Translation.]
Scena ed Aria. (A perfido!).....Beethoven.
Miss K. van Arnhem.
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....Mendelssohn.
Introduction and Allegro agitato. Scherzo. (Vivace non troppo.)
Adagio cantabile. Allegro guerriero and Finale maestoso.—
Songs with Piano.
Dichterliebe. Nos. 1, 2, 3.....Schumann.
Miss K. van Arnhem.
Scenes Alsaciennes. [New. First time.].....Massenet.
Sunday Morning—In the Cabaret—Under the Linden Tree
—Sunday Evening.

Although the above was an unequal programme, there was plenty in it to interest even the most seasoned concert goer, and something to suit every possible taste.

The Faust Overture is one of the earlier works of Wagner, but is one in which he seems to have taken a strong interest, for he altered the score materially in his later years. It is essentially Wagnerian, having little of melody and much of orchestral color and effect. It uses the deeper register of the wood and brass wind almost continually, giving a gloomy effect, and pictures the unrest and vain longing which Goethe portrays in his poem, in rather a mystical manner. Miss Van Arnhem sang the Beethoven aria somewhat unsteadily, not as regards time or technique, but in expression. Her voice is rich and full in lower and middle register, but somewhat strident and piercing in its upper notes. In almost all technical details, intonation, tempi, and so forth, she seemed a well-equipped artist. In intense and agitated dramatic effects she was at her best, but was scarcely as satisfactory in sweeter and simpler legato work. The chromatic scale in the latter part of the aria was somewhat blurred.

We did not like her performance of the three first songs of Schumann's Dichterliebe. The climax in the first (Da ist im meinem Herzen, die Liebe aufgegangen) was scarcely natural enough. In the second she gave an unwarranted pianissimo, and did not shade the ends of the phrases sufficiently, an important point since a little after-cadence occurs in the accompaniment, with delicious effect and should blend with the shading of the voice in perfect imitation. The third she sang brilliantly enough and with good enunciation, by no means an easy task when its rapidity is taken into consideration. The thought is an untranslatable one. Heine has pictured the exaltation of love in a perfectly hilarious jingle of words.

Ich liebe alleine
Die Kleine
Die Reine
Die Feine
Die Elne

163
and Schumann has followed him with similar music. The spirit of this was well caught. The accompaniments by Mr. Henschel were perfection.

The Scotch Symphony of Mendelssohn received a fine reading although there were places where there was more force than necessary, and less delicacy. Mr. Henschel may be said to possess the loudest orchestra of its size, in the country. The continuity of the work on which Mendelssohn insisted, by not allowing pauses between the movements, was well preserved.

It was in the first movement, especially, that we noticed the excess of power referred to. The tripping figure of the violins in the second movement was finely done, although the wind instruments were not on the same pitch as the strings, and this caused some of the effect to be lost. The third movement was exquisitely given, the strings rendering the mournful melody as one man. It is full of such grief as one may imagine in the songs of the bards of Ossian, lamenting fallen heroes, and the final movement calls up the shades of Fingal's warriors.

The Scenes Alsaciennes were rather a disappointment. They opened with a picture of "Sunday morning," beginning with a wood wind passage, whose joyous clangor recalled Bizet's Carillon; but the subject was not long treated with the daintiness of Bizet. From being a tone-picture, it gradually descended into being a tone-photograph, and finally became a tone-chromo. The arrangement of the work seemed almost to suggest a sketch of a sinfonietta, an allegro, a scherzo, an andante, and an allegro, only the scherzo flavor was over all except the third movement. The whole was of a cheap order of programme music. If the composer wants us to understand it is afternoon, he sets the clock striking four; to convince us that it is evening, he lets it strike eight; to give the sounds of retreat and the exit of soldiers, he places drums and trumpets in a side room and allows them to play almost ad libitum. The third movement only, is melodious, tender and attractive. It pictures the communing of two lovers, which is done, (in a long way,) after the style of Raff in the Miller's Daughter, when the 'cello and violin represent the conversation; only here it is 'cello and clarinet. The whole set is supposed to picture a Sunday in a simple village, but Massenet must have chosen the noisiest village in the whole department to inspire his muse. It must be a village where all the inhabitants have become brass bandists. It is very sensational, but it is not as musical or dainty as Bizet or Saint Saëns would have made such a subject.

The next concert promises the following:

- Overture—(Alfonso and Estrella).....Schubert.
Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58.....Beethoven.
Allegro moderato—Andante con moto—Rondo—
(Cadenzas by Carl Baermann.)
Professor Baermann.
Symphony in C minor—(Scandinavian)....Frederic H. Cowen.
Allegro moderato ma con moto—Adagio con moto—
Scherzo—Finale—
(New. First time.)
Piano Solo.
a. Der Lindenbaum.....Schubert-Liszt.
b. Rakoczy March.....Liszt.
Professor Baermann.
Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg)....Wagner.

The appearance of Professor Baermann in the beautiful fourth concerto will undoubtedly attract many, apart from the interest of the other excellent selections.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a very clear and spirited performance of Wagner's "A Faust Overture." The symphony was Mendelssohn's in A-minor, No. 3, which was accorded a somewhat remarkable reading in respect to tempi, which were taken too rapidly throughout especially in the second part of the finale. Mr. Henschel has fallen back into his old bad habit of hastening the time. In the first allegro, in the scherzo, and in the finale of this work, in addition to starting at too quick a pace, he increased the rapidity, evidently unconsciously, until he ended by giving the symphony an interpretation as novel as it was startling. The concert ended with "Scenes Alsaciennes," by Massenet, which was performed for the first time here. It is a brilliant bit of programme sensationalism of no especial musical value, and prolific in the noise in which the composer seems to delight when dealing with the orchestra. The most interesting portion of the work is the third movement, intended to describe a love scene on a summer afternoon. The lovers are represented by the cello and the clarinet, which are given a graceful and pretty melody charmingly accompanied by the orchestra. The soloist was Miss Catherine van Arnhem, who sang Beethoven's "Ah perfido!" and a group of songs by Schumann with much courage and some little effect. At the next concert Frederic Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony will have its first hearing in Boston. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Baermann, who will perform Beethoven's concerto in G, Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Der Lindenbaum," and his arrangement of the Rackoczy March.

The concert of Boston Symphony which took place last Saturday was a great improvement upon the one of a week before. The Lenore Symphony by Raff was much better done than I had anticipated after the murder of Beethoven's fifth symphony. The shading in the march movement was good in its first crescendo and its final diminuendo, but was somewhat coarse in the climax, and the attack at the first return to the march theme was roughly done. The last movement, with its strange ghostly effects, was very impressively given. Chief of the instrumental works of this concert was a new overture entitled "Thalia," by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, which was conducted by the composer. It is a brilliant work, full of fine melodic thoughts and treated in quite an intricate but very effective manner. It is "an overture to an imaginary comedy," and the picture is vividly enough set forth. The first part is a slow movement of tender beauty, but this is interrupted by a brusque and fierce figure on the contra-bass, as if the heroine had, perhaps, an irate father, or an awkward guardian, who bursts on the scene to interrupt a love episode. It is risky business to attach meanings to music, so I will content myself by saying that a dance rhythm follows (in which the castanets and tambourines were out of time), and in the finale three themes are blended in the most skillful manner, but the sweet melody of the first predominates, picturing (possibly) the triumph of the hero and heroine of the imaginary comedy.

It was well played, save that the wind instruments were off pitch and the castanets, aforesaid, out of time. Mr. William J. Winch, who was to have been the soloist, was indisposed, and Mrs. Allen substituted, at very short notice. Mendelssohn's Concert Aria, and two lieder, in all of which she won success, particularly if we take into account the lack of preparation. The climaxes were broadly sung in the aria, and her legato work was commendable. L. C. E.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sixteenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The 16th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano, and the selections as follows:

A Faust overture.....Wagner
Scena ed aria ("Ah Perido!").....Beethoven
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....Mendelssohn
Songs with piano, "Dichterliebe," Nos. 1, 2, 3,
.....Schumann
"Scenes Alsaciennes".....Massenet

Although Miss Van Arnhem has been heard here several times, this was the first opportunity when the surroundings and circumstances were favorable to a fair estimate of her vocal abilities, and it is a pleasant duty to record the impression gained by her efforts on this occasion. Her voice is a true soprano, of good volume and well cultivated, of rare sweetness and purity and under admirable control. It is used skillfully and, in the more dramatic passages, her delivery is full of strength and character. The recitative was phrased in such an intelligent fashion that her abilities were instantly recognized, and the delivery of the aria more than realized the good impression given in the opening of the number. Miss Arnhem's interpretation of the German songs by Schumann, with Mr. Henschel's accompaniment, however, had a beauty which was fairly captivating, the grace and sentiment of the compositions finding the fullest expression in her singing. The lady was generously rewarded by the applause following each of her numbers, being twice recalled to bow her thanks. The wealth of charming melody in the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony has seldom been given with better effect by Boston orchestral players than on this occasion, and it was difficult for the audience to restrain its appreciation of the beauties of the scherzo to allow of the continuance without pause, in accordance with the composer's directions. The individuality and grandeur of the finale were also admirably developed by the players, and a hearty round of applause followed its conclusion. The Massenet number was the novelty of the evening and proved as bizarre as any of the compositions of Saint-Saëns, Bizet or Berlioz. It is divided into four movements, or descriptive scenes, in an Alsatian village called "Sunday morning"; "In the carabot"; "Under the linden tree"; "Sunday evening." It is "programme music," but the scenes it depicts are so strongly characteristic that there is little need of any word indication of the meaning of the several portions of the composition. Among the notable incidents depicted are the calm and peaceful village on the Sunday morning, with the church bells pealing their call to worship, the song of the Garde Scheutzen on their way to their shooting match, the conversation of the village lovers, as they wander under the linden trees, the signal in the distance of the retreat, and the final revelry of the Sunday evening. The horns gave the refrain of the song of the Garde Scheutzen with excellent effect, and Mr. Mueller's rendering of the beautiful cello solo in the scene under the linden trees was one of the gems of the evening. The distant retreat was managed so as to give an admirable effect, and the composition proved a very enjoyable novelty. The Wagner overture was well played throughout, and there were few opportunities to adversely criticize the players during the entire programme.

Communications.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR, BOSTON, January 6, 1883.

Editor of The Musical Courier:

SIR—You were kind enough to send us a copy of the first number of your paper under the new management, and in acknowledging it I beg to ask that you do us the justice to correct in your next number the following misstatements which appear in your Boston correspondence.

Referring to our series, your correspondent writes: "It is very much to be regretted that the director of these concerts does not bring out more novelties. There is a large orchestra at hand, and four or five rehearsals for every concert, so that all the conditions necessary to thoroughly prepare a new work are forthcoming; yet the sum total of novelties thus far has been a piano concert by Mr. Henschel and a symphony in E flat major by Gernsheim. The latter, however, can scarcely be called a new work, since the writer remembers hearing it seven or eight years ago in the Gewandhaus, in Leipsic."

Up to the date of his letter (December 27), we had given the following works:

Symphony in G minor (Russian).....	Rubinstein
(First time in America).....
Chaconne et Rigodon.....	Monsigny
Serenade in D.....	Brahms
Prelude ("Parsifal").....	Wagner
Huldigungs Marsch.....	Wagner
Concerto in E flat.....	Henschel
Overture (Schiller's "Bride of Messina").....	Schumann
(First time in fifteen years.).....
Symphony in E flat, No. 2.....	Gernsheim
Prelude ("Loreley").....	Bruch

These were all novelties in Boston. In addition to these we have given many selections which had not been performed at all or only very rarely for twenty years, and which were in reality novelties to the present generation.

The Gernsheim Symphony which we gave was only written in 1881-2, and your correspondent is certainly mistaken in saying he heard it in Leipsic seven or eight years ago.

Regretting that he should have been misinformed, I remain, very truly, yours,
C. A. ELLIS, Secretary B. S. O.

Communications.

Editor of The Musical Courier :

1883

SIR,—In your issue of January 17, the secretary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra asks you to correct some mis-statements, as he calls them, made by me in my Boston letter of the week previous. I said it was to be regretted that the conductor of the Higginson Concerts did not bring out more novelties, and he mentions nine new works brought out thus far. In justice to myself I must say that I spoke from the point of view of a musician, who will always measure novelties not by their number but by their importance, and in judging of the work of a symphony society in that direction, a new symphony will outweigh quite a number of smaller works in his mind.

What I meant to say was that, to my mind, the Higginson Concerts had not brought out enough new symphonies (this was even worse last season than this season), and the above mentioned list of nine works only goes to confirm what I say. It contains only two new symphonies, certainly not a very brilliant showing for twelve or thirteen symphony concerts, the rest being made up of smaller works. Anybody who read my letter to the end, would also see that my strictures were to be taken in a broad sense, since I specially referred to the good work that the Philharmonic Society had rendered last season in the way of bringing out novelties, by producing in a total of eight concerts no less than four new symphonies, and that with about half the time for rehearsing that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has.

As to my having heard the Symphony of Gernsheim seven or eight years ago in Leipsic, I may be mistaken. The work made so little impression on me at the time, that all I could recollect was the key, this being the same; and, as composers seldom write two symphonies in the same key, I perhaps not unnaturally inferred that it was the same work. But, as I say, I may be mistaken on that point, and, to make sure, have written to Gernsheim, with whom I am well acquainted.

My absence on a concert trip in the West did not admit of my explaining myself sooner.

I remain, yours truly,

LOUIS MAAS.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Alfonso and Estrella.) . . . SCHUBERT.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in G. No. 4, op. 58. . . BEETHOVEN.

Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo.—

(Cadenzas by Carl Baermann.)

SYMPHONY in C minor. (Scandinavian.) . . . FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Allegro moderato ma con moto.—

Adagio con moto. (A Summer Evening on the Flord.)—Scherzo.—Finale.—

(New. First time.)

PIANO SOLO.

a. DER LINDENBAUM. . . SCHUBERT-LISZT.

b. RACKOCZY MARCH. . . LISZT.

INTRODUCTION. (The Master-Singers of Nuremberg.) . . . WAGNER.

SOLOIST :

PROFESSOR CARL BAERMANN.

Mr. Baermann will use a Chickering Piano.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seventeenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella".....Schubert
Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58.....Beethoven
(Cadenzas by Carl Baermann.)
Symphony in C minor. (Scandinavian.)

Frederic H. Cowen
(New. First time.)
Pianoforte solos {a. Der Lindenbaum.....Schubert-Liszt
 b. Rackoczy March.....Liszt
Introduction to "The Master-Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

To judge from current reports, few new works have called forth expressions of warm and respectful admiration so unvaryingly as Mr. Cowen's Scandinavian symphony, wherever it has been played. Hearing it last Saturday evening for the first time, we got from it a higher impression of real power than from any new symphonic composition that we have listened to for several years. Like Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, it is written in that romantic, picturesque vein in which a composer is content with the amount of poetic suggestiveness that is strictly compatible with organically developed musical form; it never quite crosses the dividing line between symphonic writing and "programme music." Its title of "Scandinavian Symphony," like Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," is amply justified by the strong national accent of its melodic material, and does not have to be explained by any direct attempt at "tone-painting." Of the latter there is, to be sure, a good deal in the work, but it is never over-emphasized nor pushed unduly into the foreground. The Scandinavian turn of Mr. Cowen's themes gives them a strange, unfamiliar, almost ugly character; one would take them, at first, to be more notable for their emotional power than for their thematic value. But he works them out so clearly, with such decision, he makes so much of them by simple means, that the ear soon gets to feel at home in their somewhat uncanny atmosphere, and accepts them readily as musical and fruitful of good things. If Mr. Cowen have a serious fault, we suspect it to be an occasional tendency to prolixity; he does not seem always to know just when he has driven his nail quite home. But of power, grace, poetic charm and depth of feeling, there is plainly much in this symphony. One thing that struck us especially was the peculiar character of the orchestration. Mr. Cowen's treatment of the orchestra is, in general, essentially that of the older classical composers, Haydn and Mozart, potentized, to be sure, to a higher degree of dynamic intensity by modern technique, but still essentially classic in spirit and method. He makes his strings do almost all the work, using the wind instruments almost constantly as a background. We sincerely hope to hear this remarkable work soon again, not as a duty, but as a pleasure. The orchestra played it with superb vigor. The playing of the "Meistersinger" overture was a decided advance upon last year's in point of clearness, albeit still not quite free from roughness.

Mr. Baermann played the ever-beautiful Beethoven concerto with genial truth of feeling. We have never heard this admirable pianist to better advantage. The audience evidently felt as we did about it, for they applauded tremendously. His playing of Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Der Lindenbaum" was delightful, and all his brilliant virtuosity shone forth in Liszt's "Rackoczy March," which extraordinary composition should unmistakably be entitled "Reminiscences of Somerville," or "The Lunatic's Revenge," or something more adequately suggestive of its character than its present all too tame title.

The next programme is—

Overture, "The Naiads".....Sterndale Bennet
Aria from "Il Seraglio".....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastoral) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven
Two melodies for strings (op. 34.).....Grieg
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)

Songs with Pianoforte—

a. Mein Herz schmückt sich....Rubinstein
b. Im Herbst.....Franz
Symphonic Poem, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," Liszt
Miss Abbie Whinery will be the singer.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Carl Baermann's Triumph Last Evening—A New Symphony by Cowen.

The patrons of the symphony concerts were gratified last evening by the presentation of a very attractive programme. Notwithstanding the fact that there was a novelty upon the bill, it is none the less true that the chief interest of the evening centred in Carl Baermann's splendid and artistic rendering of the fourth Beethoven concerto. As this distinguished pianist has already played this composition in Boston several times, there is very little new to be said about his scholarly and impressive reading of this great work. As might have been foretold, he met with a most flattering and enthusiastic reception. It was such a reception, in fact, as is seldom accorded to an artist of even Mr. Baermann's eminence by a Boston musical audience. After his playing of Liszt's brilliant "Rackoczy March" the applause was fairly deafening.

Next to the interest in the work of the soloist of the evening was that felt in the first performance in this city of Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony. Mr. Cowen is a native of the island of Jamaica, and an alumnus of the conservatories of Leipzig and Berlin. Though still quite young—he is in his 31st year—he has been an industrious and successful composer, having written cantatas for the English festivals, an opera for Carl Rosa, many songs and various other music. This is his fourth symphony. It is of the higher order of "programme" music, and the name "Scandinavian," which Mr. Cowen applies to it, indicates only the character of the themes, and although there are certain devices in the second and third movements with a distinctly picturesque object, they are nevertheless musically legitimate. The first movement (allegro moderato ma con moto) opens with a striking use of the reeds, and has a broad and melodious second subject, where the treatment is chiefly by means of dialogue, with some charming contrasts of tone and expression. The interchange of melody between the violins, violas and cellos is particularly pleasing. The two principal subjects are developed and combined in a fresh and ingenious manner, and the whole works up to an admirable close. The second movement (adagio con moto) is marked on the score, "A Summer Evening on the Fjord," a legend which perhaps sufficiently indicates the delicate and dreamy spirit of its melody and the tender quality of the instrumentation. An exceedingly pretty effect is produced by a quartet of horns, with accompaniment of harp arpeggios. The quartet is repeated at a still greater distance, and dies away in an echo. This passage is one of the most effective in the work, and was remarkably well done by Henschel's orchestra. Though the third movement, the scherzo, is not explained in the score, it has been referred to as the representation of a sleigh journey. Whether this be correct or not, it is a fact that Mr. Cowen has written a brilliant and satisfactory piece of music. The last movement (allegro ma non troppo) forms a fitting close to the whole, and is the strongest part of the work. The lack of dependence on mere orchestral coloring and the predominance of the strings throughout, show a conscientious regard for the best and truest methods, and a proper contempt for cheap and seductive effects which a master of instrumentation can so easily be betrayed into in a work of this kind. The work was received with the favor which it deserved. It was very finely played. In fact, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was excellent.

The concert began with Schubert's "Alfonso and Estrella" overture, and the afterpiece was the introduction to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (the Naiads).....Sterndale Bennett
Aria (Il Seraglio).....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastorale).....Beethoven
Two Melodies for Strings (op. 34).....Grieg
Wounded Heart—Spring.
(First time.)

Songs with piano.
a. Mein Herz schmückt sich.....Rubinstein
b. Im Herbst.....Franz
Symphonic poem (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo).....Liszt
Soloist, Miss Abbie Whinnery.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventeenth Programme of the Season's Series.

The 17th of the present season's series of programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Prof. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture ("Alfonso and Estrella").....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in G No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven
Symphony in G minor (Scandinavian).....Frederic H. Cowen

Piano solo—
(a) "Der Lindenbaum".....Schubert-Liszt
(b) "Rackoczy March".....Liszt
Introduction ("The Master-Singers of Nuremberg")
Wagner

Mr. Cowen's symphony was heard for the first time here on this occasion, and gave the best opportunity yet afforded to judge of his composer's abilities. Though born at Kingston, Jamaica, Mr. Cowen may be classed as an English composer, his life, since childhood, having been passed mainly in England and under the tuition of Sir Julius Benedict and Sir J. Goss. Although his two previous symphonies and his opera "Pauline," both produced in 1876, and his songs have attracted some general attention to him in England, the "Scandinavian" symphony made his name familiar throughout Europe for the first time, as it has rapidly made its way during the past year into the concert programmes of all the larger continental cities. This work might with more propriety be styled a "symphonic poem," as it is hardly in strict symphonic form. Its four movements come very nearly within the line of descriptive music, though they represent the best class of this style of composition. Its characteristics appear to indicate a familiarity with the folk songs and melodies of the north of

Europe, and much of the interest of the work comes from the peculiarly charming style of the themes, apparently based upon the memories of a visit among Scandinavian scenes. There is originality of thought shown throughout the composition, and, although there is an abundance of musical ideas, the treatment of the themes is sometimes wearisome in the first movement, in which the folk song, which forms the basis of this part of the work, recurs again and again, with almost every variety of presentation. The whole work fairly bristles with difficulties, and the skill of the composer in the use of the fullest resources of the modern orchestra is everywhere apparent. The second movement, "A Summer Evening on the Fjord," is by far the most interesting part of the work to the general listener, the idea appearing to be to indicate the sounds floating over the water from a distant pleasure party, and a quartet for horns, with a suggestion of a harp accompaniment, is skillfully and effectively introduced. The quiet, subdued style of this movement is its chief beauty, and the use made of the several instruments is everywhere productive of graceful and tuneful effects. Following, and in sharp contrast with this movement, comes a dainty bit of a scherzo, in which it has been said the composer intended to give an idea of a distant sleighing party, and the tinkle of the bells and the flying feet of the horses can easily be imagined by the suggestions given the listener. The allegro which makes the finale is again in sharp contrast, being written for broad and telling effects in which the brass and drums are used with freedom and give a strong coloring to the finish of this most interesting work. Upon a first hearing the symphony thus lost has something of the characteristics of the first movement in the even elaboration of its themes; but the ability shown in this varied treatment is one of the features of the work which gives it an additional interest to the musical student. There is little that is sensational in Mr. Cowen's work and much that is of such a substantial character, that it will unquestionably find its way into the accepted list of standard compositions. In the presentation given the work the result of careful rehearsal was quite apparent, and generally good results were achieved, save in the final movement in which the complicated treatment of the themes was the cause of considerable confusion among the players and its performance often degenerated into mere noise without any apparent musical effect. The merits of the second and third movements met with instantaneous recognition and were generally applauded by the audience. Prof. Baermann made one of his best efforts on this occasion, and, great as was the beauty of his playing in the concert, marvellous as was his mastery of the stupendous difficulties of the great Hungarian march, there was an exquisite delicacy, grace and expression in the way the piano sang the Schubert song, that made it the great charming feature of his evening's selections. The audience almost rose en masse at the conclusion of the performance of the march, and the pianist was called again and again to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause which it called forth. The Schubert and Wagner selections were almost faultlessly played, and the audience was one of the largest of the season.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows, Professor Carl Baermann being the soloist: Overture—(Alfonso and Estrella) Schubert; Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; Symphony in G minor—(Scandinavian) Frederic H. Cowen; Piano Solo, a. Der Lindenbaum, Schubert-Liszt; b. Rackoczy March, Liszt; Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg) Wagner. The concert was of unusual interest, for two reasons—one, the first performance in Boston of Mr. Cowen's symphony; the other, Professor Baermann's appearance in the famous Beethoven concerto. The symphony is the third which this composer has produced, and he is also known as the author of an opera and a number of sentimental songs, but not until this work was published did he establish any very notable reputation. Mr. Cowen is an Englishman, and his symphony has not only established itself firmly among the musicians of his own country, but has also found a place in the programmes of concerts given in the leading continental cities. Its performance on Saturday night showed it to be a strong and musicianly work, full of refinement and strength, rich in effects and striking in its use of contrasts. It is evidently destined to take a high and permanent place among the compositions of its class. The first movement—allegro moderato—is rather too long-drawn-out, and finally becomes monotonous through its lack of variety, but the second—adagio con moto—describing a summer evening on the fjord, is full of beauties and vigorous contrasts. Gloom alternates with brightness of mood, a particularly marked feature in the development of this part of the composition being the strong effects that are produced by the wooden wind instruments. Following this slow and generally sombre movement comes a light and dainty scherzo, and the symphony ends with an allegro movement in which the brasses and drums are used to give a strong and impressive finish. The work was very well played throughout, barring some blemishes and confusion in the concluding movement. The other orchestral selections were well performed. Professor Baermann played in his usual masterly style. The concerto was the one in which he made his first appearance in Boston last year when he excited to the highest pitch of enthusiasm an audience which had had no previous intimation of the remarkable quality of his playing. On Saturday evening he repeated his splendid performance and gave a perfect rendering of the great work. The other two selections were also played with supreme skill and power. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture (The Naiads), Sterndale Bennett; Aria (Il Seraglio), Mozart, Miss Abbie Whinnery; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34), Wounded Heart—Spring—(first time), Grieg; songs with piano, a. Mein Herz schmückt sich, Rubinstein; b. Im Herbst, Franz, Miss Whinnery; Symphonic Poem (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo), Liszt.

Journal

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a very large audience. Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony had its first performance here on the occasion. It is scarcely a symphony in the strict sense of the word, but partakes more of the character of a rhapsody. It has but little variety in effect, and we must confess that we found it exceedingly monotonous. The opening movement is prolonged beyond any excuse to be found in the brief themes of which it is composed, and which are worked over and over again with but little change of treatment till they become almost distracting through reiteration. The slow movement is dry and dull, and is without perceivable continuity in idea, being chopped up into brief phrases, which exasperate through not having any discoverable connection with other phrases. The scherzo is quaint and pretty, but is characterized by the monotony that marks the preceding movements. The finale has more of power, brilliancy and fire, and at times is very impressive. There are some dainty outbreaks of melody here and there, but they are rapidly dismissed. We presume that we do not understand, or perhaps do not appreciate the Scandinavian elements of the symphony. We take it for granted that the local color is perfect, but we did not find it attractive. There is admirable musician-ship shown throughout. The scoring is full of beauties, particularly of a tender and graceful description, and it is not unlikely that a second hearing may open up to us other beauties in the work that were not apparent to us in a first, though we must confess we are not impressed by an overmastering enthusiasm to listen to it again. Without any desire to write disrespectfully of a seriously considered and carefully wrought work, we are, notwithstanding, moved to observe that this symphony by some means or other, constantly brought to our mind Oscar Wilde, peacock feathers, and various other suggestions of the utterly utter. Why or wherefore we cannot explain. It is doubtless very wicked and very unæsthetic to admit such a dreadful state of things, but the fact remains all the same. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, who played Beethoven's concerto in G, the work in which he made his debut in Boston. He gave a magnificent reading of it from beginning to end. Nothing more clear, more in harmony with the true spirit of the work, more broad or more artistic in conception and execution can be imagined or desired than the interpretation accorded it by Mr. Baermann. He was twice recalled at its conclusion. It is to be regretted that the orchestra was not more in sympathy with him. It came several times very near marring the last movement, and just escaped disaster in one instance from hurrying the pace at a critical moment. Later in the evening Mr. Baermann gave an exquisite rendering of Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Der Lindenbaum," and a marvellous display of technique in a performance of Liszt's amazingly difficult arrangement of the "Rackoczy March." The latter excited a furor, and he was recalled again and again with the most stormy enthusiasm. Schubert's "Alfonso and Estrella" overture, and the introduction to Wagner's "Meistersinger" made up the rest of the programme. At the next concert the symphony will be Beethoven's, No. 6 (Pastorale), and the soloist is to be Miss Abbie Whinnery.

Saratoga

and the whole works up to an admirable close. The second movement (adagio con moto) is marked on the score, "A Summer Evening on the Fjord," a legend which perhaps sufficiently indicates the delicate and dreamy spirit of its melody and the tender quality of the instrumentation. An exceedingly pretty effect is produced by a quartet of horns, with accompaniment of harp arpeggios. The quartet is repeated at a still greater distance, and dies away in an echo. This passage is one of the most effective in the work, and was remarkably well done by Henschel's orchestra. Though the third movement, the scherzo, is not explained in the score, it has been referred to as the representation of a sleigh journey. Whether this be correct or not, it is a fact that Mr. Cowen has written a brilliant and satisfactory piece of music. The last movement (allegro ma non troppo) forms a fitting close to the whole, and is the strongest part of the work. The lack of dependence on mere orchestral coloring and the predominance of the strings throughout, show a conscientious regard for the best and truest methods, and a proper contempt for cheap and seductive effects which a master of instrumentation can so easily be betrayed into in a work of this kind. The work was received with the favor which it deserved. It was very finely played. In fact, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was excellent.

The concert began with Schubert's "Alfonso and Estrella" overture, and the afterpiece was the introduction to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (the Naiads).....Sterndale Bennett
Aria (Il Seraglio).....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastorale).....Beethoven
Two Melodies for Strings (op. 34).....Greig
Wounded Heart—Spring.
(First time.)

Songs with piano.
a. Mein Herz schmückt sich.....Rubinstein
b. Im Herbst.....Franz
Symphonic poem (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo).....Liszt
Soloist, Miss Abbie Whinnery.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventeenth Programme of the Season's Series.

The 17th of the present season's series of programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Prof. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture ("Alfonso and Estrella").....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in G No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven
Symphony in G minor (Scandinavian).....Frederic H. Cowen

Piano solo—
(a) "Der Lindenbaum".....Schubert-Liszt
(b) "Rackoczy March".....Liszt
Introduction ("The Master-Singers of Nuremberg").....Wagner

Mr. Cowen's symphony was heard for the first time here on this occasion, and gave the best opportunity yet afforded to judge of his composer's abilities. Though born at Kingston, Jamaica, Mr. Cowen may be classed as an English composer, his life, since childhood, having been passed mainly in England and under the tuition of Sir Julius Benedict and Sir J. Goss. Although his two previous symphonies and his opera "Pauline," both produced in 1876, and his songs have attracted some general attention to him in England, the "Scandinavian" symphony made his name familiar throughout Europe for the first time, as it has rapidly made its way during the past year into the concert programmes of all the larger continental cities. This work might with more propriety be styled a "symphonic poem," as it is hardly in strict symphonic form. Its four movements come very nearly within the line of descriptive music, though they represent the best class of this style of composition. Its characteristics appear to indicate a familiarity with the folk songs and melodies of the north of

Europe, and much of the interest of the work comes from the peculiarly charming style of the themes, apparently based upon the memories of a visit among Scandinavian scenes. There is originality of thought shown throughout the composition, and, although there is an abundance of musical ideas, the treatment of the themes is sometimes wearisome in the first movement, in which the folk song, which forms the basis of this part of the work, recurs again and again, with almost every variety of pre-entation. The whole work fairly bristles with difficulties, and the skill of the composer in the use of the fullest resources of the modern orchestra is everywhere apparent. The second movement, "A Summer Evening on the Fjord," is by far the most interesting part of the work to the general listener, the idea appearing to be to indicate the sounds floating over the water from a distant pleasure party, and a quartet for horns, with a suggestion of a harp accompaniment, is skilfully and effectively introduced. The quiet, subdued style of this movement is its chief beauty, and the use made of the several instruments is everywhere productive of graceful and tuneful effects. Following, and in sharp contrast with this movement, comes a dainty bit of a scherzo, in which it has been said the composer intended to give an idea of a distant sleighing party, and the tinkle of the bells and the flying feet of the horses can easily be imagined by the suggestions given the listener. The allegro which makes the finale is again in sharp contrast, being written for broad and telling effects in which the brass and drums are used with freedom and give a strong coloring to the finish of this most interesting work. Upon a first hearing the symphony thus lost has something of the characteristics of the first movement in the even elaboration of its themes; but the ability shown in this varied treatment is one of the features of the work which gives it an additional interest to the musical student. There is little that is sensational in Mr. Cowen's work and much that is of such a substantial character, that it will unquestionably find its way into the accepted list of standard compositions. In the pre-entation given the work the result of careful rehearsal was quite apparent, and generally good results were achieved, save in the final movement in which the complicated treatment of the themes was the cause of considerable confusion among the players and its performance often degenerated into mere noise without any apparent musical effect. The merits of the second and third movements met with instantaneous recognition and were generally applauded by the audience. Prof. Baermann made one of his best efforts on this occasion, and, great as was the beauty of his playing in the concert, marvellous as was his mastery of the stupendous difficulties of the great Hungarian march, there was an exquisite delicacy, grace and expression in the way the piano sang the Schubert song, that made it the great charming feature of his evening's selections. The audience almost rose en masse at the conclusion of the performance of the march, and the pianist was called again and again to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause which it called forth. The Schubert and Wagner selections were almost faultlessly played, and the audience was one of the largest of the season.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows, Professor Carl Baermann being the soloist: Overture—(Alfonso and Estrella) Schubert; Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; Symphony in C minor—(Scandinavian) Frederic H. Cowen; Piano Solo, a. Der Lindenbaum, Schubert-Liszt; b. Rackoczy March, Liszt; Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg) Wagner. The concert was of unusual interest, for two reasons—one, the first performance in Boston of Mr. Cowen's symphony; the other, Professor Baermann's appearance in the famous Beethoven concerto. The symphony is the third which this composer has produced, and he is also known as the author of an opera and a number of sentimental songs, but not until this work was published did he establish any very notable reputation. Mr. Cowen is an Englishman, and his symphony has not only established itself firmly among the musicians of his own country, but has also found a place in the programmes of concerts given in the leading continental cities. Its performance on Saturday night showed it to be a strong and musicianly work, full of refinement and strength, rich in effects and striking in its use of contrasts. It is evidently destined to take a high and permanent place among the compositions of its class. The first movement—allegro moderato—is rather too long-drawn-out, and finally becomes monotonous through its lack of variety, but the second—adagio con moto—describing a summer evening on the fjord, is full of beauties and vigorous contrasts. Gloom alternates with brightness of mood, a particularly marked feature being the development of this part of the composition being the strong effects that are produced by the wooden wind instruments. Following this slow and generally sombre movement comes a light and dainty scherzo, and the symphony ends with an allegro movement in which the brasses and drums are used to give a strong and impressive finish. The work was very well played throughout, barring some blemishes and confusion in the concluding movement. The other orchestral selections were well performed. Professor Baermann played in his usual masterly style. The concerto was the one in which he made his first appearance in Boston last year when he excited to the highest pitch of enthusiasm an audience which had had no previous intimation of the remarkable quality of his playing. On Saturday evening he repeated his splendid performance and gave a perfect rendering of the great work. The other two selections were also played with supreme skill and power. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture (The Naiads), Sterndale Bennett; Aria (Il Seraglio), Mozart, Miss Abbie Whinnery; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34), Wounded Heart—Spring—(first time), Greig; songs with piano, a. Mein Herz schmückt sich, Rubinstein; b. Im Herbst, Franz, Miss Whinnery; Symphonic Poem (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo), Liszt.

Journal

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a very large audience. Cowen's Scandinavian Symphony had its first performance here on the occasion. It is scarcely a symphony in the strict sense of the word, but partakes more of the character of a rhapsody. It has but little variety in effect, and we must confess that we found it exceedingly monotonous. The opening movement is prolonged beyond any excuse to be found in the brief themes of which it is composed, and which are worked over and over again with but little change of treatment till they become almost distracting through reiteration. The slow movement is dry and dull, and is without perceivable continuity in idea, being chopped up into brief phrases, which exasperate through not having any discoverable connection with other phrases. The scherzo is quaint and pretty, but is characterized by the monotony that marks the preceding movements. The finale has more of power, brilliancy and fire, and at times is very impressive. There are some dainty outbreaks of melody here and there, but they are rapidly dismissed. We presume that we do not understand, or perhaps do not appreciate the Scandinavian elements of the symphony. We take it for granted that the local color is perfect, but we did not find it attractive. There is admirable musician-ship shown throughout. The scoring is full of beauties, particularly of a tender and graceful description, and it is not unlikely that a second hearing may open up to us other beauties in the work that were not apparent to us in a first, though we must confess we are not impressed by an overmastering enthusiasm to listen to it again. Without any desire to write disrespectfully of a seriously considered and carefully wrought work, we are, notwithstanding, moved to observe that this symphony by some means or other, constantly brought to our mind Oscar Wilde, peacock feathers, and various other suggestions of the utterly utter. Why or wherefore we cannot explain. It is doubtless very wicked and very unæsthetic to admit such a dreadful state of things, but the fact remains all the same. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, who played Beethoven's concerto in G, the work in which he made his debut in Boston. He gave a magnificent reading of it from beginning to end. Nothing more clear, more in harmony with the true spirit of the work, more broad or more artistic in conception and execution can be imagined or desired than the interpretation accorded it by Mr. Baermann. He was twice recalled at its conclusion. It is to be regretted that at the orchestra was not more in sympathy with him. It came several times very near marring the last movement, and just escaped disaster in one instance from hurrying the pace at a critical moment. Later in the evening Mr. Baermann gave an exquisite rendering of Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Der Lindenbaum," and a marvellous display of technique in a performance of Liszt's amazingly difficult arrangement of the "Rackoczy March." The latter excited a furore, and he was recalled again and again with the most stormy enthusiasm. Schubert's "Alfonso and Estrella" overture, and the introduction to Wagner's "Meistersinger" made up the rest of the programme. At the next concert the symphony will be Beethoven's, No. 6 (Pastorale), and the soloist is to be Miss Abbie Whinnery.

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The seventeenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Saturday evening, was distinguished, not only by its element of novelty, but by the high average of interest of the music presented and the general excellence of the performance. The symphony—the "Scandinavian" in C minor, by Frederic H. Cowen, was on this occasion performed for the first time in this city, although it is already well known throughout Europe, and has won for the composer a favorable continental reputation. Mr. Cowen is mainly known here by his sentimental songs, and taking into consideration his comparative youthfulness (he was born in 1852), the great ability he has shown in this product of his pen in the highest form of musical composition is a matter of surprise. The work may be described as symphonic in general form, national in spirit and largely descriptive in method. Its symphonic form is seen in the traditional succession of its several movements and the elaboration of its themes; the national characteristic, not only in the material on which it is founded—Scandinavian folksongs—but in the preservation of the quaint Northern flavor in their setting and instrumental coloring; while its descriptive method is illustrated in at least two movements—the adagio con moto, which, the programme tells us, represents a summer evening on the fiord, and the scherzo, which, it is said, is intended to picture a merry sleighing party. The first movement consists essentially of changes rung on the subject and counter-subject, of a singularly sweet and plaintive minor melody, which is never lost sight of from beginning to end of the movement, but is presented in a constantly changing light by varied figuration and instrumental coloring. The movement is, however, so long that its essential monotony results in positive wearisomeness. The description of a summer evening on the fiord, which follows in the second movement, is strangely beautiful. The weird enchantment which we may imagine to rest on such scene has been so happily caught, and even the serene silence of the hour so skillfully suggested by the fragmentary strains of music supposed to be borne on the air from a distant pleasure-party, that one may readily attribute to Mr. Cowen very high possibilities in descriptive music of the best class. The scherzo—the sleighing-party scene—is hardly less effective in a different direction. A striking feature of this movement is the happy use of muted strings to produce, not a soft, dreamy effect, but a peculiar color well in harmony with the spirit of the scene. The finale again introduces the melody of the first movement, but in distorted form and set off with harsh, often dissonant, harmonies, with an effect stern, sombre and even fierce, and the movement develops to a high degree of power of its peculiar kind. The scoring of the work throughout abounds in beauties such as are to be expected of a composer highly endowed and already well versed in his art. The work is one of those paradoxical creations that leave a deep impression almost as a result of the very iteration, which, after a certain time, produce weariness, but at last so saturate the listener with its spirit as to win his sympathy in spite of himself. So far as we may judge with our unfamiliarity with the work, it was played admirably, even brilliantly.

The other selections for orchestra alone were Schubert's "Alfonso and Estrella" overture, which opened the programme, and the introduction to "The Master-Singers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, with which the concert was brought to its close. Both were very finely given, but the performance of the Schubert overture is deserving of special praise from its delicacy, clearness and nice management of light and shade. It is a peculiar pleasure to acknowledge that in this instance no occasion was given for complaint of the lack of tonal agreement between the wind and strings. Mr. Carl Baermann, for the third time in the present series, was the soloist of the evening. With the orchestra, he played Beethoven's fourth concerto, with which he made such a triumph on his first appearance in Boston at a symphony concert last season. His performance on Saturday night was but a repetition of that triumph, but it was made additionally interesting by the introduction of cadenzas original with the pianist. These cadenzas are a new illustration of the sterling artistic qualities of the pianist. Brief and unpretentious, they do not presume to "gild the refined gold" of Beethoven's creation, but are rather elaborations of the themes of the concerto, just florid enough to meet the requirements of a cadenza, but not so discursive as to distract attention from the main thought. There is nothing in them to suggest to one unfamiliar with the concerto that the pianist is playing a single note not written by the master. Mr. Baermann's other selections were Liszt's transcription of Schubert's song, "Der Lindenbaum," and the same composer's setting of the "Rackoczy" march, both of which were performed with great brilliancy. As usual, Mr. Baermann's efforts were rewarded with storms of applause.

For the next concert Miss Abbie Whinnery will be the soloist, and the performance will be as follows:—

Overture ("The Nalads"), Sterndale Bennet; aria ("Il Seraglio"), Mozart; symphony in F ("Pastorale"), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34), [first time], Grieg; songs with piano—(a) "Mein Herz schmückt sich," Rubinstein; (b) "Im Herbst," Franz; symphonic poem (Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo"), Liszt.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture—(Alfonso and Estrella).....Schubert.
Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58.....Beethoven.
Allegro moderato—Andante con moto—Rondo—
(Cadenzas by Carl Baermann.)
Symphony in C minor—(Scandinavian).....Frederic H. Cowen.
Allegro moderato ma con moto—
Adagio con moto. (A Summer Evening on the Fiord.)—
Scherzo—Finale—
(New. First time.)
Piano Solo.
a. Der Lindenbaum.....Schubert-Liszt.
b. Rackoczy March.....Liszt.
Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg)....Wagner

The concert of last night was interesting from first to last, and showed very few of the errors which have characterized some of the recent ones. The overture was very daintily given, especially in its charming flute and violin figures, and put every one into the best of humor to enjoy the feast that followed. Professor Baermann played the Beethoven concerto in a manner that almost distances criticism. It was in this work that he first made his Boston appearance, at the Philharmonic Concert last season. Then the enthusiasm was beyond description, since only a fair pianist was expected, and the audience suddenly discovered that they were listening to a genius. There was none of the element of surprise apparent yesterday, and therefore none of the wild applause which greeted the first performance, but there was a cordial greeting for the great pianist and a great (if quieter) pleasure evident in the audience. Every portion of the performance reached the former high level. The same clear double trill against the scales, the rhythmic sforzando of the bass against the triplet runs, the excellent grading of dynamic force, the same attention to ensemble, and avoidance of undue prominence in the piano part; all these characterized the performance of yesterday as they did that of last night. The cadenzas by Professor Baermann are thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the work, being chiefly elaborated from the themes themselves. The second one, in the last movement, is short, as Beethoven wished it to be, but seems the finer of the two. The orchestra was generally thorough in the accompaniment and in the tutti, save that in the first passages there was too even a parte kept up, and the sforzando effects were lost, and in the finale of the andante which leads directly to the Rondo the attack was not prompt and steady. The two piano solos awakened real enthusiasm. In the last one the performer exhibited great power, and in Schubert's delicate melody the phrasing was marvellous. Cowen's Symphony seemed to us a fine work, full of tact, of talent, of color, such a work in short as might be attributed to a composer like Raff. Those who know the composer only by his sentimental songs, which are weaker than Sullivan's, must be surprised to find their composer succeeding in so much higher a flight. The first movement seems a trifle too much developed, its length being somewhat monotonous. During its progress two ladies in the hall were borne out in a fainting condition, but we doubt whether this can be attributed to the music, the attention to which, however, it somewhat interrupted. The second movement is full of strongest contrasts. At times the music is frightfully sombre, as if the shadow of the forbidding crags of Norway were upon it, and then suddenly it emerges into joy and sunlight again, and the auditor unconsciously draws a sigh of relief. The woodwind is used in all manners in this movement, and throughout the whole work the sombre effects are chiefly produced by bassoons and oboes in various combination. The more plaintive and resigned sadness of the North (visible in almost all of the folksongs) is also very constantly present in the symphony. But the other side, the wild, almost brutal hilarity, as represented in the Hallings of Norway, or the Polish Bucchanal of Chopin, is scarcely touched upon. We expected this in the Scherzo, but that had a light tripping movement, with muted strings, of much more subdued quality. The themes of the last movement are very fine and promise great development, but just here the durchführungssatz is cut short. The introduction from Die Meistersinger was loudly, but not always clearly played. The blending of the themes was at times cloudy, and the violinists were by no means as spirited at the last part as at the beginning.

The next concert offers the following programme:

Overture, (The Nalads).....Sterndale Bennet.
Aria, (Il Seraglio).....Mozart.
Miss Abbie Whinnery.
Symphony in F, (Pastorale) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven.
Two Melodies for Strings, (op. 34).....Grieg.
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)
Songs with Piano.
a. Mein Herz schmückt sich.....Rubinstein.
b. Im Herbst.....Franz.
Miss Whinnery.
Symphonic Poem, (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo).....Liszt

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme, which had been rehearsed on Friday afternoon was performed in Music Hall on Saturday evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, for its seventeenth concert, in the presence of a large and interested audience: Overture (Alfonso and Estrella) Schubert; Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; Symphony in C minor—(Scandinavian) Frederic H. Cowen; Piano Solo, a. Der Lindenbaum, Schubert-Liszt; b. Rackoczy March, Liszt; Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg) Wagner. The concert proved one of uncommon interest and was unquestionably the fullest in excellence of any in the series thus far. The opening Schubert overture was delightfully given with scarcely a blemish throughout the delicate and clear tones of the orchestra. This was the more notable and gratifying from the fact that the work of Mr. Henschel's orchestra has not hitherto shown to such excellence in all its performances this season. Similar good work was also done in the symphony, which was very finely rendered for the most part, and which was the event of most interest to the audience from its novelty. It had its first production in this city, and proved full worthy of the high praise bestowed upon it in Europe. The composer, Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, is a young Englishman, tolerably well known hitherto as a writer of songs. This symphony is only his third composition in the highest ranks of music, but it has firmly established itself among musicians of ability in all quarters, and promises to hold its strong position in the future. Its descriptive movements were especially and peculiarly beautiful, the second, adagio con moto, telling of a summer evening on the the Fiord, and the third, scherzo, describing a merry sleighing party. The opening and closing movements were likewise of great beauty of expression, though the extreme length and similarity of the former in its progress finally became somewhat tedious. Professor Carl Baermann's piano playing displayed the same master spirit and hand that first made him famous in this city a year ago, when he played the same concerto before an audience who did not know him till then, but who bestowed upon him the most rapturous praise for his magnificent performance. Mr. Baerman's Liszt selections were also given with great brilliancy, and tumultuously applauded. Wagner's Master-Singers of Nuremberg, splendidly done by the orchestra, brought the concert to a close, and every one of the large audience seemed satisfied. For the next concert Miss Abbie Whinnery will be the soloist, and the performance will be as follows:—Overture ("The Nalads") Sterndale Bennet; aria ("Il Seraglio"), Mozart; symphony in F ("Pastorale"), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34) [first time], Grieg; songs with piano—(a) "Mein Herz schmückt sich," Rubinstein; (b) "Im Herbst," Franz; symphonic poem (Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo"), Liszt.

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The seventeenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Saturday evening, was distinguished, not only by its element of novelty, but by the high average of interest of the music presented and the general excellence of the performance. The symphony—the "Scandinavian" in C minor, by Frederic H. Cowen, was on this occasion performed for the first time in this city, although it is already well known throughout Europe, and has won for the composer a favorable continental reputation. Mr. Cowen is mainly known here by his sentimental songs, and taking into consideration his comparative youthfulness (he was born in 1852), the great ability he has shown in this product of his pen in the highest form of musical composition is a matter of surprise. The work may be described as symphonic in general form, national in spirit and largely descriptive in method. Its symphonic form is seen in the traditional succession of its several movements and the elaboration of its themes; the national characteristic, not only in the material on which it is founded—Scandinavian folksongs—but in the preservation of the quaint Northern flavor in their setting and instrumental coloring; while its descriptive method is illustrated in at least two movements—the adagio con moto, which, the programme tells us, represents a summer evening on the fiord, and the scherzo, which, it is said, is intended to picture a merry sleighing party. The first movement consists essentially of changes rung on the subject and counter-subject, of a singularly sweet and plaintive minor melody, which is never lost sight of from beginning to end of the movement, but is presented in a constantly changing light by varied figuration and instrumental coloring. The movement is, however, so long that its essential monotony results in positive wearisomeness. The description of a summer evening on the fiord, which follows in the second movement, is strangely beautiful. The weird enchantment which we may imagine to rest on such scene has been so happily caught, and even the serene silence of the hour so skillfully suggested by the fragmentary strains of music supposed to be borne on the air from a distant pleasure-party, that one may readily attribute to Mr. Cowen very high possibilities in descriptive music of the best class. The scherzo—the sleighing-party scene—is hardly less effective in a different direction. A striking feature of this movement is the happy use of muted strings to produce, not a soft, dreamy effect, but a peculiar color well in harmony with the spirit of the scene. The finale again introduces the melody of the first movement, but in distorted form and set off with harsh, often dissonant, harmonies, with an effect stern, sombre and even fierce, and the movement develops to a high degree of power of its peculiar kind. The scoring of the work throughout abounds in beauties such as are to be expected of a composer highly endowed and already well versed in his art. The work is one of those paradoxical creations that leave a deep impression almost as a result of the very iteration, which, after a certain time, produce weariness, but at last so saturate the listener with its spirit as to win his sympathy in spite of himself. So far as we may judge with our unfamiliarity with the work, it was played admirably, even brilliantly.

The other selections for orchestra alone were Schubert's "Alfonso and Estrella" overture, which opened the programme, and the introduction to "The Master-Singers of Nuremberg," by Wagner, with which the concert was brought to its close. Both were very finely given, but the performance of the Schubert overture is deserving of special praise from its delicacy, clearness and nice management of light and shade. It is a peculiar pleasure to acknowledge that in this instance no occasion was given for complaint of the lack of tonal agreement between the wind and strings. Mr. Carl Baermann, for the third time in the present series, was the soloist of the evening. With the orchestra, he played Beethoven's fourth concerto, with which he made such a triumph on his first appearance in Boston at a symphony concert last season. His performance on Saturday night was but a repetition of that triumph, but it was made additionally interesting by the introduction of cadenzas original with the pianist. These cadenzas are a new illustration of the sterling artistic qualities of the pianist. Brief and unpretentious, they do not presume to "gild the refined gold" of Beethoven's creation, but are rather elaborations of the themes of the concerto, just florid enough to meet the requirements of a cadenza, but not so discursive as to distract attention from the main thought. There is nothing in them to suggest to one unfamiliar with the concerto that the pianist is playing a single note not written by the master. Mr. Baermann's other selections were Liszt's transcription of Schubert's song, "Der Lindenbaum," and the same composer's setting of the "Rackoczy" march, both of which were performed with great brilliancy. As usual, Mr. Baermann's efforts were rewarded with storms of applause.

For the next concert Miss Abbie Whinnery will be the soloist, and the performance will be as follows:—

Overture ("The Naiads"), Sterndale Bennett; aria ("Il Seraglio"), Mozart; symphony in F ("Pastorale"), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34), (first time), Grieg; songs with piano—(a) "Mein Herz schmückt sich," Rubinstein; (b) "Im Herbst," Franz; symphonic poem (Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo"), Liszt.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture—(Alfonso and Estrella).....Schubert.
Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58.....Beethoven.
Allegro moderato—Andante con moto—Rondo—
(Cadenzas by Carl Baermann.)
Symphony in C minor—(Scandinavian)....Frederic H. Cowen
Allegro moderato ma con moto—
Adagio con moto. (A Summer Evening on the Fiord).—
Scherzo—Finale—
(New. First time.)

Piano Solo.
a. Der Lindenbaum.....Schubert-Liszt.
b. Rackoczy March.....Liszt.
Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg)....Wagner

The concert of last night was interesting from first to last, and showed very few of the errors which have characterized some of the recent ones. The overture was very daintily given, especially in its charming flute and violin figures, and put every one into the best of humor to enjoy the feast that followed. Professor Baermann played the Beethoven concerto in a manner that almost distances criticism. It was in this work that he first made his Boston appearance, at the Philharmonic Concert last season. Then the enthusiasm was beyond description, since only a fair pianist was expected, and the audience suddenly discovered that they were listening to a genius. There was none of the element of surprise apparent yesterday, and therefore none of the wild applause which greeted the first performance, but there was a cordial greeting for the great pianist and a great (if quieter) pleasure evident in the audience. Every portion of the performance reached the former high level. The same clear double trill against the scales, the rhythmic sforzando of the bass against the triplet runs, the excellent grading of dynamic force, the same attention to ensemble, and avoidance of undue prominence in the piano part; all these characterized the performance of yesterday as they did that of last night. The cadenzas by Professor Baermann are thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the work, being chiefly elaborated from the themes themselves. The second one, in the last movement, is short, as Beethoven wished it to be, but seems the finer of the two. The orchestra was generally thorough in the accompaniment and in the tutti, save that in the first passages there was too even a parte kept up, and the sforzando effects were lost, and in the finale of the andante which leads directly to the Rondo the attack was not prompt and steady. The two piano solos awakened real enthusiasm. In the last one the performer exhibited great power, and in Schubert's delicate melody the phrasing was marvellous. Cowen's Symphony seemed to us a fine work, full of tact, of talent, of color, such a work in short as might be attributed to a composer like Raff. Those who know the composer only by his sentimental songs, which are weaker than Sullivan's, must be surprised to find their composer succeeding in so much higher a flight. The first movement seems a trifle too much developed, its length being somewhat monotonous. During its progress two ladies in the hall were borne out in a fainting condition, but we doubt whether this can be attributed to the music, the attention to which, however, it somewhat interrupted. The second movement is full of strongest contrasts. At times the music is frightfully sombre, as if the shadow of the forbidding crags of Norway were upon it, and then suddenly it emerges into joy and sunlight again, and the auditor unconsciously draws a sigh of relief. The woodwind is used in all manners in this movement, and throughout the whole work the sombre effects are chiefly produced by bassoons and oboes in various combination. The more plaintive and resigned sadness of the North (visible in almost all of the folksongs) is also very constantly present in the symphony. But the other side, the wild, almost brutal hilarity, as represented in the Hallings of Norway, or the Polish Bacchanal of Chopin, is scarcely touched upon. We expected this in the Scherzo, but that had a light tripping movement, with muted strings, of much more subdued quality. The themes of the last movement are very fine and promise great development, but just here the durchführungsatz is cut short. The introduction from Die Meistersinger was loudly, but not always clearly played. The blending of the themes was at times cloudy, and the violinists were by no means as spirited at the last part as at the beginning.

The next concert offers the following programme:

Overture, (The Naiads).....Sterndale Bennett.
Aria, (Il Seraglio).....Mozart.
Miss Abbie Whinnery.
Symphony in F, (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven.
Two Melodies for Strings, (op. 34.).....Grieg.
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)
Songs with Piano.
a. Mein Herz schmückt sich.....Rubinstein.
b. Im Herbst.....Franz.
Miss Whinnery.
Symphonic Poem, (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo.).....Liszt

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme, which had been rehearsed on Friday afternoon was performed in Music Hall on Saturday evening, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, for its seventeenth concert, in the presence of a large and interested audience: Overture (Alfonso and Estrella) Schubert; Concerto for Pianoforte in G, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; Symphony in C minor—(Scandinavian) Frederic H. Cowen; Piano Solo, a. Der Lindenbaum, Schubert-Liszt; b. Rackoczy March, Liszt; Introduction—(The Master-Singers of Nuremberg) Wagner. The concert proved one of uncommon interest and was unquestionably the fullest in excellence of any in the series thus far. The opening Schubert overture was delightfully given with scarcely a blemish throughout the delicate and clear tones of the orchestra. This was the more notable and gratifying from the fact that the work of Mr. Henschel's orchestra has not hitherto shown to such excellence in all its performances this season. Similar good work was also done in the symphony, which was very finely rendered for the most part, and which was the event of most interest to the audience from its novelty. It had its first production in this city, and proved full worthy of the high praise bestowed upon it in Europe. The composer, Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, is a young Englishman, tolerably well known hitherto as a writer of songs. This symphony is only his third composition in the highest ranks of music, but it has firmly established itself among musicians of ability in all quarters, and promises to hold its strong position in the future. Its descriptive movements were especially and peculiarly beautiful, the second, adagio con moto, telling of a summer evening on the the Fiord, and the third, scherzo, describing a merry sleighing party. The opening and closing movements were likewise of great beauty of expression, though the extreme length and similarity of the former in its progress finally became somewhat tedious. Professor Carl Baermann's piano playing displayed the same master spirit and hand that first made him famous in this city a year ago, when he played the same concerto before an audience who did not know him till then, but who bestowed upon him the most rapturous praise for his magnificent performance. Mr. Baermann's Liszt selections were also given with great brilliancy, and tumultuously applauded. Wagner's Master-Singers of Nuremberg, splendidly done by the orchestra, brought the concert to a close, and every one of the large audience seemed satisfied. For the next concert Miss Abbie Whinnery will be the soloist, and the performance will be as follows:—Overture ("The Naiads") Sterndale Bennett; aria ("Il Seraglio"), Mozart; symphony in F ("Pastorale"), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34) (first time), Grieg; songs with piano—(a) "Mein Herz schmückt sich," Rubinstein; (b) "Im Herbst," Franz; symphonic poem (Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo"), Liszt.

174

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (The Naiads.) . . . STERNDALÉ BENNETT.

ARIA. (Il Seraglio.) . . . MOZART.

SYMPHONY in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68. . . BEETHOVEN.

Awaking of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. (Allegro ma non troppo.)—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto.)—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro.) Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

TWO MELODIES FOR STRINGS. (op. 34.) / . . . GRIEG.

Wounded Heart.—Spring.—

(First time.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. MEIN HERZ SCHMÜCKT SICH. . . RUBINSTEIN.

b. IM HERBST. . . FRANZ.

OVERTURE. (Part du Diable.) . . . AUBER.

SOLOIST :

MISS ABBIE WHINNERY.

175

ARIA. (Il Seraglio.)

MOZART.

Che pur aspro al cuore,
Nè scenda il dolore,
Io deriderlo saprò.
No, non ha da tremare,
Chi sol sempre amare
L'idol suo fedel penso.
Ma in tal momento
La crudelta
Al mio tormento
Cangiar clovrà

Ah! sei risoluto,
Ah! tutt'è perduto
Ogui pena sceglierò
Altier va pur, grida
La possa tua, sfida
Col morir mi salverò

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. MY HEART IS BRIGHT WITH THEE.

RUBINSTEIN.

My heart is bright with thee
As heav'n itself is with the sun's orb bright;
Thou art its light, and without thee,
Plung'd is it all in darksome night.
It, like the world,
When darkness o'er it hangs, its glory all conceals,
And only when the sunlight smiles,
What beauty soft it hath, reveals.

b. IN AUTUMN.

FRANZ.

All brown is the heath, once blooming and red,
The birch tree is bare, in green 'twas once clad;
Once a hand was in mine, now lonely I pine.
Woe, woe on the season autumnal and sad!
The roses, once blooming, all faded they lie;
How sweet was the flower, its fragrance is fled;
Once a hand plucked with mine, now lonely I pine;
Dry is the garland, and withered and dead.
Oh! drear is the world, that once was so fair;
I once was so rich, my wealth is all fled.
A heart once was mine, now lonely I pine!
My love is false, oh would I were dead!

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture. (The Naiads.).....Sterndale Bennett.
Aria. (Il Seraglio.).....Mozart.
Miss Abbie Whinnery.
Symphony in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven.
Two Melodies for Strings. (op. 34.).....Grieg.
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)

Songs with Piano.
a. Mein Herz Schmücket sich.....Rubinstein.
b. Im Herbst.....Franz.
Miss Whinnery.

Overture. (Part du Diable.).....Auber.

The concert of last night presented, as will be seen from the above, a programme which was rather pleasing than profound. In the pastoral symphony and in the eighth symphony Beethoven reveals the humor that lay deep down in his rugged nature. The sixth symphony, however, reveals this in the strongest colors, and is besides interesting from the fact that it is the first great piece of programme music in this form. The third symphony, to be sure, made a start in this direction, in giving a fixed bent to the imagination, and in picturing the emotions and characteristics of a man. This was a subjective species of tone picture. In the sixth, Beethoven gives a more objective picture, although he specifically denies this intention in calling the work "rather a record of impressions than a picture;" yet after the first movement this scheme seems to have been abandoned, since the song of the various birds. In the second movement the playing of the village band, the drunken bassoonist, the quarrel among the dancers (if it does mean that) and the thunderstorm are as photographic as can well be.

The thunderstorm is a marvel in composition, when one recalls that, spite of the musical (?) tempests that have been given us by Berlioz, Saint Saëns and others in recent times, this movement, with its slender orchestral scoring of strings, wood-wind, trombones and tympani, never seems inadequate or puerile. The performance of the work was somewhat unequal. A large orchestra is at a disadvantage in this work, for, save in the final movements, it requires but little volume of tone. The first movement was the worst, having but little lightness and geniality, and the strings being much too heavy in their dainty figures. The bird-calls and imitations of the second movement were neatly done. The oboe and the bassoon did well in the third movement as far as the rustic hand work went, but the brilliant arpeggio work was unclear. The contrabasses and 'cellos were superb in the thunderstorm. The third movement was generally the best, but the rest calls for little praise.

The two melodies by Grieg might have been changed at birth, so far as application of title went, and no one would have been the wiser. The last was by far the best composition however, and both were well rendered. The singing of Miss Whinnery had both merits and defects. Her voice has gained much in the lower and middle register since she left Boston, but the higher notes seemed forced and unnatural. In the Mozart aria she was overweighted, although her trills and staccato runs were commendable. But her best success was attained in the two lieder which she sang with true feeling, and in which Mr. Henschel's accompaniment, as usual, formed a delightful part of the picture.

The next programme is a very important one in its selections, as will be seen from the appended list:

Overture. (Summertime's Dream).....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.....Rubinstein.
Mr. H. G. Tucker.
Symphony in B flat, (1816.).....Schubert.
Piano Solo. a. Largo.....Bach—Saint-Saëns.
b. Etude C major, op. 23t.....Rubinstein.
Mrs. Tucker.
Symphonic Poem, (Tasso,).....Liszt.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening before the smallest audience of the season. The programme was as follows, Miss Abbie Whinnery, soprano, being the soloist: Overture ("The Naiads"), Sterndale Bennett; aria ("Il Seraglio"), Mozart; symphony in F ("Pastorale"), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34), Grieg; songs with piano, a. Mein Herz Schmücket sich, Rubinstein; b. Im Herbst, Franz; overture ("Part du Diable"), Auber. Some very excellent work was done by the orchestra in the performance of the instrumental numbers in the programme above given. Bennett's beautiful overture was most gracefully and charmingly played, and the rendering of the two Grieg melodies for strings was not only the best work of the evening but nearly the best that this organization has ever done. Auber's overture, also, was given in a bright and spirited way. The symphony, also, was in general well performed, although, except in the last movement, there seemed to be an excess of power employed. This, however, could not well have been avoided in an orchestra of such size. The third movement was played the best, but throughout the work there was manifested commendable feeling and steadiness of execution. Miss Whinnery created a fairly favorable impression, although her voice was not so pleasant in the higher as in the lower notes of her range. She used it, however, with much power and considerable taste.

The programme for the concert next Saturday evening is an interesting one, and is as follows: Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn; Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; Symphony in B flat (1816), Schubert, ms. first time; Piano Solo—a. Largo, Bach—Saint-Saëns; b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; Symphonic Poem (Tasso), Liszt. Mr. H. G. Tucker will be the soloist on this occasion.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a very clear and graceful rendering of Bennett's lovely overture, "The Naiads." The symphony was Beethoven's, in F, the "Pastoral," which was interpreted exceedingly well on the whole, and with much greater steadiness and clearness than were accorded it last season. The opening movement was perhaps taken somewhat too fast, but the time in which the rest of the work was taken left but little if any fault to be found. The andante was admirably played, and the concluding allegro was also given with much largeness of sentiment and fervor of expression. Two charming melodies for strings by Grieg followed. Both are in a sad vein, but they are full of beauty, tender grace and pleasing originality. In the playing of these selections the orchestra did its finest work of the evening. The concert ended with Auber's bright and spirited overture to "Le Part du Diable." The soloist was Miss Abbie Whinnery, whose distinguishing features were a penetrating voice, a copious use of portamento, and one of the most elaborately gorgeous and strikingly peculiar costumes we have ever seen on the concert stage. At the next concert a symphony by Schubert in B-flat, still in MS., will be given for the first time here. The soloist will be Mr. H. G. Tucker, who will perform Rubinstein's D-minor, concerto No. 4, and a group of smaller pieces.

ARIA. (Il Seraglio.)

MOZART.

Che pur aspro al cuore,
Nè scenda il dolore,
Io deriderlo saprò.
No, non ha da tremare,
Chi sol sempre amare
L'idol suo fedel penso.
Ma in tal momento
La crudelta
Al mio tormento
Cangiar dovra

Ah! sei risoluto,
Ah! tutt'è perduto
Ogù pena sceglierò
Altier va pur, grida
La possa tua, sfida
Col morir mi salverò

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. MY HEART IS BRIGHT WITH THEE.

RUBINSTEIN.

My heart is bright with thee
As heav'n itself is with the sun's orb bright:
Thou art its light, and without thee,
Plung'd is it all in darksome night.

It, like the world,

When darkness o'er it hangs, its glory all conceals,
And only when the sunlight smiles,
What beauty soft it hath, reveals.

b. IN AUTUMN.

FRANZ.

All brown is the heath, once blooming and red,
The birch tree is bare, in green 'twas once clad:
Once a hand was in mine, now lonely I pine.
Woe, woe on the season autumnal and sad!

The roses, once blooming, all faded they lie:
How sweet was the flower, its fragrance is fled:
Once a hand plucked with mine, now lonely I pine:
Dry is the garland, and withered and dead.

Oh! drear is the world, that once was so fair:
I once was so rich, my wealth is all fled,
A heart once was mine, now lonely I pine!
My love is false, oh would I were dead!

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, (The Naiads,).....Sterndale Bennett.
Aria, (Il Seraglio,).....Mozart.
Miss Abbie Whinnery.
Symphony in F, (Pastorale,) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven.
Two Melodies for Strings, (op. 34,).....Grieg.
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)

Songs with Piano.
a. Mein Herz Schmücket sich.....Rubinstein.
b. Im Herbst.....Franz.
Miss Whinnery.

Overture, (Part du Diable,).....Auber.

The concert of last night presented, as will be seen from the above, a programme which was rather pleasing than profound. In the pastoral symphony and in the eighth symphony Beethoven reveals the humor that lay deep down in his rugged nature. The sixth symphony, however, reveals this in the strongest colors, and is besides interesting from the fact that it is the first great piece of programme music in this form. The third symphony, to be sure, made a start in this direction, in giving a fixed bent to the imagination, and in picturing the emotions and characteristics of a man. This was a subjective species of tone picture. In the sixth, Beethoven gives a more objective picture, although he specifically denies this intention in calling the work "rather a record of impressions than a picture;" yet after the first movement this scheme seems to have been abandoned, since the song of the various birds. In the second movement the playing of the village band, the drunken bassoonist, the quarrel among the dancers (if it does mean that) and the thunderstorm are as photographic as can well be.

The thunderstorm is a marvel in composition, when one recollects that, spite of the musical (?) tempests that have been given us by Berlioz, Saint Saëns and others in recent times, this movement, with its slender orchestral scoring of strings, wood-wind, trombones and tympani, never seems inadequate or puerile. The performance of the work was somewhat unequal. A large orchestra is at a disadvantage in this work, for, save in the final movements, it requires but little volume of tone. The first movement was the worst, having but little lightness and geniality, and the strings being much too heavy in their dainty figures. The bird-calls and imitations of the second movement were neatly done. The oboe and the bassoon did well in the third movement as far as the rustic hand work went, but the brilliant arpeggio work was unclear. The contrabasses and cellos were superb in the thunderstorm. The third movement was generally the best, but the rest calls for little praise.

The two melodies by Grieg might have been changed at birth, so far as application of title went, and no one would have been the wiser. The last was by far the best composition however, and both were well rendered. The singing of Miss Whinnery had both merits and defects. Her voice has gained much in the lower and middle register since she left Boston, but the higher notes seemed forced and unnatural. In the Mozart aria she was overweighted, although her trills and staccato runs were commendable. But her best success was attained in the two lieder which she sang with true feeling, and in which Mr. Henschel's accompaniment, as usual, formed a delightful part of the picture.

The next programme is a very important one in its selections, as will be seen from the appended list:

Overture, (Summernight's Dream,).....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.....Rubinstein.
Mr. H. G. Tucker.
Symphony in B flat, (1816,).....Schubert.
a. Largo.....Bach—Saint-Saëns.
b. Etude C major, op. 23t.....Rubinstein.
Mrs. Tucker.
Symphonic Poem, (Tasso,).....Liszt.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening before the smallest audience of the season. The programme was as follows, Miss Abbie Whinnery, soprano, being the soloist: Overture ("The Naiads"), Sterndale Bennett; aria ("Il Seraglio"), Mozart; symphony in F ("Pastorale"), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings (op. 34), Grieg; songs with piano, a. Mein Herz Schmücket sich, Rubinstein; b. Im Herbst, Franz; overture ("Part du Diable"), Auber. Some very excellent work was done by the orchestra in the performance of the instrumental numbers in the programme above given. Bennett's beautiful overture was most gracefully and charmingly played, and the rendering of the two Grieg melodies for strings was not only the best work of the evening but nearly the best that this organization has ever done. Auber's overture, also, was given in a bright and spirited way. The symphony, also, was in general well performed, although, except in the last movement, there seemed to be an excess of power employed. This, however, could not well have been avoided in an orchestra of such size. The third movement was played the best, but throughout the work there was manifested commendable feeling and steadiness of execution. Miss Whinnery created a fairly favorable impression, although her voice was not so pleasant in the higher as in the lower notes of her range. She used it, however, with much power and considerable taste.

The programme for the concert next Saturday evening is an interesting one, and is as follows: Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn; Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; Symphony in B flat (1816), Schubert, ms. first time; Piano Solo—a. Largo, Bach—Saint-Saëns; b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; Symphonic Poem (Tasso), Liszt. Mr. H. G. Tucker will be the soloist on this occasion.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a very clear and graceful rendering of Bennett's lovely overture, "The Naiads." The symphony was Beethoven's, in F, the "Pastoral," which was interpreted exceedingly well on the whole, and with much greater steadiness and clearness than were accorded it last season. The opening movement was perhaps taken somewhat too fast, but the time in which the rest of the work was taken left but little if any fault to be found. The andante was admirably played, and the concluding allegro was also given with much largeness of sentiment and fervor of expression. Two charming melodies for strings by Grieg followed. Both are in a sad vein, but they are full of beauty, tender grace and pleasing originality. In the playing of these selections the orchestra did its finest work of the evening. The concert ended with Auber's bright and spirited overture to "Le Part du Diable." The soloist was Miss Abbie Whinnery, whose distinguishing features were a penetrating voice, a copious use of portamento, and one of the most elaborately gorgeous and strikingly peculiar costumes we have ever seen on the concert stage. At the next concert a symphony by Schubert in B-flat, still in MS., will be given for the first time here. The soloist will be Mr. H. G. Tucker, who will perform Rubinstein's D-minor, concerto No. 4, and a group of smaller pieces.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony concert in Music Hall last evening had the smallest attendance of the season. Miss Abbie Whinnery was the soloist. She sang several selections and was recalled, but her voice was not particularly pleasing. Two melodies for strings by Grieg were played here for the first time. They are delicate and pretty and were nicely played. The symphony was Beethoven's sixth—the "Pastorale." It was played very well, with but little roughness. The programme for next week is as follows: Overture (Summer Night's Dream) Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; symphony in B flat (1816), Schubert, (M. S. first time); piano solo, a. Largo, Bach, Saint Saens; b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; symphony poem (Tasso), Lamento e Trionfo, Liszt. Soloist, Mr. Hiram G. Tucker.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eighteenth concert, given last Saturday evening, in the Music Hall, brought the following programme:

Overture, "The Naiads".....Sterndale Bennett
Aria from "Il Seraglio".....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastoral) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven
Two melodies for strings (op. 34).....Grieg
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)

Songs with Pianoforte—
a. Mein Herz schmückt sich.....Rubinstein
b. Im Herbst.....Franz
Overture to "La Part du Diable".....Auber
Miss Abbie Whinnery was the singer.

Bennet's ever-charming overture was capitally given. We are tempted to call the playing of the Pastoral Symphony the best performance of a large classic work that Mr. Henschel and his orchestra have yet given us. The tempi were admirable in every respect. The peasants' dance, in the third movement, was taken with a moderation which had the double advantage of giving the movement its true rustic character (without prejudice to its sprightliness), and of allowing the horn player to give his not easy passages with absolute clearness and smoothness. All the beauties of the Andante ("By the Brookside") and of the Finale were made the most of in a thoroughly genial way. Mr. Henschel, this time, succeeded fully in impressing his fine conception of the work upon the orchestra, and in making them present it with security and in perfect sympathy with himself. Grieg's pretty little pair of string pieces were gracefully played, and made a charming impression; and Auber's thoroughly delightful overture was enjoyed, as it deserved to be, by all. It is well for our public to hear such works adequately given from time to time, if only to appreciate what a man of real genius can do in a light, sparkling vein.

Miss Whinnery sang the Mozart air with true musicianly feeling, and gave the songs with pianoforte accompaniment in a way that one would fain call perfect. All the poetry of the Franz song was made patent at once so feelingly and so musically that for once we forgot the huge size of the Music Hall and enjoyed the beautiful little composition as if listening to it in a parlor. Transcript

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening presented the following programme: Overture, "The Naiads," Sterndale Bennett; Aria, "Il Seraglio," Mozart, Miss Whinnery; Symphony in F, "Pastorale," No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings, op. 34, Grieg, (Wounded Heart—Spring), first time; Songs with piano—a, "Mein Herz schmückt sich," Rubinstein; b, "Im Herbst," Franz, Miss Whinnery; Overture "Part du Diable," Auber. A rather lighter list than usual. I did not quite like the Pastoral symphony. Such a work is not at its best with a large orchestra and a heavy force of strings, such as Mr. Henschel has under him. The first movement was coarse and heavy, and had not the Germüthlichkeit of Beethoven's thought. The third and fourth movements were better, but scarcely as good as the work of the earlier part of the season.

The light overtures, both were interesting and pleasant, and the second of Grieg's melodies was very beautiful, but there was scarcely any connection between the music and the title. Miss Abbie Whinnery sang the two lieder with true artistic feeling, and with a rich and pure voice. She has gained power in the lower and middle register, but the highest notes are not very agreeable, as was proven in the Mozart aria, in which, although the trill and staccato work was good, she seemed overweighted. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments to the lieder were perfect.

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

In these days, when composers of the highest reputation so often lend their genius to the production of avowedly descriptive music, the value of which, as a distinct class of composition, is so variously estimated by different tastes, and differently educated minds, the only serious effort in this direction by Beethoven possesses an interest even beyond what it excited when it was yet a novelty. In including Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony among descriptive music we, of course, use the term in its largest sense, which covers not merely imitative music, but the musical expression of emotions awakened by objects and scenes of the material world. Every one knows that Beethoven intended this symphony to be "more an expression of feeling than a painting," and yet every one can discern more than one purely imitative effect, notably the imitation of the bird notes introduced into that exquisite idyl, the "Scene by the brook." We are not ashamed to say that for us the enjoyment of a composition is enhanced by the composer's hints of its purpose and of the meaning of individual parts, provided only that it possess a purely musical interest independently of any explanation not inherent in its own structure. Schumann's glorious B flat symphony, for instance, needs not the slightest explanation to be heard with extreme delight, and yet there is a new element of interest in listening to it, when one learns, as is now generally known, that the composer privately acknowledged that it was intended as an idealized picture of spring. In listening to the work in the light of this suggestion, one gets a clearer view of the composer's power of translating definite emotions into musical language, while none of its purely musical beauties are dimmed thereby. Beethoven in his "Pastoral" symphony has gone much farther than Schumann in the direction of suggesting material things, but in so doing he has furnished only a new illustration of his greatness in the fact that he has been able to enter so boldly into the domain of "programme" music without degrading his genius one whit. What a world-wide difference there is, for instance, in his treatment of the bird solo, as we may call it, from the cheap device resorted to by Massenet in his descriptive piece, performed last week, wherein he stops the orchestra for a moment to allow a clock to strike and trumpets sound in an anteroom! Beethoven's bird notes, on the contrary, bud and blossom out of the musical scheme of the movement as naturally as any legitimate flute or clarinet cadenza introduced for this purpose of heightening by contrast, illustration or elaboration, the effect of many a composition of "absolute" music; and what idyllic vividness does it add to the scene! The same wonderful skill is recognized in the treatment of the other episodes of the symphony, not excepting the tempest, which not only excites admiration from its reserve in the use of extreme orchestral devices, but presents one of the grandest effects of dissonances ever conceived. Such "programme" music as Beethoven indulges us with in this symphony may be compared to a word poem of exalted beauty, tastefully bound and accompanied by illustrations by the best artists. The poem may be a noble creation by itself, but its beauties, so far from being obscured, may derive an added charm from the illustrations.

The "Pastoral" symphony was the most prominent feature of the concert, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Saturday evening. The performance of the work was on the whole excellent—a decided improvement over that of last year. Mr. Henschel's leadings were judicious and steady, and the orchestra gave the work with much more delicacy of feeling and clearness of execution than it has imparted to some of the classical symphonies performed this season. Such performances as this give cheering promise of the good things to be expected of this orchestra, in spite of temporary failures. The concert opened with Sterndale Bennett's overture "The Naiads," a model of single-eyed adherence to a definite musical purpose, as well as of graceful, finished and symmetrical development of the germ-thought. These characteristics were brought out with great clearness and delicacy by the admirable treatment which the work received from the orchestra. The novelty of the evening was a pair of melodies for the string band by Grieg, entitled "Wounded Heart" and "Spring." They are beautiful little fancies, full of tenderness and grace, though on a first hearing one can discover no special significance in their titles. They were played exquisitely. Auber's bright overture, "Le Part du Diable," the only other orchestral selection had been substituted, for some reason, in the place of one of Liszt's symphonic poems, which had been announced as the closing piece of the programme, but which has been postponed to the next concert. It was given with all desirable effectiveness. The solo part of the concert was contributed by Miss Abbie Whinnery, soprano, who sang, with orchestral accompaniment, an aria from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and, with Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, two songs by Rubinstein and Franz, respectively. Miss Whinnery's singing was marked by a strange combination of strong and weak features. In the Mozart aria she displayed a voice of much natural purity and dynamic power, and considerable skill in the execution of staccato runs and trills, but in her legato passages, although there was much to be admired, there was certain mechanical stiffness in execution, resulting in not a few crudities of tone, which largely neutralized the effect that otherwise might have resulted from her undeniably good conception of the aria and her just methods of expression. In the songs, particularly in the second, she showed to better advantage, owing to the greater freedom which their simpler construction enabled her to impart to the expression of the sentiment; but here, too, the absence of the graces of execution which we have noted deprived her singing of that sympathy-compelling power that depends so largely on matters of detail as well as on an intelligently conceived style. The singer, however, was complimented by a recall after each of her efforts. The audience was comparatively light, and enthusiasm was throughout the evening at a low level.

The next concert introduces as soloist Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, pianist; and the following interesting programme is announced:—

Overture ("Summer Night's Dream"), Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; symphony in B flat (1816), (M. S. first time) Schubert; Piano solo, (a) Largo, Bach—Saint Saens; (b) etude, C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; symphonic poem, (Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo"), Liszt. admission

The Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony concert in Music Hall last evening had the smallest attendance of the season. Miss Abbie Whinnery was the soloist. She sang several selections and was recalled, but her voice was not particularly pleasing. Two melodies for strings by Grieg were played here for the first time. They are delicate and pretty and were nicely played. The symphony was Beethoven's sixth—the "Pastorale." It was played very well, with but little roughness. The programme for next week is as follows: Overture (Summer Night's Dream) Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; symphony in B flat (1816), Schubert, (M. S. first time); piano solo, a. Largo, Bach, Saint Saens; b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; symphony poem (Tasso), Lamento e Trionfo, Liszt. Soloist, Mr. Hiram G. Tucker.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eighteenth concert, given last Saturday evening, in the Music Hall, brought the following programme:

Overture, "The Naiads".....Sterndale Bennett
Aria from "Il Seraglio".....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastoral) No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven
Two melodies for strings (op. 34).....Grieg
Wounded Heart—Spring—
(First time.)

Songs with Pianoforte—
a. Mein Herz schmückt sich.....Rubinstein
b. Im Herbst.....Franz
Overture to "La Part du Diable".....Auber
Miss Abbie Whinnery was the singer.

Bennet's ever-charming overture was capitally given. We are tempted to call the playing of the Pastoral Symphony the best performance of a large classic work that Mr. Henschel and his orchestra have yet given us. The tempi were admirable in every respect. The peasants' dance, in the third movement, was taken with a moderation which had the double advantage of giving the movement its true rustic character (without prejudice to its sprightliness), and of allowing the horn player to give his not easy passages with absolute clearness and smoothness. All the beauties of the Andante ("By the Brookside") and of the Finale were made the most of in a thoroughly genial way. Mr. Henschel, this time, succeeded fully in impressing his fine conception of the work upon the orchestra, and in making them present it with security and in perfect sympathy with himself. Grieg's pretty little pair of string pieces were gracefully played, and made a charming impression; and Auber's thoroughly delightful overture was enjoyed, as it deserved to be, by all. It is well for our public to hear such works adequately given from time to time, if only to appreciate what a man of real genius can do in a light, sparkling vein.

Miss Whinnery sang the Mozart air with true musicianly feeling, and gave the songs with pianoforte accompaniment in a way that one would fain call perfect. All the poetry of the Franz song was made patent at once so feelingly and so musically that for once we forgot the huge size of the Music Hall and enjoyed the beautiful little composition as if listening to it in a parlor.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening presented the following programme: Overture, "The Naiads," Sterndale Bennett; Aria, "Il Seraglio," Mozart, Miss Whinnery; Symphony in F, "Pastorale," No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; two melodies for strings, op. 34, Grieg, (Wounded Heart—Spring), first time; Songs with piano—a, "Mein Herz schmückt sich," Rubinstein; b, "Im Herbst," Franz, Miss Whinnery; Overture "Part du Diable," Auber. A rather lighter list than usual. I did not quite like the Pastoral symphony. Such a work is not at its best with a large orchestra and a heavy force of strings, such as Mr. Henschel has under him. The first movement was coarse and heavy, and had not the Germüthlichkeit of Beethoven's thought. The third and fourth movements were better, but scarcely as good as the work of the earlier part of the season.

The light overtures, both were interesting and pleasant, and the second of Grieg's melodies was very beautiful, but there was scarcely any connection between the music and the title. Miss Abbie Whinnery sang the two lieder with true artistic feeling, and with a rich and pure voice. She has gained power in the lower and middle register, but the highest notes are not very agreeable, as was proven in the Mozart aria, in which, although the trill and staccato work was good, she seemed overweighted. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments to the lieder were perfect.

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

In these days, when composers of the highest reputation so often lend their genius to the production of avowedly descriptive music, the value of which, as a distinct class of composition, is so variously estimated by different tastes, and differently educated minds, the only serious effort in this direction by Beethoven possesses an interest even beyond what it excited when it was yet a novelty. In including Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony among descriptive music we, of course, use the term in its largest sense, which covers not merely imitative music, but the musical expression of emotions awakened by objects and scenes of the material world. Every one knows that Beethoven intended this symphony to be "more an expression of feeling than a painting," and yet every one can discern more than one purely imitative effect, notably the imitation of the bird notes introduced into that exquisite idyll, the "Scene by the brook." We are not ashamed to say that for us the enjoyment of a composition is enhanced by the composer's hints of its purpose and of the meaning of individual parts, provided only that it possess a purely musical interest independently of any explanation not inherent in its own structure. Schumann's glorious B flat symphony, for instance, needs not the slightest explanation to be heard with extreme delight, and yet there is a new element of interest in listening to it, when one learns, as is now generally known, that the composer privately acknowledged that it was intended as an idealized picture of spring. In listening to the work in the light of this suggestion, one gets a clearer view of the composer's power of translating definite emotions into musical language, while none of its purely musical beauties are dimmed thereby. Beethoven in his "Pastoral" symphony has gone much farther than Schumann in the direction of suggesting material things, but in so doing he has furnished only a new illustration of his greatness in the fact that he has been able to enter so boldly into the domain of "programme" music without degrading his genius one whit. What a world-wide difference there is, for instance, in his treatment of the bird solo, as we may call it, from the cheap device resorted to by Massenet in his descriptive piece, performed last week, wherein he stops the orchestra for a moment to allow a clock to strike and trumpets sound in an anteroom! Beethoven's bird notes, on the contrary, bud and blossom out of the musical scheme of the movement as naturally as any legitimate flute or clarinet cadenza introduced for this purpose of heightening by contrast, illustration or elaboration, the effect of many a composition of "absolute" music; and what idyllic vividness does it add to the scene! The same wonderful skill is recognized in the treatment of the other episodes of the symphony, not excepting the tempest, which not only excites admiration from its reserve in the use of extreme orchestral devices, but presents one of the grandest effects of dissonances ever conceived. Such "programme" music as Beethoven indulges us with in this symphony may be compared to a word poem of exalted beauty, tastefully bound and accompanied by illustrations by the best artists. The poem may be a noble creation by itself, but its beauties, so far from being obscured, may derive an added charm from the illustrations.

The "Pastoral" symphony was the most prominent feature of the concert, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Saturday evening. The performance of the work was on the whole excellent—a decided improvement over that of last year. Mr. Henschel's leadings were judicious and steady, and the orchestra gave the work with much more delicacy of feeling and clearness of execution than it has imparted to some of the classical symphonies performed this season. Such performances as this give cheering promise of the good things to be expected of this orchestra, in spite of temporary failures. The concert opened with Sterndale Bennett's overture "The Naiads," a model of single-eyed adherence to a definite musical purpose, as well as of graceful, finished and symmetrical development of the germ-thought. These characteristics were brought out with great clearness and delicacy by the admirable treatment which the work received from the orchestra. The novelty of the evening was a pair of melodies for the string band by Grieg, entitled "Wounded Heart" and "Spring." They are beautiful little fancies, full of tenderness and grace, though on a first hearing one can discover no special significance in their titles. They were played exquisitely. Auber's bright overture, "Le Part du Diable," the only other orchestral selection had been substituted, for some reason, in the place of one of Liszt's symphonic poems, which had been announced as the closing piece of the programme, but which has been postponed to the next concert. It was given with all desirable effectiveness. The solo part of the concert was contributed by Miss Abbie Whinnery, soprano, who sang, with orchestral accompaniment, an aria from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and, with Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, two songs by Rubinstein and Franz, respectively. Miss Whinnery's singing was marked by a strange combination of strong and weak features. In the Mozart aria she displayed a voice of much natural purity and dynamic power, and considerable skill in the execution of staccato runs and trills, but in her legato passages, although there was much to be admired, there was certain mechanical stiffness in execution, resulting in not a few crudities of tone, which largely neutralized the effect that otherwise might have resulted from her undeniably good conception of the aria and her just methods of expression. In the songs, particularly in the second, she showed to better advantage, owing to the greater freedom which their simpler construction enabled her to impart to the expression of the sentiment; but here, too, the absence of the graces of execution which we have noted deprived her singing of that sympathy-compelling power that depends so largely on matters of detail as well as an intelligently conceived style. The singer, however, was complimented by a recall after each of her efforts. The audience was comparatively light, and enthusiasm was throughout the evening at a low level.

The next concert introduces as soloist Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, pianist; and the following interesting programme is announced:—

Overture ("Summer Night's Dream"), Mendelssohn; concerto for piano-forte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; symphony in B flat (1816), (M. S. first time) Schubert; Piano solo, (a) Largo, Bach—Saint Saens; (b) Etude, C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; symphonic poem, (Tasso, "Lamento e Trionfo"), Liszt.

PP

182

Boston Music Hall.

183

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Midsummernight's Dream.) . . . MENDELSSOHN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in D minor, No. 4, op. 70. RUBINSTEIN.
Moderato. Poco animato. Allegro.—Moderato assai.—Allegro assai.—

SYMPHONY in B flat. (1816.) . . . SCHUBERT.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.—
Menuetto. (Allegro molto.)—Allegro vivace.—
(MS. First time.)

PIANO SOLO.

a. LARGO. . . . BACH—Saint Saëns.
b. ETUDE C major. op. 23. . . . RUBINSTEIN.

SYMPHONIC POEM. (Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo.) . . . LISZT.

SOLOIST :

MR. HIRAM G. TUCKER.

Mr. Tucker will use a Chickering Piano.

Herald

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Orchestra's Tribute to Wagner.

A change has been made by Mr. Henschel, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, in the programme for this week's concert on Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the cause being a desire to present a memorial programme as a tribute to the memory of Richard Wagner. With a view to the performance of the Wagner selections, to which compositions it will be restricted, the orchestra will be increased to over 80 performers, and, in addition to the soprano soloist announced, Mme. Gabrielle Boema, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. Henschel will contribute vocal selections from the dead composer's works. The programme now being arranged will cover a wide range of Wagner's writings, as it will include vocal or instrumental numbers from "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Meistersingers," "Die Gotterdammerung," "Parsifal" and "Tannhauser." Such a fitting tribute to the memory of the great composer will be a credit to the orchestral organization and to its talented leader, whose labors are so largely increased by its preparation. This programme will be publicly rehearsed on Friday afternoon at Music Hall, in place of the one announced last week. The detailed arrangement of the programme will be made known tomorrow.

Boston Music Hall.

Changed on eve of Wagner's Death

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Magic Flute.) MOZART.

SCENA AND ARIA. (Oberon.) WEBER.

SYMPHONY in E. No. 3. (MS.) MAX BRUCH.

Andante sostenuto; Allegro.—Adagio.—Scherzo. (Vivace, con spirito.)—

Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)—

(New. First time.)

SERENADE for Strings, in Canon form, op. 23. (Dedicated to Bruch.) HENSCHEL.

Marchia.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale.—

(First time.)

SONG WITH PIANO.

THE ERLKING. SCHUBERT.

MARCH. (Tannhauser.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST :

MME. GABRIELLA BOEMA.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Orchestra's Tribute to Wagner.

A change has been made by Mr. Henschel, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, in the programme for this week's concert on Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the cause being a desire to present a memorial programme as a tribute to the memory of Richard Wagner. With a view to the performance of the Wagner selections, to which compositions it will be restricted, the orchestra will be increased to over 80 performers, and, in addition to the soprano soloist announced, Mme. Gabrielle Boema, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. Henschel will contribute vocal selections from the dead composer's works. The programme now being arranged will cover a wide range of Wagner's writings, as it will include vocal or instrumental numbers from "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Meistersingers," "Die Gotterdammerung," "Parsifal" and "Tannhauser." Such a fitting tribute to the memory of the great composer will be a credit to the orchestral organization and to its talented leader, whose labors are so largely increased by its preparation. This programme will be publicly rehearsed on Friday afternoon at Music Hall, in place of the one announced last week. The detailed arrangement of the programme will be made known tomorrow.

Boston Music Hall.

Changed as per of Program Notice

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Magic Flute.) MOZART.

SCENA AND ARIA. (Oberon.) WEBER.

SYMPHONY in E. No. 3. (MS.) MAX BRUCH.

Andante sostenuto; Allegro.—Adagio.—Scherzo. (Vivace, con spirito.)—

Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)—

(New. First time.)

SERENADE for Strings, in Canon form, op. 23. (Dedicated to Bruch.) HENSCHEL.

Marcia.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale.—

(First time.)

SONG WITH PIANO.

THE ERLKING. SCHUBERT.

MARCH. (Tannhauser.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST :

MME. GABRIELLA BOEMA.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As years roll by, and the store of standard music accumulates, the art of programme-making for classical concerts becomes constantly more difficult. There may have been a time when concert directors found their chief difficulty to be in the paucity of material suited to their purpose, and the consequent limitations to the desired variety and freshness of their programmes. Now, however, with the host of new composers that have come upon the stage within recent years, and whose numbers are yearly increasing, and with the many works they are adding to the accumulation of standard music—works that demand an occasional hearing on their own merits, and as illustrating the ever-changing theories and methods of composition—the conditions of the problem have become quite reversed. The programme-maker now labors under an "embarrassment of riches," riches far more accessible to him than in former times when the facilities for the world-wide dissemination of music were so much more restricted than now. There is more than enough to choose from,—the difficulty is how, within the limits of a series of classical concerts, so to cover the wide field of music as properly to do justice to all departments of composition, and not to permit any of the great masterpieces, whether of earlier or later ages, to fall into oblivion from disuse. We seem to be approaching a time when, with the increasing demands of modern composers or the attention of the public, the opportunities of hearing the immortal works of the classical writers properly interpreted will have become so limited, that with the majority of the rising generation these works will become but little more than traditions. Even now, with all the assumed popular familiarity with the Beethoven symphonies, one may attend the whole round of classical concerts with which we are so abundantly provided during each season, and not be able to hear a given one of the nine—say the fourth, or the seventh—more than once during the year, and with this condition of things the common assumption that everyone knows these great works almost by heart is fast becoming a mere courtesy of the musical critic to his readers; an assumption that applies with truth only to the student with his exceptional advantages for study. We venture to say, further, that the common impression is, that Schubert's larger works are hardly less familiar to music-lovers in Boston than those of Beethoven, and probably many of the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts were a little taken aback to read on the programme of the last concert, in connection with the title of one of that composer's symphonies, the words "first time." Schubert, indeed, is too little known here in consideration of his deserts as one of the immortal group of classical writers, and Mr. Henschel deserves thanks for his thoughtfulness and enterprise in first introducing to our public this interesting symphonic creation of the master. What, indeed, could be more interesting than a new message from one of the inspired prophets of that golden era of composition?

The symphony produced on Saturday evening is the second written by the composer in the key of B flat, and is the fifth in the enumeration of his ten works in this form. It was written in the fall of 1816, when the composer was but nineteen years old, the same year in which he wrote his fourth or "Tragic" symphony. It is intrinsically less interesting than any of his other symphonies yet produced here, but as a fresh sample of Schubert's writing, if for no other reason, it was well worth the place it occupied on the programme. Written as it is for small orchestras, "without trumpets or drums," it thereby appeals less strongly than it otherwise might to the modern taste, which delights in full scoring. Further than this, its ideas are comparatively light, the development of its themes not very extended, and the similarity of the themes and their treatment to Mozart and Haydn so marked as to give it small claim to originality. Nevertheless, any one strongly imbued with Schubert's spirit may detect in it many a Schubertish trait. It is full of the composer's characteristic spontaneity and artlessness,—a rare charm of itself,—and it reveals something of the tendency of his melodies to sing themselves up and down throughout the entire range of the orchestra, a characteristic as beautifully illustrated in the finale of this composer's great C-major symphony. As Schubert in most of his orchestral works makes such prominent use of the wind instruments, it is also interesting to note what excellent work he could do with the strings as his main dependence, as is the case in this symphony. The work undoubtedly suffered somewhat on Saturday evening from its position on the programme, directly following the concerto, which demanding, as it did, careful and long-continued attention, left the listener in not the best condition for following another large work with that closeness which was equally necessary for its thorough appreciation. The orchestral score of the symphony, it should be noted, has never been published, and it was performed on this occasion from MS. copies. Though new here, the symphony has been heard frequently in London.

The other large work on the programme, already referred to, was Rubenstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor (op. 70, No. 4). Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, who appeared for the first time as soloist in these concerts, performed the piano part of the work. His playing was excellent in almost every respect. His work grew steadily better, as he progressed, and became constantly more in sympathy with his composer. It erred chiefly, where it erred at all, in not giving the instrument all the commanding prominence to which it is entitled in such a work, but this was an error in the right direction in the present instance, for in this concerto the piano is treated more orchestrally than is usual with such a work; and in view of the many exquisite beauties of the orchestral score one was inclined to be grateful to the pianist for not throwing them into the shade by unduly emphasizing his part. In technique, in phrasing, indeed, in all essentials,—Mr. Tucker proved himself equal to the emergency, and at times played with not a little brilliancy. In addition to the concerto Mr. Tucker contributed as solos a Largo melody arranged by St. Saëns, and Rubenstein's familiar study in C major (op. 23). The latter was very brilliantly performed. Mr. Tucker was complimented with recalls, the demonstrations in his honor being very warm. Two additional orchestral selections—the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at the head of the programme, and Liszt's imposing symphonic poem, "Lamento e Trionfo," at its foot—completed the list. The performance of the Mendelssohn overture was extremely fine, and that of the Liszt work brilliant and effective in a very high degree. Indeed, all of the orchestral work of the evening was admirable, and with such a programme it follows that the concert was peculiarly enjoyable.

Next Saturday night novelty will rule the hour. A new soloist is to be heard,—Madame Gabriella Boema, singer,—and this will be the programme:—

Overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; scena and aria ("Oberon") Weber; symphony in E, No. 3 (MS., new, first time), Max Bruch; serenade for strings, in canon form, op. 23 (dedicated to Bruch), (first time), Henschel; song with piano, "The Erlking," Schubert; march ("Tannhauser"), Wagner.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture. (Midsummer Night's Dream.).....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for Piano-forte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.....Rubinstein.
Moderato. Poco animato. Allegro.—Moderato assai.—
Allegro assai.

Mr. H. G. Tucker.
Symphony in B flat. (1816.).....Schubert.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.
Menuetto. (Allegro molto.)—Allegro vivace.—
(MS. First time.)

Piano Solo. a. Largo,.....Bach—Saint-Saëns.
b. Etude C major, op. 23.....Rubinstein.
Mr. Tucker.

Symphonic Poem. (Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo.).....Liszt.

Naturally, the most interesting point of the above programme was the Schubert Symphony, a work which, although composed in September, 1816 (it was completed October 3d), has never been published, save, we believe, in a four-hand arrangement for the piano, by Peters, the German publishers, who at present possess the autograph score. Although unpublished, manuscript copies have been freely made, and the work is rather familiar to the London concert-goer, having been frequently performed at the Crystal Palace concerts under Manns' directorship. It is the fifth, in order, of Schubert's symphonies, and possesses many of the characteristics of the early period of that master's work. It is pleasing, but familiar. It presents ideas which one unconsciously associates with Mozart, and which one finds even in Schubert's own previous works. The composer only in his later works, such as the unfinished symphony or the great ninth, gave broad as well as melodic touches, and began to approach Beethoven in majesty. But, although this work was preceded by the "Tragic Symphony," it has few touches of deep feeling or power. It is rather gemüthlich, pleasant in almost every part. It is written for small orchestra, and is said to have been an outgrowth of the string-quartet socials which Schubert used to participate in once a week. It is full of the playful spirit which seems to have been characteristic of Schubert during his early days in Vienna, when the composer drew about him a coterie of young artists, poets and musicians, and lived in a manner entirely like that of the students of the Quartier Latin of Paris of olden time. There are no drums or trumpets in the work, and almost all the work falls upon the strings. Even the alternations with the wood wind and the beautiful melodies of the composition cannot relieve it from a shade of monotony. It is too lightly scored for modern taste, and its sweetness may be apt to become cloying. The first two movements are more in the vein of Mozart and Haydn than the last two, or to be more exact, the first movement has themes which are almost literal reproductions of themes from Haydn's symphony in C major; while the andante is Mozart to the life, although one cannot pick out any especial phrases which Mozart had previously used. The performance of the work was good, the strings and the flutes doing remarkably well.

In amazing contrast with this quiet, unpretentious work was the Liszt number, which was given a broad reading, with gorgeous coloring. The clarinet theme, the harmonized brass theme, and the passage for the deep strings in the closing portion, were all admirably done, and the climax was powerful in the highest degree. The tricky overture with which the concert began was very neatly performed, the strings giving their little sprite-like figures with precision and grace.

The piano playing of the concert was also very good. One might have asked for more color in the first movement of the concerto, but it is not a very inspiring movement, not nearly so much so as Rubinstein's concerto in G. But the pianist and the work grew better, together, and in the second movement, the best of the work, there was nothing to criticize. The ensemble of the next movement was also very good, especially in the portion where the piano phrases terminate in a single note for orchestra. The scales at the end seemed a trifle forced. In the two solos Mr. Tucker did excellently. The large chords (tenths) were given with surety, and the wrist action easy and elastic, while in the second portion, where a melody in the left hand is supported by a chord accompaniment (finger action) in the right, the pianist invested the work with artistic feeling, giving a very fine legato, which stood in effective contrast with the preceding and succeeding portions. The next concert offers a new soloist, Miss Gabriella Boema, and the following programme:

Overture. (Magic Flute.).....Mozart
Scena and Aria. (Oberon.).....Weber
Symphony in E. No. 3. (MS.).....Max Bruch
Andante Sostenuto; Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo. (Vivace, con spirito.)
Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)
(New. First time.)
Serenade for Strings, in Canon form, op. 23. (Dedicated to Bruch.).....Henschel
Marcia—Andante—Scherzo—Finale.
(First time.)
Song with Piano.

The Erlking.....Schubert
March. (Tannhauser.).....Wagner

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Hiram Tucker, pianist, was the soloist, and the following programme was performed: Overture (Midsummer Night's Dream), Mendelssohn; Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; Symphony in B flat (1816) (MS. First time), Schubert; Piano Solo, a. Largo, Bach-Saint-Saëns, b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; Symphonic Poem (Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo), Liszt. The performance of the orchestral members was one of the finest of all that have been given this season. The light, airy overture of Mendelssohn was played with graceful expertness, the sprightly figures which fall to the part of the strings being, in particular, very beautifully rendered. Liszt's strong "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" was as well played at the other extreme of musical composition, and proved most effective, the ending, especially, being most impressively wrought out. The chief interest of the evening, however, centered in the Schubert symphony, an earlier work of this composer, which has never been published except in an arrangement for the piano. Manuscript copies of it have, however, often been made, and it is tolerably familiar in Europe. It is the fifth in order of the composer's symphonies, and is not a work of very great merit. It is light and melodious, but its themes are not particularly original, nor are many of them fully developed. It was finely performed by the orchestra, although, as most of the work fell upon the strings, there was less difficulty in giving it a proper interpretation than is encountered with a composition which makes demands upon all the musicians. Mr. Tucker's playing was very fine, especially in the two selections from Rubinstein, which he played with great taste and the employment of a high degree of skill. He was recalled after each of his performances.

The next concert, which introduces a new soloist, Madame Gabriella Boema, as soloist, will be devoted to the following programme: Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; scena and aria, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in E, No. 3, MS., Max Bruch (new, first time); serenade for strings, in Canon form, op. 23, dedicated to Bruch, Henschel (first time); song with piano, "The Erlking," Schubert; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

As years roll by, and the store of standard music accumulates, the art of programme-making for classical concerts becomes constantly more difficult. There may have been a time when concert directors found their chief difficulty to be in the paucity of material suited to their purpose, and the consequent limitations to the desired variety and freshness of their programmes. Now, however, with the host of new composers that have come upon the stage within recent years, and whose numbers are yearly increasing, and with the many works they are adding to the accumulation of standard music—works that demand an occasional hearing on their own merits, and as illustrating the ever-changing theories and methods of composition—the conditions of the problem have become quite reversed. The programme-maker now labors under an "embarrassment of riches," riches far more accessible to him than in former times when the facilities for the world-wide dissemination of music were so much more restricted than now. There is more than enough to choose from,—the difficulty is how, within the limits of a series of classical concerts, so to cover the wide field of music as properly to do justice to all departments of composition, and not to permit any of the great masterpieces, whether of this or earlier ages, to fall into oblivion from disuse. We seem to be approaching a time when, with the increasing demands of modern composers or the attention of the public, the opportunities of hearing the immortal works of the classical writers properly interpreted will have become so limited, that with the majority of the rising generation these works will become but little more than traditions. Even now, with all the assumed popular familiarity with the Beethoven symphonies, one may attend the whole round of classical concerts with which we are so abundantly provided during each season, and not be able to hear a given one of the nine—say the fourth, or the seventh—more than once during the year, and with this condition of things the common assumption that everyone knows these great works almost by heart is fast becoming a mere courtesy of the musical critic to his readers; an assumption that applies with truth only to the student with his exceptional advantages for study. We venture to say, further, that the common impression is, that Schubert's larger works are hardly less familiar to music-lovers in Boston than those of Beethoven, and probably many of the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts were a little taken aback to read on the programme of the last concert, in connection with the title of one of that composer's symphonies, the words "first time." Schubert, indeed, is too little known here in consideration of his deserts as one of the immortal group of classical writers, and Mr. Henschel deserves thanks for his thoughtfulness and enterprise in first introducing to our public this interesting symphonic creation of the master. What, indeed, could be more interesting than a new message from one of the inspired prophets of that golden era of composition?

The symphony produced on Saturday evening is the second written by the composer in the key of B flat, and is the fifth in the enumeration of his ten works in this form. It was written in the fall of 1816, when the composer was but nineteen years old, the same year in which he wrote his fourth or "Tragic" symphony. It is intrinsically less interesting than any of his other symphonies yet produced here, but as a fresh sample of Schubert's writing, if for no other reason, it was well worth the place it occupied on the programme. Written as it is for small orchestras, "without trumpets or drums," it thereby appeals less strongly than it otherwise might to the modern taste, which delights in full scoring. Further than this, its ideas are comparatively light, the development of its themes not very extended, and the similarity of the themes and their treatment to Mozart and Haydn so marked as to give it small claim to originality. Nevertheless, any one strongly imbued with Schubert's spirit may detect in it many a Schubertish trait. It is full of the composer's characteristic spontaneity and artlessness,—a rare charm of itself,—and it reveals something of the tendency of his melodies to sing themselves up and down throughout the entire range of the orchestra, a characteristic as beautifully illustrated in the finale of this composer's great C-major symphony. As Schubert in most of his orchestral works makes such prominent use of the wind instruments, it is also interesting to note what excellent work he could do with the strings as his main dependence, as is the case in this symphony. The work undoubtedly suffered somewhat on Saturday evening from its position on the programme, directly following the concerto, which demanding, as it did, careful and long-continued attention, left the listener in not the best condition for following another large work with that closeness which was equally necessary for its thorough appreciation. The orchestral score of the symphony, it should be noted, has never been published, and it was performed on this occasion from MS. copies. Though new here, the symphony has been heard frequently in London.

The other large work on the programme, already referred to, was Rubenstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor (op. 70, No. 4). Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, who appeared for the first time as soloist in these concerts, performed the piano part of the work. His playing was excellent in almost every respect. His work grew steadily better, as he progressed, and became constantly more in sympathy with his composer. It erred chiefly, where it erred at all, in not giving the instrument all the commanding prominence to which it is entitled in such a work, but this was an error in the right direction in the present instance, for in this concerto the piano is treated more orchestrally than is usual with such a work; and in view of the many exquisite beauties of the orchestral score one was inclined to be grateful to the pianist for not throwing them into the shade by unduly emphasizing his part. In technique, in phrasing,—indeed, in all essentials,—Mr. Tucker proved himself equal to the emergency, and at times played with not a little brilliancy. In addition to the concerto Mr. Tucker contributed as solos a largo melody arranged by St. Saëns, and Rubenstein's familiar study in C major (op. 23). The latter was very brilliantly performed. Mr. Tucker was complimented with recalls, the demonstrations in his honor being very warm. Two additional orchestral selections—the Mendelssohn "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture at the head of the programme, and Liszt's imposing symphonic poem, "Lamento e Trionfo," at its foot—completed the list. The performance of the Mendelssohn overture was extremely fine, and that of the Liszt work brilliant and effective in a very high degree. Indeed, all of the orchestral work of the evening was admirable, and with such a programme it follows that the concert was peculiarly enjoyable.

Next Saturday night novelty will rule the hour. A new soloist is to be heard,—Madame Gabriella Boema, singer,—and this will be the programme:—

Overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; scena and aria ("Oberon") Weber; symphony in E. No. 3 (MS., new, first time), Max Bruch; serenade for strings, in canon form, op. 23 (dedicated to Bruch), (first time), Henschel; song with piano, "The Erlking," Schubert; march ("Tannhauser"), Wagner.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture. (Midsummer Night's Dream.).....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for Piano-forte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.....Rubinstein.
Moderato. Poco animato. Allegro.—Moderato assai.—
Allegro assai.
Mr. H. G. Tucker.
Symphony in B flat. (1816).....Schubert.
Allegro.—Andante con moto.
Menuetto. (Allegro molto.)—Allegro vivace.—
(MS. First time.)
Piano Solo. a. Largo.....Bach—Saint-Saëns.
b. Etude C major, op. 23.....Rubinstein.
Mr. Tucker.
Symphonic Poem. (Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo).....Liszt.

Naturally, the most interesting point of the above programme was the Schubert Symphony, a work which, although composed in September, 1816 (it was completed October 3d), has never been published, save, we believe, in a four-hand arrangement for the piano, by Peters, the German publishers, who at present possess the autograph score. Although unpublished, manuscript copies have been freely made, and the work is rather familiar to the London concert-goer, having been frequently performed at the Crystal Palace concerts under Manna's directorship. It is the fifth, in order, of Schubert's symphonies, and possesses many of the characteristics of the early period of that master's work. It is pleasing, but familiar. It presents ideas which one unconsciously associates with Mozart, and which one finds even in Schubert's own previous works. The composer only in his later works, such as the unfinished symphony or the great ninth, gave broad as well as melodic touches, and began to approach Beethoven in majesty. But, although this work was preceded by the "Tragic Symphony," it has few touches of deep feeling or power. It is rather gemüthlich, pleasant in almost every part. It is written for small orchestra, and is said to have been an outgrowth of the string-quartet socials which Schubert used to participate in once a week. It is full of the playful spirit which seems to have been characteristic of Schubert during his early days in Vienna, when the composer drew about him a coterie of young artists, poets and musicians, and lived in a manner entirely like that of the students of the Quartier Latin of Paris of olden time. There are no drums or trumpets in the work, and almost all the work falls upon the strings. Even the alternations with the wood wind and the beautiful melodies of the composition cannot relieve it from a shade of monotony. It is too lightly scored for modern taste, and its sweetness may be apt to become cloying. The first two movements are more in the vein of Mozart and Haydn than the last two, or to be more exact, the first movement has themes which are almost literal reproductions of themes from Haydn's symphony in C major; while the andante is Mozart to the life, although one cannot pick out any especial phrases which Mozart had previously used. The performance of the work was good, the strings and the flutes doing remarkably well.

In amazing contrast with this quiet, unpretentious work was the Liszt number, which was given a broad reading, with gorgeous coloring. The clarinet theme, the harmonized brass theme, and the passage for the deep strings in the closing portion, were all admirably done, and the climax was powerful in the highest degree. The tricky overture with which the concert began was very neatly performed, the strings giving their little sprite-like figures with precision and grace.

The piano playing of the concert was also very good. One might have asked for more color in the first movement of the concerto, but it is not a very inspiring movement, not nearly so much so as Rubinstein's concerto in G. But the pianist and the work grew better, together, and in the second movement, the best of the work, there was nothing to criticise. The ensemble of the next movement was also very good, especially in the portion where the piano phrases terminate in a single note for orchestra. The scales at the end seemed a trifle forced. In the two solos Mr. Tucker did excellently. The large chords (tenths) were given with surety, and the wrist action easy and elastic, while in the second portion, where a melody in the left hand is supported by a chord accompaniment (finger action) in the right, the pianist invested the work with artistic feeling, giving a very fine legato, which stood in effective contrast with the preceding and succeeding portions. The next concert offers a new soloist, Miss Gabriella Boema, and the following programme:

Overture. (Magic Flute).....Mozart
Scena and Aria. (Oberon).....Weber
Symphony in E. No. 3. (MS.).....Max Bruch
Andante Sostenuto; Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo. (Vivace, con spirito.)
Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)
(New. First time.)
Serenade for Strings, in Canon form, op. 23. (Dedicated to Bruch).....Henschel
Marcia—Andante—Scherzo—Finale.
(First time.)
Song with Piano.
The Erlking.....Schubert
March. (Tannhauser).....Wagner

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Hiram Tucker, pianist, was the soloist, and the following programme was performed: Overture (Midsummer Night's Dream), Mendelssohn; Concerto for Pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; Symphony in B flat (1816) (MS. First time), Schubert; Piano Solo, a. Largo, Bach-Saint-Saëns, b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; Symphonic Poem (Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo), Liszt. The performance of the orchestral members was one of the finest of all that have been given this season. The light, airy overture of Mendelssohn was played with graceful expertness, the sprightly figures which fall to the part of the strings being, in particular, very beautifully rendered. Liszt's strong "Lament and Triumph of Tasso" was as well played at the other extreme of musical composition, and proved most effective, the ending, especially, being most impressively wrought out. The chief interest of the evening, however, centred in the Schubert symphony, an earlier work of this composer, which has never been published except in an arrangement for the piano. Manuscript copies of it have, however, often been made, and it is tolerably familiar in Europe. It is the fifth in order of the composer's symphonies, and is not a work of very great merit. It is light and melodious, but its themes are not particularly original, nor are many of them fully developed. It was finely performed by the orchestra, although, as most of the work fell upon the strings, there was less difficulty in giving it a proper interpretation than is encountered with a composition which makes demands upon all the musicians. Mr. Tucker's playing was very fine, especially in the two selections from Rubinstein, which he played with great taste and the employment of a high degree of skill. He was recalled after each of his performances.

The next concert, which introduces a new soloist, Madame Gabriella Boema, as soloist, will be devoted to the following programme: Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; scena and aria, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in E. No. 3, MS., Max Bruch (new, first time); serenade for strings, in Canon form, op. 23, dedicated to Bruch, Henschel (first time); song with piano, "The Erlking," Schubert; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schubert's B Flat Symphony Played Here for the First Time—Mr. Hiram Tucker as the Soloist.

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was particularly interesting for several reasons, not the least among which was the first performance in this city of Schubert's unpublished B flat symphony from the manuscript score. Although this work cannot by any means be ranked with the composer's great symphonies, it is sufficiently interesting to make its production here a piece of commendable enterprise which we hope may not be the last.

It is to be desired that this work will be followed by that other and more beautiful symphony written in the same year—the "Tragic," which also is still unpublished. A space of six years separates Schubert's youthful production, the B flat symphony, from his most individual creation in this class of works, the famous unfinished symphony. The first was written in 1816 and the latter in 1822. It is easy to discover the traces of immaturity in the B flat symphony, and at the same time one does not have to look far to discover the imprints of his great genius. In this work of a young man of 19 it is not surprising that we find abundant instances of imitation, unconscious or otherwise, from the great masters who preceded him. The whole form and spirit of the work is Haydn's. There are some passages which it is very difficult to imagine that anybody other than that composer could have written, and there are others which are almost as peculiarly Schubertian as any of his most matured productions. In the tuneful first movement he exhibits in a marked degree that propensity for reiteration to which he ever afterwards clung with peculiar fondness. It would be something of a task to undertake to count how many times in the course of this brief section he repeats the principal phrase just exactly as it stands in the opening measures. But the whole work is unusually brief, and this peculiar characteristic does not have an opportunity to assume that somewhat burdensome complexion which wearies impatient people in the great symphony in C. There are some peculiarities of the work which are necessitated by the circumstances under which it was written. The absence of drums, trumpets and clarinets is due to the fact that Schubert wrote the symphony for a chamber amateur orchestra which did not possess these instruments. Taken altogether, the work is fresh and melodious, and though it did not awaken last evening much enthusiasm, its production here was an agreeable event of the musical season. It was played very acceptably.

The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was, indeed, excellent. Nothing finer than their playing of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture has been done by them this season.

Of Mr. Hiram G. Tucker's performance of Rubenstein's fourth piano concerto it is necessary to speak in the highest terms. It was adequate, appreciative and satisfactory. Liszt's splendid symphonic poem, "Tasso," brought the programme to a close. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture, "Magic Flute".....Mozart
Scena and aria, "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in E. No. 3, MS.....Max Bruch
(New. First time.)
Serenade for strings, in Canon form, op. 23
dedicated to Bruch.....Henschel
(First time.)
Song with piano, "The Erlking".....Schubert
March, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Soloist, Mme. Gabriella Boema.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The novelty of the programme was an early symphony by Schubert, still in MS., which was given in this city for the first time. It is not a work of marked value, musically considered, or of special interest except in connection with the source whence it came. There is but little in it of that character or manner peculiarly its composer's own. It is rigidly correct in form, is pretty rather than serious, and is formal in style. The distance between this composition and the unfinished symphony or the symphony in C is almost illimitable. The themes are graceful and melodious, but are not developed at any great length. The influence of Haydn is shown in it from beginning to end. The opening allegro might easily pass for a genuine bit of Haydn, save that the working out has none of the thoughtfulness or skill shown by the earlier master in such relation. The leading subjects are so nicely quaint as to excite a smile when we reflect upon Schubert in the light in which he is best known. The andante is quite Mozartish in sentiment and treatment, and is very beautiful in its way, though it is over long. The minuet returns to Haydn again, and the finale might easily pass for a genuine effort of the same master. Taken altogether, the symphony foreshadows in no degree the power that Schubert was afterward to develop. It was carefully and effectively interpreted. The other orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, and Liszt's "Lament and Triumph of Tasso," both of which were admirably performed. The soloist was Mr. H. G. Tucker, who gave a masterly rendering of Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor No. 4. The reading throughout was broad and scholarly in style, and the playing was wholly interesting in its honest straightforwardness, its clearness, and the musicianly taste and judgment that distinguished it from the opening to the close. The slow movement was given with a charming simplicity and grace of sentiment, and the finale with great fire, steadiness and healthy vigor. Mr. Tucker has never been heard to better advantage in public than in his remarkably able and satisfying performance of this work. Later in the evening he played a Largo by Bach, transcribed for piano by Saint-Saëns, in a clean cut and impressive manner, but with an excess of rubato which somewhat destroyed the continuity of the theme. He atoned for this, however, by the exceedingly brilliant, tasteful and facile style in which he gave Rubinstein's etude in C-major, op. 23. He was cordially and deservedly recalled after each performance. At the next concert two novelties will be given, one a MS. symphony by Max Bruch, and the other a serenade for strings in canon form by Mr. Henschel. The soloist will be Mme. Gabriella Boema.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

The Nineteenth Symphony Concert of the Season.

The 19th programme of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Hiram G. Tucker, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture—"Midsummer Night's Dream". Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4.
op. 70.....Rubinstein
Symphony in B flat (1816).....Schubert
Piano solo—(a) Largo.....Bach—Saint-Saëns
(b) Etude C major, op. 23.....Rubinstein
Symphonic poem (Tasso. Lamento e Trionfo).....Liszt

The Schubert symphony was heard here for the first time, and proved a delightful addition to the orchestra's repertoire. It is a manuscript work, but has been heard at London orchestral concerts, and is often called the symphony "without drums or trumpets." Written in 1816, when the composer was but 19 years of age, it overflows with the charmingly fresh, bright melodies which so strongly characterize all his writings even at this early period, and, although it shows a lack of the advanced education of his later years, its beauties are of a captivating character throughout. In all of its four movements—allegro, andante con moto, menuetto (allegro molto) and allegro vivace—there are indications of his admiration for Mozart; and, while his style is not strictly imitated, it is echoed in all the gay and bewitching melodies of the work. The plaintive sweetness of the leading theme of the andante made it the peculiarly enjoyable portion of the composition, but the entire work and its presentation was a source of unqualified pleasure to the listener. Mr. Tucker was heard for the first time as soloist at these concerts, and received a generous recognition of his abilities upon the conclusion of each of his numbers. All of his playing indicates conscientious and systematic study rather than inborn genius, and the purely methodical character of his efforts detracts largely from their enjoyment. His best success was made in the Rubinstein etude, his style more happily fitting this number than any of the other works of the programme. In the finale of the concerto Mr. Tucker partially threw off the constraint which characterized his work up to that point, and the applause following the conclusion of this composition was deservedly bestowed. It was a bad night for horse car travel and so about one-half of the audience had to be satisfied with what appeared to be a very admirable performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, judged from the lobby, and the Liszt number gave a specially brilliant ending to this most satisfactory programme.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The nineteenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening; the programme was: Overture to "A Midsummernight's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4.
op. 70.....Rubinstein
Symphony in B-flat. (1816.).....Schubert
(MS. First time.)

Pianoforte solo { a. Largo.....Bach—Saint-Saëns
b. Etude in C major, op. 23,.....Rubinstein
Symphonic Poem, "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo," Liszt
Mr. Hiram G. Tucker was the pianist.

The Mendelssohn overture was played with much brilliancy in the stronger passages, but with a strange and persistent avoidance of anything in the shape of a pianissimo in the fairy music, the violins playing their dainty little figures, as well as the delicious bit of melody near the close, in a nonchalant mezzo forte that struck one with dismay. If we have never heard Nick Bottom's "Hee-haw" made so much of, and to such good purpose, as on this occasion, we wondered at the very tame roaring of Snug's lion (bass tuba), which seemed to have taken a leaf out of Bottom's book, and so aggravated its voice that it roared us as gently as any sucking dove. But surely the old traditional notion that Mendelssohn meant something funny by bringing his bull-voiced tuba in among the fairies cannot be wrong. Upon the whole, the absence of finely marked contrasts of light and shade was very noticeable in the performance.

The new Schubert symphony is indeed treasure trove. The work seems to have been written as much under the influence of Haydn as a strong, original genius like Schubert's can be under the influence of another mind. It is as different from the great C-major symphony, on the one hand, as it is from the poetic and imaginative B-minor, on the other. Saving that Schubert's individuality cannot help cropping out every now and then, the composition is to all intents and purposes a Haydn symphony. But it is none the less charming for this; and closely as the composer has kept himself within Haydn's domain, a characteristic turn of melody, or a sudden modulation shows whose hand is at the bellows. The orchestration is rich and brilliant, albeit that the stronger brass instruments do not appear in the score; the use made of the strings is especially masterly. All four movements are written in the sunniest, genial vein, with now and then a touch of delicious humor—as in the first movement, where the listener is twice or thrice fooled by a dainty little phrase, which starts out in major, and suddenly subsides into a quaintly doleful minor. The themes upon which the work is founded are absolutely delightful; one could hardly believe one's own ears, in hearing so many new tunes at a symphony concert nowadays; for our modern serious composers have outgrown tunes, for the most part, and only deign to write motives and phrases, and such splendid things. The symphony was, upon the whole, very well played. Liszt's "Tasso," on the contrary, was very coarsely done. Although our admiration for Liszt's genius is not of the most profound, we are by no means sorry to listen to his works now and then. But if they are given at all, they should be given gorgeously, for otherwise they lose all their charm.

Mr. Tucker played the first two movements of the Rubinstein concerto superbly. For beauty of tone, brilliancy, perfection of phrasing, warmth of sentiment, and, above all, totality of conception, his performance can only be called masterly. At moments when passion gains the upper hand (notably in one or two places in the first movement), Mr. Tucker was exceptionally fine, and he rose to within easy hailing distance of some of the most overwhelming effects made by the composer himself when he played this same concerto here. The surprising excellence of Mr. Tucker's rendering of any composition seems to depend wholly upon his mental grasp of its contents. When he thoroughly comprehends the gist of a work, he easily and naturally transmutes intellectual conviction into spontaneous feeling, and does everything a pianist can be called upon to do—in the way of execution, style, the convincing expression of warm sentiment—with absolute security of effect. His playing is masterly, in a word. But when he does not fully grasp the gist of a piece, he is utterly adrift and helpless; he merely plays the notes, but gives no rendering at all, not even a bad one. Thus, in the last movement of the concerto, in which Rubinstein himself was positively satanic, Mr. Tucker seemed to be playing all at random; he made no effect, simply because (as it appears to us) he saw no effect to be made. In the Bach Largo his beauty of tone and sincerity of feeling went straight to the listener's heart, although at times his somewhat too elaborate phrasing obscured the rhythm, so that one did not quite know where one was in the music. But his playing of the Rubinstein study was superb at every point; an astonishing display of technique, and much more beside.

The twentieth programme is—

Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Scena and Aria, from "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony in E. No. 3. (M.S.).....Max Bruch
(New. First time.)
Serenade for strings, in Canon form, op. 23.
(Dedicated to Bruch).....Henschel
(First time.)
Song with Pianoforte—"The Erlking".....Schubert
March from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Mrs. Gabriella Boema will be the singer.

Professional Amenities.

That exceedingly unhappy and uncomfortable person, Mr. Louis Maas, enjoys the privilege of writing the musical correspondence from Boston to a New York musical journal. This is nothing in itself, and would not call for special mention were it not for the fact that he has had the misfortune to make a public exhibition of his exceedingly bad taste. Mr. Maas—or perhaps we should say Dr. Maas, since he has had the doubtful honor to be dubbed Doctor of Music at some out-of-the-way young ladies' seminary in an obscure New York village, and is rather proud of the title so obtained—is a professional pianist. Under the circumstances it was hardly judicious in him to attack a brother pianist, and to berate those critics who had the sad misfortune to praise that which he condemns. He is particularly severe upon the critic of the GAZETTE, who, he says,

"would like to have it believed that he understands music," and yet who, to the seminary Doctor's evident astonishment, "expresses an opinion directly contrary to the one already expressed by myself." From what we know of Mr. Maas, we are of the opinion that had any professional pianist attempted to underrate his piano playing in print, the seminary Doctor would have been the very first to have protested plaintively against the bad taste shown in such a proceeding. In his anguish that another pianist should have met with praise, Mr. Maas loses what little sense he generally carries about with him, and runs a tilt at Mr. Lang and his pupils and at Mr. Henschel. These gentlemen, however, are perfectly capable of taking care of themselves, and we shall not attempt their defence against the whinnings of the bilious doctor, whose recent meditations upon the vastness and dreariness of our North American prairies have disturbed his usual calm and stolid equilibrium. But we feel impelled to make a few remarks upon his observations regarding ourselves.

Mr. Maas plays the piano in a very creditable manner, although we have never admired the phlegmatic and mechanical inflexibility of his style, or the steely coldness that characterizes it generally. He has written music for the piano and for orchestra, of which the most notable features are its soporific and soporific qualities. He is a well-educated musician, as far as a knowledge of the technique of his art is concerned, though as yet he has achieved no marked reputation as a composer beyond the conventional Kapellmeister degree. His own shortcomings as a piano player have been treated so leniently by the critics of Boston, that he should have had the discretion to remain silent when praise was accorded a brother artist, no matter what his individual feeling, or the despair he suffered upon finding another commended, may have been.

His chief attack upon the GAZETTE critic is in connection with the treatment Mr. Henschel has received at our hands this season. He complains with much virtuous indignation that we condemned Mr. Henschel's conducting last season, and that we cannot find words enough to praise it this season,—and all of this to show what little reliance can be placed upon our opinion. This of course is the dyspeptic misery of a disappointed man, who since his failure to be reappointed conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, for reasons we need not relate in detail, has boiled over with unavailing spleen and carefully-nurtured envy.

While accusing us of want of tact in our criticisms of Mr. Henschel last year, Mr. Maas is tactless enough to observe: "Mr. Henschel is not a born conductor, but rather a very bad one, with very little prospect of his becoming a good one." In his strictures upon our course towards Mr. Henschel this season, he states that we "cannot find words enough to praise Mr. Henschel," which is a dishonest and dishonorable perversion of fact. We have, in common with our brother critics, found much improvement in Mr. Henschel's conducting this season, and it has given us great pleasure to recognize and to commend it. The extravagance that was so unpleasing a feature in his beating time last year has wholly disappeared, and other of the shortcomings prominent in his previous work are absent now. On the other hand, we have also had occasion to express disapproval of Mr. Henschel's readings this season, and have done so as frankly and as positively as the circumstances called for, and with all necessary unreserve. Mr. Maas, therefore, cannot have read our recent criticisms, or else he wantonly falsifies or characteristically expresses himself at random. When he adds to his idle charges the contemptible insinuation that the critic of the GAZETTE has changed his course towards Mr. Henschel "for reasons best known to himself," he sinks to the level of a low cowardice that dares not make a malicious charge save by implication. The trouble with Mr. Maas is that he is forever either talking or writing too much for a man whose mind has an unhappy squint, gained by looking persistently inwards upon his own imaginary importance, artistic and otherwise. His bad temper and his bad manners are always apparent whenever he comes prominently forward, all the way from complaining of and bemoaning the extortionate price charged for herring salad up to writing in envious detraction of a brother pianist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

Boston Correspondence.

Boston, February 16, 1883

THE nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra consisted of the following programme:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.....Rubinstein.
Symphony in B flat (1816).....Schubert.
Piano solo—(a), Largo.....Bach—Saint-Saëns.
(b), Etude, C major, op. 23.....Rubinstein.
Symphonic poem (Tasso. "Lamento e Trionfo").....Liszt.

Mr. Hiram G. Tucker was the solo pianist. A great fuss has been made about the production of this Schubert symphony. What for? No sensible musician knows. It was written when Schubert was almost a boy, is altogether in the Haydn and Mozart style, with only occasional glimpses of the Schubert of later years, and nobody would dream of performing it if it did not have Schubert's name on it. It is pretty and melodious, to be sure, and nicely scored, but that is about all the merit it has. Mr. Tucker's pianistic achievements I would be glad to pass over in silence, but it is in the interest of art and the public that the truth should be spoken about musical performances by those who ought to know, and not that it be suppressed, for however good reasons. It is not pleasant to make severe remarks, but it is my unpleasant duty this time to say, that the gentleman in question was totally unable to cope with the difficulties of the works he tried to play. The Rubinstein "Concerto" was altogether too ambitious a task for him, the last movement being nothing but a great scramble from beginning to end, and the solo numbers, "Largo" and "Etude" were no better. The "Etude" calls for continued staccato chords played from the wrist, and is very fatiguing. Mr. Tucker cut up the piece into little four-bar fragments, with a ritardando between each, thereby showing to all who were knowing that he was unable to sustain the fatiguing wrist-motion longer than four bars. Why, then, play such a piece? Mr. Tucker is a pupil of Mr. B. J. Lang, the organist and teacher of the piano. Mr. Henschel, the conductor of these Symphony Concerts, has brought out several pupils of Mr. Lang, thereby no doubt earning the gratitude of this gentleman, but certainly not rendering any service to art or the public of Boston, since he only lowers the standard of these concerts by engaging such mediocre soloists. Mr. Tucker would be considered a very fair amateur, but he certainly does not play well enough to perform at a concert like the above. This is my opinion as an artist. What, then, is one to say to the perfect gushing over, on this pianist's performance, by the critics of some of the leading papers here? Notably the critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette, who would like to have it believed that he understands music, and expresses an opinion directly contrary to the one already expressed by myself. Either he understands nothing about piano playing or he does not express his real opinion, for reasons best known to himself. It was this same critic, who being a director of the Boston Philharmonic Society last year, with rare want of tact, used his position on the Gazette to run down Mr. Henschel's performances as much as possible, since the Philharmonic Society was, of course, a competitor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He could not find words enough throughout the season to express his disgust of Mr. Henschel as a conductor, stating more than once that he was totally unfit to lead an orchestra. Now, to all knowing persons it was perfectly evident, after a few concerts last season, that Mr. Henschel was not a born conductor, but rather a very bad one, with very little prospect of his becoming a good one. This was confirmed by the concerts of the second season, since Mr. Henschel has not improved but does some things rather worse than last year, from an evident desire on his part to act on the many kind suggestions offered him by the critics. This year, however, strange to say, the critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette cannot find words enough to praise Mr. Henschel for reasons best known to himself. I only mention the above circumstance to show that I have good reasons for my remarks, and to show also what reliance can be placed upon the opinion of the critic of the Saturday Evening Gazette. The programme for the next symphony concert under Mr. Henschel has been changed. It will contain only works by Richard Wagner, so as to form a memorial programme. There will be vocal and instrumental selections from "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Meistersinger," "Götterdämmerung," "Parsifal" and "Tannhäuser." This is certainly praiseworthy, and will, no doubt, call out a large audience, as Wagner is very popular here. —The Apollo Club, un-

192

The concert by Miss Henrietta Maurer, pianiste, announced for February 12 at the Meionion Hall, and also the fourth of the series of quartet soirées by the Müller-Campanari Quartette, I was unable to attend.

LOUIS MAAS.

193

The Boston Symphony Concert of last Saturday presented the following: Overture ("Midsummer-night's Dream"), Mendelssohn; concerto for piano-forte in D minor, No. 4, op. 70, Rubinstein; moderato, poco animato, allegro; moderato assai; allegro assai; Mr. Hiram G. Tucker. Symphony in B flat (1816), Schubert; allegro, andante con moto; menuetto (allegro molto), allegro vivace (MS. first time). Pianoso—a. Largo, Bach, Saint Saëns; b. Etude C major, op. 23, Rubinstein; Mr. Tucker. Symphonic poem (Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo), Liszt.

Of course, the interest centered in the Schubert symphony, but the work did not entirely repay the attention that was given to it. It is too lightly scored to suit ears that have become accustomed to Wagner, St. Saëns, Liszt, or Berlioz. Its themes, too, although pleasant and melodious, savor too much of Mozart and Haydn to chain the attention as the Schubert Symphony in C does. This work is scored almost wholly for strings and wood-wind—no timpani, no heavy brasses, no trumpets; all is light and almost monochromatic. There is a reason for this. The symphony is the outgrowth of the quartette in which Schubert used to participate, and was thus highly scored that it might be played by a small number of performers, in private. It is not well adapted for so large an orchestra, and the contrast between it and the Liszt number was enormous. The latter could scarcely have had a broader or nobler interpretation, and, although the symphony was also well played, the lack of color in the one and the excess of it in the other was too pronounced. Mr. Tucker's piano playing was good. He shaded the Rubinstein concerts with artistic effect, and all his playing was conscientious and clear. I liked him better in the two last movements of the concerto than in the first, and last of all in the etude, where his elastic touch even in the largest chords showed him a perfect master of wrist action, while in the second part his legato work and excellent shading of the left hand, and hence call for highest praise.

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

 RICHARD WAGNER.

BORN MAY 22d, 1813.

DIED FEB. 13th, 1883.

PRELUDE. (Tristan. 1859.)

LOHENGRIN'S LEGEND AND FAREWELL. (Lohengrin, 1847.)

SIEGFRIED-IDYLL. (1871.)

ELISABETH'S GREETING

TO THE HALL OF SONG. (Tannhaeuser. (1845.)

INTRODUCTION.

POGNER'S ADDRESS.

} (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg. 1867.)

PRELUDE, (Parsifal. 1881.)

SCENA AND ARIA. (Oberon.)

WEBER.

"The stone that covers thy remains, shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever young and new creating life. (From Wagner's Funeral Oration at Weber's Grave.)

DEATH MARCH. (Goetterdaemmerung. 1874.)

SOLOISTS:

MME. GABRIELLA BOEMA.

MR. CHAS. R. ADAMS.

MR. HENSCHEL.

LOHENGRIN'S LEGEND AND FAREWELL.

In distant land, by ways remote and hidden,
There stands a Burg that men call Monsalvat;
It holds a shrine to the profane forbidden,
More precious there is nought on earth than that.

And, thron'd in light, it holds a cup immortal,
That who so sees, from earthly sin is cleans'd;
'Twas borne by angels thro' the heavenly portal,
Its coming hath a holy reign commenced.

Once ev'ry year, a dove from Heav'n descendeth,
To strengthen it anew for works of grace;
'Tis call'd the Grail, the pow'r of Heaven
attendeth
The faithful Knights who guard that sacred place.

He whom the Grail to be its servant chooses,
Is arm'd henceforth with high invincible might,
All evil craft its pow'r before him loses,
The spirits of darkness where he dwells, take flight.

Nor will he lose the awful charm it lendeth,
Although he should be call'd to distant lands,
When the high cause of virtue he defendeth,
While he's unknown, its spell he still commands.

By perils dread the holy Grail is girded,
No eye rash or profane its light may see;
Its champion knight from doubtings shall be warded,
If known to man, he must depart and flee.

Now mark, craft or disguise my soul disdaineth,
The Grail sent me to right your lady's name;
My father, Percival, gloriously reigneth,
His knight am I, and Lohengrin my name.

Oh Elsa, think what joys thy doubts have ended!
Could'st thou not trust in me for one short year?
Then thy dear brother, whom the Grail defended,
In life and honour thou hadst welcom'd here.

If he returns, when our sweet ties are broken,
This horn, this sword, and ring give him in token;
This horn succour on battle-field shall send him,
And with this sword he'll conquer ev'ry foe.

This ring shall mind him who didst most befriend him,
Of me, who sav'd thee from the depths of woe,
Farewell! my love, my wife! Farewell!
Henceforth the Grail commands my life!

SCENA AND ARIA. (Oberon.) WEBER.

RECIT.—

Ocean! thou mighty monster that liest curled,
Like a green serpent, round about the world!
To the musing eye thou art an awful sight,
When calmly sleeping in the morning light;
But when thou risest in thy wrath, as now,
And fling'st thy fold around some fated prow,
Crushing the strong-ribb'd bark as 'twere a reed—
Then, ocean, thou art terrible indeed!

AIR.—Still I see thy billows flashing,
Through the gloom their white foam flinging,
And the breakers' sullen dashing
In mine ear hope's knell is ringing.
But lo! methinks a light is breaking
Slowly o'er the distant deep;
Like a second morn awaking
Pale and feeble from its sleep.
Brighter now, behold, 'tis beaming
On the storm, whose misty train
Like some shattered flag is streaming,
Or a wild steed's flying mane.

And now the sun bursts forth, the wind is lulling fast.
And the broad wave but pants from fury past.
Cloudless o'er the flushing water
Now the setting sun is burning,
Like a victor red with slaughter
To his tent in triumph turning.

Ah! perchance these eyes may never
Look upon its light again.
Fare thee well, bright orb, forever!
Thou for me wilt rise in vain.
But what gleams so white and fair,
Heaving with the heaving billow?
'Tis a sea-bird wheeling there,
O'er some wretch's watery pillow.
No! it is no bird I mark—
Joy! it is a boat! a sail!
And yonder rides a gallant bark,
Unimpaired by the gale!

O transport! my Huon! hasten down to the shore!
Quick! quick! for a signal this scarf shall be waved—
They see me! they answer—they ply the strong oar.
Huon! my husband! my love! we are saved!

(FOR CONTINUATION SEE PAGE 4.)

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORGE HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Jubilee.) WEBER.

THE SPIRIT SONG. HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in A. No. 7, op. 92. BEETHOVEN.

Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—

Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.—

CAPRICCIO. (The Sentinel.) HILLER.

SCENA. (Il Profeta.) MEYERBEER.

MARCH SLAVE. TSCHAIKOWSKY.

(New. First time.)

SOLOIST:

MISS MARY H. HOW.

ELISABETH'S GREETING.

Oh hall of song, I give thee greeting!
 All hail to thee, thou hallow'd place!
 'Twas here that dream so sweet and fleeting,
 Upon my heart his song did trace.
 But since by him forsaken,
 A desert thou dost seem!
 Thy echoes only waken
 Remembrance of a dream!
 But now the flame of hope is lighted,
 Thy vault shall ring with glorious war,
 For he, whose strains my soul delighted,
 No longer roams afar!
 All hail to thee, thou hall of glory,
 Dear to my heart!

POGNER'S ADDRESS. (THE MASTERSINGERS OF NUREMBERG.)

The interior of St. Catherine's church, in Nuremberg. The MASTERSINGERS have assembled to discuss the necessary preliminaries for the celebration of the approaching festival of St. John the Baptist, which is to be held in the meadows outside the city gates, and in which they themselves take a prominent part, appearing before the people in a contest of song. POGNER, a worthy citizen and Mastersinger, has the ear of the assembly for an important proposition.

(Translation.)

The feast of John the Baptist's Day we celebrate to-morrow:	To hear men think our burgers are
On meadows green, 'mid flowers gay,	To worldly notions given.
With merry dance, and song, and play,	In castles, as in town and court,
We nature's gladness borrow, forgetting every sorrow—	I've wearied of the base report;
And each rejoices in his way!	That only barter and gain
The Sing-School in the church is by the Mastersingers slighted;	The burgher's heart enchain.
With drum and fife they gladly hie	But that in our great empire wide
To grassy meads 'neath sunny sky,	We Art alone have cherished,—
And in the feast united, the people are invited,	While elsewhere it hath perished;
To here in song the Masters vie.	That Art is still the burger's pride;
In such a festival of song are given various prizes,	And that we've ever stood,
That should the victor's fame prolong, as only just and wise is.	Defending the High and Good,
Now God hath me with riches blent,	And Art and Beauty here below—
And love of song placed in my breast;	This I to the world like to show.
With trouble unremitting, I've thought a prize befitting,—	So hear Masters, the wise
That may be nobly won;	In which I would give the prize:—
So listen what I've done.	The Singer who first honors in
In German land I've traveled far,	The festival of song shall win,
To frenzy oft was driven,	On John the Baptist's Day,—
	Be he whoso he may,— Receives what ne'er was in vogue nor
	In mode, from me, Veit Pogner,—
	With all my wealth and what beside,
	Eva my only child, as—bride!—

From the German of R. Wagner, by J. F. Jackson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Memorial Programme in Honor of Richard Wagner.

The 20th concert of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, and the occasion was made notable by the presentation of a memorial programme in honor of Richard Wagner, from whose works, with a single exception, the selection for the evening was made. The soloists were Mme. Gabriella Boema, soprano; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. Henschel, baritone, the numbers being as follows:

Prelude....."Tristan"
 Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell....."Lohengrin"
 Siegfried-Idyll....."Lohengrin"
 Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song,
 "Tannhauser"

Introduction, Pogner's Address
 "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

Prelude....."Parsifal"
 Scene and Aria, "Oberon"....."Weber"
 Death March....."Goetterdaemmerung"

The public interest in this particular programme can be best realized from the facts that audiences aggregating between 5000 and 6000 persons listened to it at the public rehearsal of Friday afternoon and last evening, and that upon each occasion the keenest appreciation of the several selections was shown. An admirable opportunity was given by the presentation of the several numbers to compare the writings of Wagner during the larger part of the entire period of his most active life, the "Tannhauser" selection, dating 1845, representing almost his earliest notable effort in the epoch of musical history in which he has taken so prominent a part; while the "Parsifal" prelude gave a hint of the final contribution of the master to the great works of the world of music which he has so greatly enriched by his life's labors. The rare beauty of the "Siegfried-Idyll," and the strongly marked character of the "Mastersingers" introduction, made these the more enjoyable of the orchestral selections, but the generally excellent manner of the presentation of all the instrumental numbers, notwithstanding the necessarily hurried preparation of the programme afforded much enjoyment in even the less familiar and pleasing "Prelude" to "Tristan" and "Parsifal." The "Death march," with its strange characteristics, gave a fitting finale to the programme of orchestral numbers, and the strikingly effective blending of its leading motifs stamp this as one of the greatest efforts of Wagner's strongest period. Mme. Gabriella Boema made her first appearance here on this occasion, and proved an artist well worthy the exceptional approval with which her audience rewarded her efforts. Her voice is essentially a dramatic soprano, having all the characteristics demanded for compositions of the larger and broader style. Its culture shows the result of intelligent and thorough study, and, both in recitative and aria, Mme. Boema displays admirable artistic instinct and general excellence in execution. Her voice is evenly developed, her upper tones pure and strong, and, though the use of the tremolo is somewhat noticeable, it does not seriously mar her vocal work. Her most satisfactory effort, in some ways, was in her earlier number, as the Weber scene and aria proved rather a severe tax upon her abilities. The demands of the latter number were admirably met, so far as the singer's powers could meet them, but there was at all times an evidence of a lack of reserve power. Mme. Boema completely won her audience by her satisfactory efforts in both numbers, and was recalled with enthusiastic applause after each appearance.

Mr. Adams again gave his remarkable interpretation of the "Lohengrin" selection, and made quite as great an impression as when he sang it at these concerts last season, winning a generous recognition of his meritorious work from the audience. Mr. Henschel's appearance as soloist, while Mr. Listemann assumed the baton temporarily, was pleasantly recognized, and his delivery of the "Address" from the "Mastersingers" was characterized by the same excellences as have been commended heretofore in these columns.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before one of the largest audiences of the series. The programme, with the exception of one selection, was devoted wholly to music by Wagner. A tribute of respect to the dead composer covered the front of the first gallery, and consisted of some mourning drapery decorated with laurel, and a portrait of Wagner. The orchestra wore black instead of the customary white neckties. The programme was gloomy enough in all conscience, and the necessity for its performance gave one more cause for regret at the composer's death. The whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time. The orchestral work was, as a rule, fairly done, though there were many evidences of insufficient rehearsing. One of the pleasing features of the concert was the singing of Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell by Mr. C. R. Adams, who was in exceptionally good voice. The novelty of the concert was the appearance, for the first time here, of Madame Gabriella Boema, who has a very powerful soprano voice, of penetrating quality, wide range, and excellent volume. Unfortunately, it has a very marked and persistent tremolo, which appears to be beyond control. Madame Boema, has evidently studied in the best lyric school. Her declamation is remarkably strong and impressive, and as far as style and method are concerned she may be pronounced a singer of rare powers. Her singing of Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser" was unusually brilliant and effective, and succeeded in winning for her the esteem and admiration of her hearers at once. Later in the evening she sang the address to the Ocean from Weber's "Oberon," which, by the way, came like a gleam of sunshine into the gloomy programme. The recitative was declaimed with fine dramatic force and expressiveness, and the concluding allegro was given with extraordinary fire and vitality. It was received with a furor of applause. There can be no question regarding Madame Boema's great merits, and they received the fullest endorsement. Mr. Henschel contributed Pogner's address, and with the same effectiveness that has always marked his rendering of it. At the next concert, Miss Mary H. How will be the soloist. The symphony is to be Beethoven's in A. A March by Tchaikowsky will be given for the first time.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. In commemoration of the death of Richard Wagner, a programme made up entirely of that master's music has been prepared for the concert in Music Hall tomorrow evening. It is printed in full in the advertisement. Mrs. Gabriella Boema, one of the singers of the occasion, is a dramatic soprano of great range and power. She is of Bohemian birth, but has sung in Italian and German operas in Europe and lately in Australia. She brings with her the highest recommendations for artistic worth.

200
JANUARY 19, 1883--TWENTY

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When a man dies his name and his work immediately jump into a prominence far beyond that which they enjoyed during his life. The wider the reputation he has won during life the wider will be the enhanced interest in all that pertains to him when it is announced that his completed work has become a part of history. Richard Wagner is the most striking among recent illustrations of this trait of human nature. Not only his firm admirers, but many who have been able to admire but very little of his music, must have found themselves, when they learned of his death, awakened to a new curiosity in his works and an earnest desire to discover what of value he may have contributed to the world of art in which he has for many years occupied so large a place. It is, therefore, not merely from sentimental considerations that Mr. Henschel's action in abandoning the original programme for the twentieth symphony concert, and substituting one culled from the works of the dead, but still unburied composer, is to be commended, fitting and beautiful tribute as it was; but for the very practical reason that it was calculated to meet best the desires of patrons, this course was wisely adopted. Its wisdom was amply justified by the extremely large audience that the announcement drew out,—the largest of the season thus far. Not only were most of the usually vacant seats occupied, but the aisles surrounding the floor seats were densely filled with persons standing throughout the concert. And yet, though the programme was hardly as agreeably varied as it might have been made, even from Wagner's works alone, we suspect that many of those present must have congratulated themselves that they are not often called on to sit through a "Wagner testimonial" of this kind, profound as may be their admiration for the composer's peculiar genius. The concert was calculated to impress anew the fact that detached selections from Wagner's music can give but the faintest suggestion of the character and worth of his art work. By Wagner's own avowal, music was to him but one element of his art, and therefore subordinate to his main purpose, the creation of an idealized drama. Nothing less than the production of one of his works entire, therefore, or at least a well-marked division of one of them, with complete stage surroundings and accessories, is sufficient for a proper understanding of much of his music, which is mainly illustrative rather than a complete creation in itself. But to those—and we believe their number is very great—who are devoted to music as an end rather than as a means to an end, whose breasts are swelled with higher emotions by music undisguised and unadorned than by even the "musical-drama," or who, at least, value the opera as a means of giving expression to music rather than the reverse. The highest wants of this large class can never be satisfied with Wagner. They may reverence, even admire him, on his own ground, but they recognize the fact that his genius is essentially unique, and that to compare him with any great composer of the present or past would be hardly less logical than to measure Sir Isaac Newton's greatness by that of Shakespeare. For this reason the concert of Saturday evening, while interesting in details, must have proved to most of those present, save the most pronounced Wagnerians, wearisome as a whole. Its prevailing tone was gloomy, an effect due not only to the character of some of the selections, but to the decidedly funereal external arrangements of the occasion. The printed programmes were bordered with heavy black lines and bore a device representing a tablet on which was inscribed the name of the lamented composer with the dates of his birth and death. Over the front of the rear balcony, concealing the clock, was suspended heavy black drapery bordered with laurel leaves and enclosing a fine portrait of Wagner; and even the orchestra was in mourning to the extent of wearing black neckties in place of the customary white ones.

The programme opened with the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," a work that may be loosely described as an ingeniously wrought fabric of orchestral recitatives—impressive but gloomy in its vague tonality, and incomprehensible to the unaided musical sense. Lohengrin's legend and farewell, that exquisite bit of poetry whose beauty all may recognize, even when it is detached from its context, was next sung by Mr. Charles R. Adams as admirably as he sang it at one of these concerts last season—that is to say, with extreme beauty of style and effectiveness of method,—winning very fervid applause. The "Siegfried" idyl for orchestra was the second novelty of the evening. It is a beautiful example of Wagner's power of catching the mystic poetry of an open-air scene and throwing it around the listeners like an atmosphere by means of orchestral devices all his own, and with very slight employment of musical form. The third selection introduced a soloist entirely new to Boston,—Madame Gabriella Boema, a Bohemian by birth, who has enjoyed considerable experience in Italian and German opera in Europe, and lately in Australia. Her first selection was Elisabeth's greeting to the hall of song, from "Tannhäuser." Later on she sang the great "ocean" scene and aria from Weber's "Oberon,"—the only exception, it should be noted, to the otherwise uniform character of the programme, and doubtless introduced in deference to the wishes of the singer, though the incongruity was, in a measure, smoothed over by printing on the programme in connection with the number of an extract from Wagner's eulogy over Weber's grave. Madame Boema is a soprano of very marked ability in dramatic music. Her resemblance to Materna, in the great power and other natural qualities of voice, her intensity in declamatory utterance, her nice comprehension of her music, and her fine artistic sense in expression, is very striking. Her most prominent fault, too,—a very decided tremolo,—recalls the great queen of Wagnerian opera. But with large voices like these, the tremolo is much less objectionable than with smaller organs, since it is less suggestive of weakness. Madame Boema's voice is of very wide range, and it seems to be almost equally strong and full throughout its entire compass, the tones of the lower register being as rich as those of many an admired contralto in the same position. Madame Boema's art is not equal to that of Materna, but it were easy to believe that she might have won very high acceptance with Wagner as one of his dramatic heroines. Both her selections were given with remarkable effectiveness, but she achieved her greatest success by her grand interpretation of the Weber number. She won the triumph of the evening, and was twice recalled with enthusiasm. The introduction to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," with Pogner's address followed Madame Boema's first selection, and Mr. Henschel, the soloist, repeated his noble performance of the address given last season. The prelude to "Parsifal" was given for a second time this season, and the beauty and appropriateness of the composition as an introduction to a drama of a highly religious and heroic character was more apparent than before.

Though, naturally, it tells very little, it well serves to put the listener in the proper mood for the drama which it leads up to. The concert closed with the death march from "Die Götterdämmerung" of the great tetralogy—another instance of the necessity of the dependence of Wagner's music on the context for its proper effect. Considering the shortness of time for preparation, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was very satisfactory.

The next concert will introduce Miss Mary H. How as soloist. The programme is as follows:—

Overture ("Jubilee"), Weber; the Spirit song, Haydn; symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; capriccio ("The Sentinel"), Hiller; scena ("Il Profeta"), Meyerbeer; March, slave (new, first time), Tschalkowsky.

WAGNER NIGHT. 366

A Memorial Programme Presented by the Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

With a prompt and ready action which is most creditable to the managers of the Boston Symphony orchestra, when the news of Richard Wagner's death reached this country the programme for the concert of last evening, which had been prepared, was laid aside, and a new one, made up entirely from the works of the great composer, substituted. The membership of the orchestra was increased to over eighty for this special occasion, and the number of soloists to three. The announcement of this change of programme was of sufficient interest to cause a huge audience at both rehearsal and concert. The programme was judiciously selected and well arranged, though it was a little incongruous that a florid aria of Weber's should have had a place in a concert which was announced to be made up entirely from the works of Richard Wagner. It was unnecessary, unless, indeed it was inserted in order to accommodate Mme. Boema with something which she could really sing to go outside of the composer's vast range of vocal music. The programme opened with the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," written in 1859, and first performed under Bulow at Munich, 1865. This opera is the least known, probably, of all Wagner's great works, but it is spoken of by his admirers in the highest terms, and described as his most individual and characteristic production. The introduction which was played last night resembles the Lohengrin prelude, in that it is founded on a single theme of great impressiveness and undefined tonality, which allows of its being worked out in the most plastic manner into various phases of melodic beauty. Many people who see "some things" to admire in Wagner's works draw the line at "Tristan," and refuse to perceive anything meritorious about it, while on the other hand the master's admirers look upon it as his first most individual creation. The playing of this, as well as of the other numbers of the programme, showed the result of the necessary lack of sufficient preparation. Many passages were not delivered as smoothly as usual. But generally speaking the orchestra acquitted itself of its difficult task very creditably.

The "Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell" was sung by Mr. C. R. Adams in the same magnificent manner in which he has before presented that splendid piece of music to this audience. The "Siegfried Idyll," a work of 1871, was played entire, and occupied the third place on the programme. "Elisabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song," from Tannhäuser, was sung by Mme. Gabriella Boema. She is a singer of something more than ordinary ability, and did very fair work, but her style was much better adapted to the Weber aria which she sang later in the evening. She was received with much enthusiasm.

This completed the first part of the programme. The last section embraced the introduction and Pogner's address from the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the latter sung by Mr. Henschel, while Mr. Listemann conducted; the "Parsifal" prelude, a scena and aria from "Oberon," and the death march from the last part of the great "Ring des Nibelungen." The solemnity of both the last two instrumental numbers was well separated by a vocal selection, but, as it was before suggested, it is hardly clear why it was necessary to go outside the works of Wagner himself in order to find one. The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (Jubilee)..... Weber
The Spirit Song..... Haydn
Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92..... Beethoven
Capriccio (The Sentinel)..... Hiller
Scena (Il Profeta)..... Meyerbeer
March Slave..... Tschalkowsky

New. First time.

Soloist, Miss Mary H. How.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—WAGNER CONCERT: Comur

Prelude. (Tristan, 1859.)
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell (Lohengrin, 1847.)
Siegfried-Idyll. (1871.)
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song. (Tannhauser, 1845.)
Introduction, } (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, Pogner's Address. } 1867.)
Prelude, (Parsifal, 1881.)
Scene and aria. (Oberon.).....Weber.

"The stone that covers thy remains shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever young and new creating life."—From Wagner's Funeral Oration at Weber's Grave.

Death March. (Goetterdaemmerung, 1874.)

It was a thoughtful and proper act in Mr. Henschel to commemorate the death of the great German composer by a concert made up almost entirely of his works, and Boston is, we believe, the only American city which has thus honored his memory. Naturally, the short time allowed for the preparation of such a concert would make severe criticism out of place, yet but little indulgence is required on this score, the performance being, on the whole, a most creditable one. The hall was thronged to its utmost capacity, and among even those who were obliged to stand were seen the faces of many of our most prominent musicians. Over the face of the clock was placed a portrait of Wagner, and draperies of black told of the funeral character of the occasion. The effect of the programme upon the more critical portion of the audience was not of unmixed pleasure. Wagner does not lend himself readily to a series of pieces for concert use, and although the best taste seems to have been displayed in the choice of the numbers, the scope and meaning of several of them were lost in this isolated form. It is a strange thing to say, but the success of the Wagner concert was the Weber number. Mme. Gabriella Boema sang Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster in a manner that proved her a dramatic soprano of eminence. Her strength of tone and brilliancy in the higher register call for praise, but a tremolo occasionally betrayed overforcing of some phrases. The lowest tones were somewhat uncertain, and the rapid phrases following the phrase es ist die mœre, were not in accurate time, but if we speak of these faults we must also acknowledge that Mme. Boema, made the success of the concert, and aroused the greatest enthusiasm by her dramatic tone-delivery and her brilliant quality of voice. We must also commend the taste and feeling displayed in the Tannhauser aria. Mme. Boema is, we understand, a Bohemian by birth, and has, until very recently, been singing in Australia, New Zealand, etc. Mr. Henschel's singing of Pogner's Address was not as successful as upon some previous occasions. The orchestral accompaniment did not support the vocalist very well, and there was not the easy brusquerie that should characterize the work in this performance.

Mr. Adams sang with much taste, but the accompaniment was not altogether satisfactory, and his voice was in that state which necessitated constant changes of the manner of emission of tone to keep it from breaking. But after all, Wagner, like Schumann, is unvocal in his intensest moments, and it is not remarkable that the strain upon the singer should be apparent. Mr. Adams used the falsetto very sweetly at the part preceding the final farewell. Of the orchestral numbers we need not speak in much detail as many of them have very recently been heard in concerts, and reviewed in these columns. The Siegfried-Idyll was the most beautiful work of the evening, and the violins did very fine work in it, while the wood-wind gave the bird-like figures with delicacy and clearness. This is one of the few Wagnerian works which can be thoroughly enjoyed in a concert performance, and it presents the composer in an excellent light, not only being an example of most wonderful orchestration, but possessing exquisite ideas of a cast not too exalted to be appreciated by the average auditor. The most impressive numbers of the concert were the opening and closing ones. The Tristan prelude is sad and dreamy, and the Death March pompous and noble amidst all its intense gloom. If the audience did not show intense appreciation, (save of the Weber number) it certainly showed sustained interest, for very few of the vast assemblage left their seats until the last note of the last number had been played.

Mr. Henschel deserves thanks for having given Boston so appropriate an opportunity of honoring the composer who has passed away. The self-imposed task must have been herculean and the breadth of the reading of the instrumental works showed how much in earnest the conductor was, and the control over the musicians was evidence of thorough rehearsals. The next concert presents Miss Mary H. How as soloist, and the following programme:

Overture. (Jubilee.).....Weber.
The Spirit Song.....Haydn.
Symphony in A. No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace—Allegretto.—
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.—
Capriccio. (The Sentinel.).....Hiller.
Scena. (Il Profeta.).....Meyerbeer.
March Slave.....Tschaikowsky
(New. First time.)

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was given in commemoration of the death of the great German composer, Richard Wagner, and, with the exception of one vocal number, was devoted entirely to his works. Great energy and promptitude were necessary on the part of both the conductor and the orchestra to arrange such a performance so soon after the composer's death, but that they were recognized and approved was evident from the immense audiences that attended the rehearsal on Friday afternoon, as well as the concert itself. At least ten thousand persons must have been present at these two occasions—a fact which ought to give much satisfaction to the many ardent Wagnerians in the midst of us, and lead them to believe that the works of their admired master have taken a firm hold upon the interest of the Boston musical public. The programme that was performed was as follows: Prelude (Tristan, 1859); Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell (Lohengrin, 1847); Siegfried-Idyll (1871); Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song (Tannhauser, 1845); Introduction, Pogner's Address (the Mastersingers of Nuremberg, 1867); Prelude (Parsifal, 1881; scena and aria (Oberon), Weber; Death March (Goetterdaemmerung, 1874). The vocal numbers in this programme were interpreted by Madame Gabriella Boema, who sang the Weber selection and "Elizabeth's Greeting;" Mr. Charles R. Adams, who sang the Lohengrin "Legend" and "Farewell," and Mr. Henschel, who sang Pogner's Address. To give the necessary effect to the orchestral numbers, the number of players was increased to about eighty, and in justice to them it must be said that, although the time allowed for preparation was short, they played through the exacting programme in a manner which left very little to be desired. The general effect of the concert, however, was decidedly monotonous and gloomy. It would seem that a selection of Wagner's works might have been made that would give a better knowledge of his scope and power, but under the circumstances there is not much occasion to criticize. The introductions to "Parsifal" and "The Mastersingers," as well as the two vocal selections from Wagner are familiar here from former performances, and many persons would, no doubt, have been glad to hear some other selections than these. As the programme was constituted, however, one could not receive the broadest conceivable impression of Wagner's genius. The Siegfried-Idyll was the most beautiful of the selections and the best performed, and the dreaminess and sorrow of the first number and the strongly solemn impressiveness of the last were brought out in their full effect.

Of the vocal work of the evening a good word can in general be said. Mr. Henschel sang the "Pogner's Address" with all the spirit and power that have always marked his former efforts in it, and Mr. Adams did fairly well in the "Lohengrin" numbers, although his voice was by no means at its best and he was often forced to favor it in a very marked way. Madame Boema's singing was one of the most interesting events of the evening. Her performance of the "Tannhauser" selection was remarkably fine, and the scena and aria from "Oberon" were given as one seldom has the pleasure of hearing them performed. Her voice is exceptionally strong, brilliant and expressive, and, barring an excessive use of the tremolo at times, is one of the best with which we have been for a long time favored. It is full of the dramatic quality, strong and reliable throughout, and of a wide range. Her style is as good as her voice, and her manner and general appearance are pleasantly modest and unaffected. She was most warmly greeted, and it is to be hoped that we may have other opportunities of hearing her. The concert of next Saturday evening will offer the following programme, Miss Mary H. How being the soloist: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; The Spirit Song, Haydn; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Capriccio (The Sentinel), Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; March Slave, Tchaikowsky. This last composition will receive its first performance in Boston on this occasion.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before one of the largest audiences of the series. The programme, with the exception of one selection, was devoted wholly to music by Wagner. A tribute of respect to the dead composer covered the front of the first gallery, and consisted of some mourning drapery decorated with laurel, and a portrait of Wagner. The orchestra wore black instead of the customary white neckties. The programme was gloomy enough in all conscience, and the necessity for its performance gave one more cause for regret at the composer's death. The whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time. The orchestral work was, as a rule, fairly done, though there were many evidences of insufficient rehearsing. One of the pleasing features of the concert was the singing of Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell by Mr. C. R. Adams, who was in exceptionally good voice. The novelty of the concert was the appearance, for the first time here, of Madame Gabriella Boema, who has a very powerful soprano voice, of penetrating quality, wide range, and excellent volume. Unfortunately, it has a very marked and persistent tremolo, which appears to be beyond control. Madame Boema, has evidently studied in the best lyric school. Her declamation is remarkably strong and impressive, and as far as style and method are concerned she may be pronounced a singer of rare powers. Her singing of Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser" was unusually brilliant and effective, and succeeded in winning for her the esteem and admiration of her hearers at once. Later in the evening she sang the address to the Ocean from Weber's "Oberon," which, by the way, came like a gleam of sunshine into the gloomy programme. The recitative was declaimed with fine dramatic force and expressiveness, and the concluding allegro was given with extraordinary fire and vitality. It was received with a furor of applause. There can be no question regarding Madame Boema's great merits, and they received the fullest endorsement. Mr. Henschel contributed Pogner's address, and with the same effectiveness that has always marked his rendering of it. At the next concert, Miss Mary H. How will be the soloist. The symphony is to be Beethoven's in A. A March by Tchaikowsky will be given for the first time.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—WAGNER CONCERT. Concur

- Prelude. (Tristan, 1859.)
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell (Lohengrin, 1847.)
Siegfried-Idyll. (1871.)
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song. (Tannhauser, 1845.)
Introduction, } (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, Pogner's Address. } 1837.)
Prelude, (Parsifal, 1881.)
Scene and aria. (Oberon.).....Weber.

"The stone that covers thy remains shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever young and new creating life."—From Wagner's Funeral Oration at Weber's Grave.

Death March. (Goetterdaemmerung, 1874.)

It was a thoughtful and proper act in Mr. Henschel to commemorate the death of the great German composer by a concert made up almost entirely of his works, and Boston is, we believe, the only American city which has thus honored his memory. Naturally, the short time allowed for the preparation of such a concert would make severe criticism out of place, yet but little indulgence is required on this score, the performance being, on the whole, a most creditable one. The hall was thronged to its utmost capacity, and among even those who were obliged to stand were seen the faces of many of our most prominent musicians. Over the face of the clock was placed a portrait of Wagner, and draperies of black told of the funeral character of the occasion. The effect of the programme upon the more critical portion of the audience was not of unmixed pleasure. Wagner does not lend himself readily to a series of pieces for concert use, and although the best taste seems to have been displayed in the choice of the numbers, the scope and meaning of several of them were lost in this isolated form. It is a strange thing to say, but the success of the Wagner concert was the Weber number. Mme. Gabriella Boema sang Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster in a manner that proved her a dramatic soprano of eminence. Her strength of tone and brilliancy in the higher register call for praise, but a tremolo occasionally betrayed overforcing of some phrases. The lowest tones were somewhat uncertain, and the rapid phrases following the phrase es ist die moere, were not in accurate time, but if we speak of these faults we must also acknowledge that Mme. Boema, made the success of the concert, and aroused the greatest enthusiasm by her dramatic tone-delivery and her brilliant quality of voice. We must also commend the taste and feeling displayed in the Tannhauser aria. Mme. Boema is, we understand, a Bohemian by birth, and has, until very recently, been singing in Australia, New Zealand, etc. Mr. Henschel's singing of Pogner's Address was not as successful as upon some previous occasions. The orchestral accompaniment did not support the vocalist very well, and there was not the easy brusquerie that should characterize the work in this performance.

Mr. Adams sang with much taste, but the accompaniment was not altogether satisfactory, and his voice was in that state which necessitated constant changes of the manner of emission of tone to keep it from breaking. But after all, Wagner, like Schumann, is unvoiced in his intensest moments, and it is not remarkable that the strain upon the singer should be apparent. Mr. Adams used the falsetto very sweetly at the part preceding the final farewell. Of the orchestral numbers we need not speak in much detail as many of them have very recently been heard in concerts, and reviewed in these columns. The Siegfried-Idyll was the most beautiful work of the evening, and the violins did very fine work in it, while the wood-wind gave the bird-like figures with delicacy and clearness. This is one of the few Wagnerian works which can be thoroughly enjoyed in a concert performance, and it presents the composer in an excellent light, not only being an example of most wonderful orchestration, but possessing exquisite ideas of a cast not too exalted to be appreciated by the average auditor. The most impressive numbers of the concert were the opening and closing ones. The Tristan prelude is sad and dreamy, and the Death March pompous and noble amidst all its intense gloom. If the audience did not show intense appreciation, (save of the Weber number) it certainly showed sustained interest, for very few of the vast assemblage left their seats until the last note of the last number had been played.

Mr. Henschel deserves thanks for having given Boston so appropriate an opportunity of honoring the composer who has passed away. The self-imposed task must have been herculean and the breadth of the reading of the instrumental works showed how much in earnest the conductor was, and the control over the musicians was evidence of thorough rehearsals. The next concert presents Miss Mary H. How as soloist, and the following programme:

- Overture. (Jubilee.).....Weber.
The Spirit Song.....Haydn.
Symphony in A. No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace—Allegretto.—
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.—
Capriccio. (The Sentinel.).....Hiller.
Scena. (Il Profeta.).....Meyerbeer.
March Slave.....Tchaikowsky
(New. First time.)

Twentieth Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was given in commemoration of the death of the great German composer, Richard Wagner, and, with the exception of one vocal number, was devoted entirely to his works. Great energy and promptitude were necessary on the part of both the conductor and the orchestra to arrange such a performance so soon after the composer's death, but that they were recognized and approved was evident from the immense audiences that attended the rehearsal on Friday afternoon, as well as the concert itself. At least ten thousand persons must have been present at these two occasions—a fact which ought to give much satisfaction to the many ardent Wagnerians in the midst of us, and lead them to believe that the works of their admired master have taken a firm hold upon the interest of the Boston musical public. The programme that was performed was as follows: Prelude (Tristan, 1859); Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell (Lohengrin, 1847); Siegfried-Idyll (1871); Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song (Tannhauser, 1845); Introduction, Pogner's Address (the Mastersingers of Nuremberg, 1867); Prelude (Parsifal, 1881); scene and aria (Oberon), Weber; Death March (Goetterdaemmerung, 1874). The vocal numbers in this programme were interpreted by Madame Gabriella Boema, who sang the Weber selection and "Elizabeth's Greeting;" Mr. Charles R. Adams, who sang the Lohengrin "Legend" and "Farewell," and Mr. Henschel, who sang Pogner's Address. To give the necessary effect to the orchestral numbers, the number of players was increased to about eighty, and in justice to them it must be said that, although the time allowed for preparation was short, they played through the exacting programme in a manner which left very little to be desired. The general effect of the concert, however, was decidedly monotonous and gloomy. It would seem that a selection of Wagner's works might have been made that would give a better knowledge of his scope and power, but under the circumstances there is not much occasion to criticize. The introductions to "Parsifal" and "The Mastersingers," as well as the two vocal selections from Wagner are familiar here from former performances, and many persons would, no doubt, have been glad to hear some other selections than these. As the programme was constituted, however, one could not receive the broadest conceivable impression of Wagner's genius. The Siegfried-Idyll was the most beautiful of the selections and the best performed, and the dreaminess and sorrow of the first number and the strongly solemn impressiveness of the last were brought out in their full effect.

Of the vocal work of the evening a good word can in general be said. Mr. Henschel sang the "Pogner's Address" with all the spirit and power that have always marked his former efforts in it, and Mr. Adams did fairly well in the "Lohengrin" numbers, although his voice was by no means at its best and he was often forced to favor it in a very marked way. Madame Boema's singing was one of the most interesting events of the evening. Her performance of the "Tannhauser" selection was remarkably fine, and the scene and aria from "Oberon" were given as one seldom has the pleasure of hearing them performed. Her voice is exceptionally strong, brilliant and expressive, and, barring an excessive use of the tremolo at times, is one of the best with which we have been for a long time favored. It is full of the dramatic quality, strong and reliable throughout, and of a wide range. Her style is as good as her voice, and her manner and general appearance are pleasantly modest and unaffected. She was most warmly greeted, and it is to be hoped that we may have other opportunities of hearing her. The concert of next Saturday evening will offer the following programme, Miss Mary H. How being the soloist: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; The Spirit Song, Haydn; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Capriccio (The Sentinel), Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; March Slave, Tchaikowsky. This last composition will receive its first performance in Boston on this occasion.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before one of the largest audiences of the series. The programme, with the exception of one selection, was devoted wholly to music by Wagner. A tribute of respect to the dead composer covered the front of the first gallery, and consisted of some mourning drapery decorated with laurel, and a portrait of Wagner. The orchestra wore black instead of the customary white neckties. The programme was gloomy enough in all conscience, and the necessity for its performance gave one more cause for regret at the composer's death. The whole concert was an elegiac nightmare. We doubt if ever Music Hall echoed to a longer stretch of cacophonous dreariness within the same length of time. The orchestral work was, as a rule, fairly done, though there were many evidences of insufficient rehearsing. One of the pleasing features of the concert was the singing of Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell by Mr. C. R. Adams, who was in exceptionally good voice. The novelty of the concert was the appearance, for the first time here, of Madame Gabriella Boema, who has a very powerful soprano voice, of penetrating quality, wide range, and excellent volume. Unfortunately, it has a very marked and persistent tremolo, which appears to be beyond control. Madame Boema, has evidently studied in the best lyric school. Her declamation is remarkably strong and impressive, and as far as style and method are concerned she may be pronounced a singer of rare powers. Her singing of Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser" was unusually brilliant and effective, and succeeded in winning for her the esteem and admiration of her hearers at once. Later in the evening she sang the address to the Ocean from Weber's "Oberon," which, by the way, came like a gleam of sunshine into the gloomy programme. The recitative was declaimed with fine dramatic force and expressiveness, and the concluding allegro was given with extraordinary fire and vitality. It was received with a furor of applause. There can be no question regarding Madame Boema's great merits, and they received the fullest endorsement. Mr. Henschel contributed Pogner's address, and with the same effectiveness that has always marked his rendering of it. At the next concert, Miss Mary H. How will be the soloist. The symphony is to be Beethoven's in A. A March by Tchaikowsky will be given for the first time.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last past something like ten thousand people sat and stood in Music Hall to hear first the rehearsal and then the twentieth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. At all events, an audience of not less than five thousand attended each performance. The reason for this uncommon demonstration was unquestionably to be found in the graceful and timely tribute paid to the memory of the great composer, Richard Wagner, by the Symphony Orchestra management. And the fullest commendation is due such management as well as the orchestra itself for the excellence with which the tribute was carried through. Previous to the death of Wagner the programme for the twentieth concert had been arranged and to substitute the one given below in so short a period and in so satisfactory a manner required promptness, energy and much attentive study. The substituted programme was a memorial one, composed entirely of Wagner's works with a single exception. It was as follows: Prelude (Tristan, 1859); Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell (Lohengrin, 1847); Siegfried-Idyll (1871); Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song (Tannhauser, 1845); Introduction, Pagner's Address (the Mastersingers of Nuremberg, 1867); Prelude (Parsifal, 1881); scena and aria (Oberon), Weber; Death March (Götterdämmerung, 1874). Though among the choicest selections that could have been made, probably, they did not serve to fully illustrate their composer's genius. It was the essence of what Wagner tried to do, that when one part of a work was heard, so should all the other parts be heard. One hinged upon and told the meaning of another to such extent that the detached parts must of necessity be incomplete and unsatisfying. This was true on the present occasion, and had the matter been practicable it would, without doubt, have been better to give one work entire instead of the detached numbers presented. This, however, was an impossibility, presumably, in the time allotted for the performance; and the latter was sufficiently acceptable at any rate for the present. At some future time perchance another and the ideal memorial may be had. The orchestral numbers of the programme were given with an excellence which indicated the full appreciation of both the conductor and the players, about eighty musicians in all, of the occasion. Especially fine were both the reading and execution in the Siegfried-Idyll and the Introduction to the Meistersingers of Nuremberg. The vocal numbers were given by Mr. Charles R. Adams, who sang the Lohengrin Legend with much the same excellence of method as on a former occasion; Madame Gabriella Boema and Mr. Georg Henschel. Madame Boema, a native of Bohemia and a prima donna of considerable reputation in Europe and elsewhere, showed herself possessed of very great dramatic abilities joined to a voice of remarkable power and purity of tone. She was greatly praised for her rendering of the selection from Tannhauser and for the Weber number recalled twice and thrice with much enthusiasm. Mr. Henschel surrendered the conductorship of the orchestra to the experienced hand of Mr. Bernard Listemann for a short time, and sang the Pagner's Address in the spirited and delightful manner usual with his vocal performances and was cordially greeted as usual. The programme for the next concert, which will be rehearsed next Friday afternoon and formally given on Saturday evening, will be as follows, Miss Mary H. How being the soloist: Overture ("Jubilee"), Weber; the Spirit song, Haydn; symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; capriccio ("The Sentinel"), Hiller; scena ("Il Profeta"), Meyerbeer; March, slave (new, first time), Tschairowsky.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Memorial Programme in Honor of Richard Wagner.

The 20th concert of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, and the occasion was made notable by the presentation of a memorial programme in honor of Richard Wagner, from whose works, with a single exception, the selection for the evening was made. The soloists were Mme. Gabriella Boema, soprano; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. Henschel, baritone, the numbers being as follows:

Prelude....."Tristan"
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell....."Lohengrin"
Siegfried-Idyll....."Siegfried-Idyll"
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song, "Tannhauser"
Introduction, Pagner's Address "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Prelude....."Parsifal"
Scena and Aria, "Oberon".....Weber
Death March....."Götterdämmerung"

The public interest in this particular programme can be best realized from the facts that audiences aggregating between 5000 and 6000 persons listened to it at the public rehearsal of Friday afternoon and last evening, and that upon each occasion the keenest appreciation of the several selections was shown. An admirable opportunity was given by the presentation of the several numbers to compare the writings of Wagner during the larger part of the entire period of his most active life, the "Tannhauser" selection, dating 1845, representing almost his earliest notable effort in the epoch of musical history in which he has taken so prominent a part; while the "Parsifal" prelude gave a hint of the final contribution of the master to the great works of the world of music which he has so greatly enriched by his life's labors. The rare beauty of the "Siegfried-Idyll," and the strongly marked character of the "Mastersingers" introduction, made these the more enjoyable of the orchestral selections, but the generally excellent manner of the presentation of all the instrumental numbers, notwithstanding the necessarily hurried preparation of the programme afforded much enjoyment in even the less familiar and pleasing "Prelude" to "Tristan" and "Parsifal." The "Death march," with its strange characteristics, gave a fitting finale to the programme of orchestral numbers, and the strikingly effective blending of its leading motifs stamp this as one of the greatest efforts of Wagner's strongest period. Mme. Gabriella Boema made her first appearance here on this occasion, and proved an artist well worthy the exceptional approval with which her audience rewarded her efforts. Her voice is essentially a dramatic soprano, having all the characteristics demanded for compositions of the larger and broader style. Its culture shows the result of intelligent and thorough study, and, both in recitative and aria, Mme. Boema displays admirable artistic instinct and general excellence in execution. Her voice is evenly developed, her upper tones pure and strong, and, though the use of the tremolo is somewhat noticeable, it does not seriously mar her vocal work. Her most satisfactory effort, in some ways, was in her earlier number, as the Weber scena and aria proved rather a severe tax upon her abilities. The demands of the latter number were admirably met, so far as the singer's powers could meet them, but there was at all times an evidence of a lack of reserve power. Mme. Boema completely won her audience by her satisfactory efforts in both numbers, and was recalled with enthusiastic applause after each appearance. Mr. Adams again gave his remarkable interpretation of the "Lohengrin" selection, and made quite as great an impression as when he sang it at these concerts last season, winning a generous recognition of his meritorious work from the audience. Mr. Henschel's appearance as soloist, while Mr. Listemann assumed the baton temporarily, was pleasantly recognized, and his delivery of the "Address" from the "Mastersingers" was characterized by the same excellences as have been commended heretofore in these columns.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Music Hall was crowded last Saturday evening as it is only on occasions of special interest. As had been announced, this, the twentieth concert of the course, was given in commemoration of the death of Richard Wagner. The programme was made up, with a single exception, from the great master's works, and was—

Prelude to "Tristan" (1859).
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell, from "Lohengrin" (1847).
Siegfried-Idyll (1871).
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song, from "Tannhauser" (1845).
Introduction.....from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (1867).
Pagner's Address, rem. berg (1867).
Prelude to "Parsifal" (1881).
Scena and Aria from "Oberon".....Weber
"The stone that covers thy remail, shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever-young and new-creating life. [From Wagner's Oratorio at Weber's Grave.]
Death March from "Götterdämmerung" (1874).

Mrs. Gabriella Boema, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. Henschel were the singers.

The playing of the "Tristan" prelude was incomparably the finest that we have ever heard from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The wind instruments were in exact tune, and the whole rendering was characterized by a poetic purpose and an unity of action absolutely admirable. The "Siegfried-Idyll" also was excellently played, save at one point, where all the song-birds chime in together in twittering concert; here there appeared to be something the matter with the flutes and reeds. The Introduction to "The Mastersingers" was played about as well as usual; with fire and vigor, but a trifle coarsely. In the "Death-March" from "Götterdämmerung," the four additional tubas were out of tune with the orchestra, and even among themselves. Neither was the rendering of this wonderful movement marked by any especially fine traits. The "Parsifal" prelude was, on the other hand, exceedingly well played.

Mr. Adams sang the selection from "Lohengrin" superbly, from the heart and to the heart. He was, perhaps, not in his very best voice, but his admirable style, his adequate conception of the music, and the knightly dignity and fervor of sentiment he infused into his singing showed us the grand composition in its truest meaning. Mr. Henschel sang Pagner's address, from the "Mastersingers" to perfection and with immense effect. Mrs. Boema is a singer, who has come to us almost unheralded; her voice is a brilliant, vibrant soprano of excellent quality and great power; her use of it singularly fine, saving that now and then something of tremolo is apparent. Of her performance it may truly be said that she came, sang and conquered. She is one of the most dramatic of singers; she knows just where to throw all her energy, carries phrases through to a really grand climax. Neither does her singing lack variety; overwhelming as are her grand outbursts, these are not the only weapons she has in her armory. In a word, she is a singer who knows just what to do, and can do it. Not since Parepa has the great "Ocean, du Ungeheuer" been so superbly sung here; and even that great singer, although Mrs. Boema's superior in physical means, and also, perhaps, in perfect finish of vocal art, did not display such irresistible dramatic force as she. True, Mrs. Boema, like every great singer we have ever heard, has her shortcomings. Her tremolo is not praiseworthy, and now and then she allows herself to be thrown off her balance; whether by insufficient familiarity with the text or by a certain want of absolute mastery over herself were hard to determine. But, both in the scene from "Tannhauser" and in the one from "Oberon" there were moments when her singing almost "went to pieces," very much as when the wind suddenly gives out in an organ. But these slips were of short duration, and should properly come under the chapter of accidents. In both cases she recovered herself with admirable presence of mind, and one can truly say that such occasional lapses count almost as nothing in singing that is in other respects so artistic, powerful and superb. Mrs. Boema's appearance here has been really an event. Upon the whole, the concert was a worthy tribute to the memory of the great man in whose honor it was given.

The programme was selected with much good judgment; the works played and sung being characteristic of many phases of the master's genius. From a purely orchestral point of view, so to speak, it was eminently interesting to hear the "Siegfried Idyll" and the march from "Götterdämmerung" at the same concert; the one written for an orchestra that would have been modest even for Haydn, the other calling into play an array of instruments wholly exceptional even at the present day—we believe, it is the fullest score in existence, except Berlioz's "Dies Irae." Wagner's phenomenal command over the orchestra is as apparent in the one case as in the other. With small means he could do wonders, and in the larger score one finds nothing superfluous.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening last past something like ten thousand people sat and stood in Music Hall to hear first the rehearsal and then the twentieth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. At all events, an audience of not less than five thousand attended each performance. The reason for this uncommon demonstration was unquestionably to be found in the graceful and timely tribute paid to the memory of the great composer, Richard Wagner, by the Symphony Orchestra management. And the fullest commendation is due such management as well as the orchestra itself for the excellence with which the tribute was carried through. Previous to the death of Wagner the programme for the twentieth concert had been arranged and to substitute the one given below in so short a period and in so satisfactory a manner required promptness, energy and much attentive study. The substituted programme was a memorial one, composed entirely of Wagner's works with a single exception. It was as follows: Prelude (Tristan, 1859); Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell (Lohengrin, 1847); Siegfried-Idyl (1871); Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song (Tannhauser, 1845); Introduction, Pögnier's Address (the Mastersingers of Nuremberg, 1867); Prelude (Parsifal, 1881); scena and aria (Oberon), Weber; Death March (Götterdämmerung, 1874). Though among the choicest selections that could have been made, probably, they did not serve to fully illustrate their composer's genius. It was the essence of what Wagner tried to do, that when one part of a work was heard, so should all the other parts be heard. One hinged upon and told the meaning of another to such extent that the detached parts must of necessity be incomplete and unsatisfying. This was true on the present occasion, and had the matter been practicable it would, without doubt, have been better to give one work entire instead of the detached numbers presented. This, however, was an impossibility, presumably, in the time allotted for the performance; and the latter was sufficiently acceptable at any rate for the present. At some future time perchance another and the ideal memorial may be had. The orchestral numbers of the programme were given with an excellence which indicated the full appreciation of both the conductor and the players, about eighty musicians in all, of the occasion. Especially fine were both the reading and execution in the Siegfried-Idyl and the Introduction to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg. The vocal numbers were given by Mr. Charles R. Adams, who sang the Lohengrin Legend with much the same excellence of method as on a former occasion; Madame Gabriella Boema and Mr. Georg Henschel. Madame Boema, a native of Bohemia and a prima donna of considerable reputation in Europe and elsewhere, showed herself possessed of very great dramatic abilities joined to a voice of remarkable power and purity of tone. She was greatly praised for her rendering of the selection from Tannhauser and for the Weber number recalled twice and thrice with much enthusiasm. Mr. Henschel surrendered the conductorship of the orchestra to the experienced hand of Mr. Bernard Listemann for a short time, and sang the Pögnier's Address in the spirited and delightful manner usual with his vocal performances and was cordially greeted as usual. The programme for the next concert, which will be rehearsed next Friday afternoon and formally given on Saturday evening, will be as follows, Miss Mary H. How being the soloist: Overture ("Jubilee"), Weber; the Spirit song, Haydn; symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; capriccio ("The Sentinel"), Müller; scena ("Il Profeta"), Meyerbeer; March, slave (new, first time), Tschairowsky.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Memorial Programme in Honor of Richard Wagner.

The 20th concert of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, and the occasion was made notable by the presentation of a memorial programme in honor of Richard Wagner, from whose works, with a single exception, the selection for the evening was made. The soloists were Mme. Gabriella Boema, soprano; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. Henschel, baritone, the numbers being as follows:

Prelude....."Tristan"
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell....."Lohengrin"
Siegfried-Idyl....."Siegfried"
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song,
"Tannhauser"
Introduction, Pögnier's Address
"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Prelude....."Parsifal"
Scena and Aria, "Oberon"....."Weber"
Death March....."Götterdämmerung"

The public interest in this particular programme can be best realized from the facts that audiences aggregating between 5000 and 6000 persons listened to it at the public rehearsal of Friday afternoon and last evening, and that upon each occasion the keenest appreciation of the several selections was shown. An admirable opportunity was given by the presentation of the several numbers to compare the writings of Wagner during the larger part of the entire period of his most active life, the "Tannhauser" selection, dating 1845, representing almost his earliest notable effort in the epoch of musical history in which he has taken so prominent a part; while the "Parsifal" prelude gave a hint of the final contribution of the master to the great works of the world of music which he has so greatly enriched by his life's labors. The rare beauty of the "Siegfried-Idyl," and the strongly marked character of the "Mastersingers" introduction, made these the more enjoyable of the orchestral selections, but the generally excellent manner of the presentation of all the instrumental numbers, notwithstanding the necessarily hurried preparation of the programme afforded much enjoyment in even the less familiar and pleasing "Prelude" to "Tristan" and "Parsifal." The "Death march," with its strange characteristics, gave a fitting finale to the programme of orchestral numbers, and the strikingly effective blending of its leading motifs stamp this as one of the greatest efforts of Wagner's strongest period. Mme. Gabriella Boema made her first appearance here on this occasion, and proved an artist well worthy the exceptional approval with which her audience rewarded her efforts. Her voice is essentially a dramatic soprano, having all the characteristics demanded for compositions of the larger and broader style. Its culture shows the result of intelligent and thorough study, and, both in recitative and aria, Mme. Boema displays admirable artistic instinct and general excellence in execution. Her voice is evenly developed, her upper tones pure and strong, and, though the use of the tremolo is somewhat noticeable, it does not seriously mar her vocal work. Her most satisfactory effort, in some ways, was in her earlier number, as the Weber scena and aria proved rather a severe tax upon her abilities. The demands of the latter number were admirably met, so far as the singer's powers could meet them, but there was at all times an evidence of a lack of reserve power. Mme. Boema completely won her audience by her satisfactory efforts in both numbers, and was recalled with enthusiastic applause after each appearance. Mr. Adams again gave his remarkable interpretation of the "Lohengrin" selection, and made quite as great an impression as when he sang it at these concerts last season, winning a generous recognition of his meritorious work from the audience. Mr. Henschel's appearance as soloist, while Mr. Listemann assumed the baton temporarily, was pleasantly recognized, and his delivery of the "Address" from the "Mastersingers" was characterized by the same excellences as have been commended heretofore in these columns.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Music Hall was crowded last Saturday evening as it is only on occasions of special interest. As had been announced, this, the twentieth concert of the course, was given in commemoration of the death of Richard Wagner. The programme was made up, with a single exception, from the great master's works, and was—
Prelude to "Tristan" (1859).
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell, from "Lohengrin" (1847).
Siegfried-Idyl (1871).
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song, from "Tannhauser" (1845).
Introduction.....from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (1867).
Prelude to "Parsifal" (1881).
Scena and Aria from "Oberon".....Weber
"The stone that covers thy remains shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever young and new-creating life. (From Wagner's Opera Oratorio at Weber's Grave.)"
Death March from "Götterdämmerung" (1874).
Mme. Gabriella Boema, Mr. Charles R. Adams and Mr. Henschel were the singers.

The playing of the "Tristan" prelude was incomparably the finest that we have ever heard from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The wind instruments were in exact tune, and the whole rendering was characterized by a poetic purpose and an unity of action absolutely admirable. The "Siegfried-Idyl" also was excellently played, save at one point, where all the song-birds chime in together in twittering concert; here there appeared to be something the matter with the flutes and reeds. The Introduction to "The Mastersingers" was played about as well as usual; with fire and vigor, but a trifle coarsely. In the "Death-March" from "Götterdämmerung," the four additional tubas were out of tune with the orchestra, and even among themselves. Neither was the rendering of this wonderful movement marked by any especially fine traits. The "Parsifal" prelude was, on the other hand, exceedingly well played.

Mr. Adams sang the selection from "Lohengrin" superbly, from the heart and to the heart. He was, perhaps, not in his very best voice, but his admirable style, his adequate conception of the music, and the knightly dignity and fervor of sentiment he infused into his singing showed us the grand composition in its truest meaning. Mr. Henschel sang Pögnier's address, from the "Mastersingers" to perfection and with immense effect. Mrs. Boema is a singer who has come to us almost unheralded; her voice is a brilliant, vibrant soprano of excellent quality and great power; her use of it singularly fine, saving that now and then something of tremolo is apparent. Of her performance it may truly be said that she came, sang and conquered. She is one of the most dramatic of singers; she knows just where to throw all her energy, carries phrases through to a really grand climax. Neither does her singing lack variety; overwhelming as are her grand outbursts, these are not the only weapons she has in her armory. In a word, she is a singer who knows just what to do, and can do it. Not since Parepa has the great "Ocean, du Ungeheuer" been so superbly sung here; and even that great singer, although Mrs. Boema's superior in physical means, and also, perhaps, in perfect finish of vocal art, did not display such irresistible dramatic force as she. True, Mrs. Boema, like every great singer we have ever heard, has her shortcomings. Her tremolo is not praiseworthy, and now and then she allows herself to be thrown off her balance; whether by insufficient familiarity with the text or by a certain want of absolute mastery over herself were hard to determine. But, both in the scene from "Tannhäuser" and in the one from "Oberon" there were moments when her singing almost "went to pieces," very much as when the wind suddenly gives out in an organ. But these slips were of short duration, and should properly come under the chapter of accidents. In both cases she recovered herself with admirable presence of mind, and one can truly say that such occasional lapses count almost as nothing in singing that is in other respects so artistic, powerful and superb. Mrs. Boema's appearance here has been really an event. Upon the whole, the concert was a worthy tribute to the memory of the great man in whose honor it was given.

The programme was selected with much good judgment; the works played and sung being characteristic of many phases of the master's genius. From a purely orchestral point of view, so to speak, it was eminently interesting to hear the "Siegfried Idyl" and the march from "Götterdämmerung" at the same concert; the one written for an orchestra that would have been modest even for Haydn, the other calling into play an array of instruments wholly exceptional even at the present day—we believe, it is the fullest score in existence, except Berlioz's "Dies Irae." Wagner's phenomenal command over the orchestra is as apparent in the one case as in the other. With small means he could do wonders, and in the larger score one finds nothing superfluous.

Boston Correspondence.

BOSTON, February 22.

AS I have already stated in last week's letter, the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for last Saturday, was changed, so as to form a memorial programme in honor of Richard Wagner. It was the twentieth concert of this season, and the numbers rendered were:

Prelude....."Tristan."
Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell....."Lohengrin."
Siegfried Idyl....."
Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song....."Tannhäuser."
Introduction to and Pogner's Address from

"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Prelude....."Parsifal."
Scena and Aria, "Oberon".....Weber
Death March....."Götterdämmerung."

The orchestral work was throughout very rough and with little finish to it. The introduction to the "Mastersingers" and the prelude to "Tristan" went best, although to the musician who, like myself, has heard all of the above works ("Parsifal" excepted) over and over again in Germany, it is a matter for regret to see how Mr. Henschel often passes over the finest passages without attaching any meaning to them whatever, producing thereby the same effect as when an actor declaims a very fine passage in a parrot-like manner, speaking the words, to be sure, but without evidently understanding their value or their meaning. For example, in the introduction to the "Mastersingers," after the first twenty-six bars, a sudden change, not alone in the key, but also in the whole orchestral coloring, introduces the first indication of the "Preislied" melody, which afterward goes through the whole opera. This passage has to be played mit Ausdruck (expressive) and sehr ruhig (very quiet), to bring out properly its beauties and the contrast to the preceding twenty-six bars. At the concert last Saturday, nothing in the playing of the orchestra indicated to the intelligent listener that the conductor understood the meaning of this passage. The worst performance of the evening was, however, that of the "Death March," from the "Götterdämmerung." I heard this piece when it was first played at Bayreuth under Wagner's supervision, and have since heard it often by the best orchestras in Germany, but I almost failed to recognize it here, so distorted and unintelligible was its rendering. This "Funeral March" is not one after the common pattern, but is a grandly and originally conceived musical composition. The situation in the opera is the following: Siegfried, having been out hunting with Hagen and King Gunther and his followers, is now resting in the woods on the banks of the Rhine, recounting to them some of his adventures. Hagen, who has conspired to kill Siegfried, suddenly plunges his spear into his back and he expires in a few moments. Hereupon, the followers forming a litter with their spears, bear the dead Siegfried slowly to the castle of Gunther, accompanied by the latter who is grief stricken at the sudden death of Siegfried. It is during this procession, that the orchestra plays the "Death March," and it is the intention of the composer to let the life of Siegfried, who is thus slowly borne away, pass once more in review, as it were, before the listener, which he attains by introducing one after another different motives illustrating different episodes in Siegfried's life, and which are worked in together with the march theme proper. It is as I say, grandly conceived, and the effect from the stage is overpowering. It is, of course, no easy task for a conductor to reproduce such a work, especially to properly bring out those different episodes; and Mr. Henschel utterly failed therein, jumbling one motive into the other without any sense or meaning, making the whole thereby an uninteresting nothing.

It is not pleasant to have to pick flaws like this; but no service is rendered the public by saying this or that was "excellent" or "bad," which anybody, according to prejudice, can say of a musical performance without being able to give any reasons for saying so. It is high time that musical criticism in this country should be criticism more than in name. The leading papers of America should learn to appreciate its beneficial influence which they could exert on the musical education of the people, if they would engage competent men to write in their musical columns, and not think that any reporter is good enough to write so-called "musical criticisms."

The soloists at the concert in question were Mme. Gabriella Boema, who sang the selection from "Tannhäuser," and the aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon." She has a powerful voice, and sings musically and with much dramatic force, although a frequent tremulo did much to mar the enjoyment of her otherwise excellent singing. Mr. Charles Adams sang the "Lohengrin" legend and farewell in a masterly style, and Mr. Henschel gave the address of Togner from the "Mastersingers" in a very spirited manner. Both gentlemen, however, were evidently suffering from a cold, as their voices sounded somewhat husky. The Siegfried Idyl was taken too slow, and too much in the same tempo, making it monotonous, and the "Parsifal" Prelude is the weakest composition of Wagner that I know.

LOUIS MAAS.

New York played a Funeral March and another instrumental work in honor of Wagner's memory; Boston gave an entire concert to commemorate the passing away of the great composer. If one bears in mind that the news reached here in the middle of the week, and that the concert took place Saturday, will prove how much Boston's musical resources have grown. Here is the programme. With one exception, the works are by Wagner:

Prelude.—(Tristan, 1859.) Lohengrin's Legend and Farewell.—(Lohengrin, 1847.) Siegfried Idyll.—(1871.) Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song.—(Tannhäuser, 1845.) Introduction—Pogner's Address.—(The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, 1867.) Prelude.—(Parsifal, 1881.) Scena and Aria (Oberon).—Weber. "The stone that covers thy remains shall become the rock in the desert, out of which once the Almighty struck the fresh spring. From it shall flow until most distant times a glorious stream of ever young and new creating life."—(From Wagner's Funeral Oration at Weber's Grave.)

Death March.—(Götterdämmerung, 1874.)

Strange to say, the chief success of the Wagner Concert was won by the Weber number! The tuneful vein of the finale of "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," carried everything before it. Mme. Gabriella Boema proved herself a good dramatic soprano, a trifle tremulous at times from excess of power of tone, somewhat uncertain in the lowest register, and not very decisive in rapid passages, but having said this we have enumerated all the faults, and the merits were very marked. There was a good dramatic delivery throughout the recitative of the number, and the varying emotions of the aria (saving the rapid, joyous utterances of the close) were admirably portrayed. In the Tannhäuser aria she sang with much refinement of feeling. She won a double recall after the first named number.

Mr. Adams sang Lohengrin's "Farewell" with artistic understanding, but his voice, although not in very bad condition, did not always second him perfectly. The accompaniment also seemed to hamper him somewhat. But his use of the falsetto was artistically managed, and the climax of the end was very broad and noble.

The same trouble as regards accompaniment was present in Mr. Henschel's singing of "Pogner's Address." The artist has frequently done better in this aria. The instrumental numbers were creditably done, but, as some of them have been recently performed at these concerts, and reviewed by me, I need not enter into detail. The "Siegfried Idyll" was the best played and the best adapted for concert use, and won the most applause. The first and last numbers of the programme were the most impressive, the final one being especially well played. The concert drew out an audience that completely packed Music Hall, and when I add that the public rehearsal had a similar crowd, you can judge of the interest displayed by the Boston public. Mr. Henschel deserves praise for originating and carrying out the idea of such a tribute to Wagner's memory, and I can also add that, although I frequently disagree with his readings of the older masters and do not think him a great conductor, his conceptions of the modern school are always earnest, broad and successful. That he has created much of the musical interest now existing in Boston cannot be denied. It is only when compared to such experienced conductors as Thomas, or Zerrahn that he seems weak, the more so since such vast claims have been made for him. Besides a man like Max Bruch (who will soon be in Boston), he must of course appear small, but I may close by saying that we have aspirants for conductor's honors in Boston, who are not nearly so well fitted for the post as he, and upon all who have Boston's musical advancement at heart, would be sorry to find filling it.

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Jubilee.) WEBER.

THE SPIRIT SONG. HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in A. No. 7, op. 92. BEETHOVEN.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.—

CAPRICCIO. (The Sentinel.) HILLER.

SCENA. (Il Profeta.) MEYERBEER.

MARCH SLAVE. TSCHAIKOWSKY.
(New. First time.)

SOLOIST:

MISS MARY H. HOW.

THE SPIRIT SONG.

HAYDN.

Hark! what I tell to thee,
Nor sorrow o'er the tomb,
My Spirit wanders free,
And waits till thine shall come.

All pensive and alone,
I see thee sit and weep,
Thy head upon the stone,
Where my cold ashes sleep.

I watch thy speaking eyes,
And mark each falling tear;
I catch thy passing sighs,
Ere they are lost in air.

Hark! what I tell to thee,
Nor sorrow o'er the tomb,
My Spirit wanders free,
And waits till thine shall come.

SCENA. (Il Profeta.)

MEYERBEER

Ah figlio! Mio figlio!
Di madre affetto
Si fu più accetto
D'ogn' altro amor,
Di Berta ancor!
Lo so, i miei di per salvare.
I tuoi, dato hai tu, e d più il tuo ben!
Ah figlio! che di ro?
Ah, verso il ciel,
Mia prece voglio alzare,
Di beni il ciel
Si colmi appien,
Ah si figlio!
Si benedica il ciel!

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture. (Jubilee.).....Weber.
The Spirit Song.....Haydn.
Miss Mary H. How.
Symphony in A No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace—Allegretto.—
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con
brio.—
Capriccio. (The Sentinel.).....Hiller.
Scena. (Il Profeta.).....Meyerbeer.
Miss How.
March Slave.....Tchaikowsky
(New. First time.)

Rather a military programme, since the first overture winds up with the English national anthem, the last march with portion of the Russian, the Hiller number is soldier's music, and even the symphony, in its first and last movements, has a martial rhythm. The overture was very clearly played, even the brilliant contrapuntal work in the final God save the Queen being remarkably precise and effective. Miss How's voice has decidedly improved, and her singing of Haydn's Spirit Song (a work which has some of the characteristics of Beethoven's In questo Tomba, proved her possessed of a good legato delivery, and real refinement of expression. Her contrast of timbre between the first verse, and the succeeding phrase, "all pensive and alone," was very artistic, but at the close of the air she was a trifle in advance of the true tempo, and orchestra lagged, causing a slight aberration. Her second aria was well calculated to display the large compass of her voice and was well sung both in the higher and lower registers, but in the passage Mia prece voglio alzare she was flat from pitch, for the only time during the evening.

The symphony was in the main well rendered and well read. We like the tempo in which the second movement was taken, but it seemed rather heavy at its close. The vivid contrasts with which the whole work abounds were strongly enough marked, and the rustic flavor of the first part, as well as the decided rhythm of the last movement were given with decision and effect. The short, forcible notes of the brass, at the finale might, however, have had greater power. In The Sentinel, the rhythmic figure of the bass which represents the sentry's steady tread, with its occasional mysterious pauses, as if the soldier were suddenly placed on the alert, was very excellently performed, and the tender theme of the clarinet afterwards echoed in the strings and other instruments, was also deserving of praise. The Slavonic March has also a sub-figure, which is very similar to that of The Sentinel, and short rolls of side drum in the same style. Its trio, with all possible effects of quaintness in the wood-wind, and the return to the first wild and mournful theme which is gradually wrought up to a wonderful finale with cymbals, whirled flutes and other modern orchestral devices, was exciting, to say the least. The next concert offers two novelties, one, a new pianist—Miss Adele Margulies—and the other the new Bruch symphony, which was deferred on account of the unexpected Wagner concert. The following is the programme in detail:

Overture. (Fidello.).....Beethoven
Concerto for Piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Maestoso—Larghetto—Allegro vivace. Scherzando—
Symphony in E. No. 3. (MS.).....Max Bruch
Andante sostenuto; Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo. (Vivace, con
spirito.)
Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)—
(New. First time.)
Piano Solo. } a. Au bord d'une source.....Liszt
 } b. Tarantelle.....Nic. Rubinstein
a. Danse des Prêtresses. } Samson et Dalila. Saint-Saëns
b. Bacchanale. (First time.)

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a spirited and well-colored performance of Weber's "Jubilee" overture. The symphony was Beethoven's in A, No. 7. It received an admirable interpretation, and was a vast improvement upon the reading given it last season. The allegretto, in particular, was rendered in an exceptionally fine manner, and the performance throughout left but little to be desired. It was in many respects the best symphony work Mr. Henschel has vouchsafed this season. Hiller's quaint, interesting, and effective capriccio, "The Sentinel," was heard again with pleasure through an excellent performance. The concert ended with a Slavie March by Tchaikowsky, which was given for the first time here. It is a curious mixture of grim seriousness and inexplicable triviality, highly effective in its sober moments and almost ludicrously ear-tickling at other times. A strain of the Russian national air is introduced toward the end with startling effect. The scoring is brilliant and strikingly original; but the musical worth of the composition is not great. The soloist was Miss Mary H. How, who sang Haydn's "Spirit Song" smoothly and broadly and with chaste expression. Her other contribution to the concert was Fides' scena, "Ah figlio," from "The Prophet," in which she was not so successful, the pathos and marked expressiveness of the music having eluded her. At the next concert a MS. symphony in E, by Max Bruch, will be played, and selections from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," both for the first time here. The soloist will be Miss Adele Margulies, who is to perform Chopin's concerto in F minor, and selections by Liszt and Nicolas Rubinstein.

Twenty-first Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening. The following programme was performed: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; the Spirit Song, Haydn; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Capriccio (The Sentinel), Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; March Slave (new, first time), Tchaikowsky. The performance throughout was one of the best of the season. The overture was given with great spirit and skill, and the symphony, barring too rapid a tempo in one or two instances, was given a very refined, thoughtful and appreciative rendering. As a whole this symphony was performed better than any others of Beethoven that have been given this season, and proved very interesting and satisfactory. Hiller's original caprice was performed in a manner to which no exception could be taken, and the brilliant march which closed the performance was given in a masterly fashion, especially the strong and exhilarating finale. Miss How, who was the soloist of the evening, sang with great success, and showed that she has of late made a marked advance in her art. The Haydn song was the better done, as her work in the Meyerbeer selection seemed to lack something of expression. The concert next Saturday evening will introduce a new pianist—Miss Adele Margulies—and the following programme will be performed: Overture (Fidello), Beethoven; Concerto for Piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.), Max Bruch; Piano Solo—a, Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b, Tarantelle, Rubinstein; c, Danse des Prêtresses, d, Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila), Saint-Saëns (first time).

Journal

THE SPIRIT SONG.

HAYDN.

Hark! what I tell to thee,
Nor sorrow o'er the tomb,
My Spirit wanders free,
And waits till thine shall come.

All pensive and alone,
I see thee sit and weep,
Thy head upon the stone,
Where my cold ashes sleep.

I watch thy speaking eyes,
And mark each falling tear;
I catch thy passing sighs,
Ere they are lost in air.

Hark! what I tell to thee,
Nor sorrow o'er the tomb,
My Spirit wanders free,
And waits till thine shall come.

SCENA. (Il Profeta.)

MEYERBEER

Ah figlio! Mio figlio!
Di madre affetto
Si fu più accetto
D'ogn' altro amor.
Di Berta ancor!
Lo so, i miei di per salvare.
I tuoi, dato hai tu, e d più il tuo ben!
Ah figlio! che di ro?
Ah, verso il ciel,
Mia prece voglio alzare,
Di beni il ciel
Si colmi appien,
Ah si figlio!
Si benedica il ciel!

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture. (Jubilee.).....Weber.
The Spirit Song.....Haydn.
Miss Mary H. How.
Symphony in A No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace—Allegretto.—
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con
brio.—
Capriccio. (The Sentinel.).....Hiller.
Scena. (Il Profeta.).....Meyerbeer.
Miss How.
March Slave.....Tschaikowsky
(New. First time.)

Rather a military programme, since the first overture winds up with the English national anthem, the last march with portion of the Russian, the Hiller number is soldier's music, and even the symphony, in its first and last movements, has a martial rhythm. The overture was very clearly played, even the brilliant contrapuntal work in the final God save the Queen being remarkably precise and effective. Miss How's voice has decidedly improved, and her singing of Haydn's Spirit Song (a work which has some of the characteristics of Beethoven's In questo Tomba, proved her possessed of a good legato delivery, and real refinement of expression. Her contrast of timbre between the first verse, and the succeeding phrase, "all pensive and alone," was very artistic, but at the close of the air she was a trifle in advance of the true tempo, and orchestra lagged, causing a slight aberration. Her second aria was well calculated to display the large compass of her voice and was well sung both in the higher and lower registers, but in the passage Mia prece voglia alzare she was flat from pitch, for the only time during the evening.

The symphony was in the main well rendered and well read. We like the tempo in which the second movement was taken, but it seemed rather heavy at its close. The vivid contrasts with which the whole work abounds were strongly enough marked, and the rustic flavor of the first part, as well as the decided rhythm of the last movement were given with decision and effect. The short, forcible notes of the brass, at the finale might, however, have had greater power. In The Sentinel, the rhythmic figure of the bass which represents the sentry's steady tread, with its occasional mysterious pauses, as if the soldier were suddenly placed on the alert, was very excellently performed, and the tender theme of the clarinet afterwards echoed in the strings and other instruments, was also deserving of praise. The Slavonic March has also a sub-figure, which is very similar to that of The Sentinel, and short rolls of side drum in the same style. Its trio, with all possible effects of quaintness in the wood wind, and the return to the first weird and mournful theme which is gradually wrought up to a wonderful finale with cymbals, whirled flutes and other modern orchestral devices, was exciting, to say the least. The next concert offers two novelties, one, a new pianist—Miss Adele Margulies—and the other the new Bruch symphony, which was deferred on account of the unexpected Wagner concert. The following is the programme in detail:

Overture. (Fidello.).....Beethoven
Concerto for Piano in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Maestoso—Larghetto—Allegro vivace. Scherzando—
Symphony in E. No. 3. (MS.).....Max Bruch
Andante sostenuto; Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo. (Vivace, con
spirito.)
Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)—
(New. First time.)
Piano Solo. { a. Au bord d'une source.....Liszt
b. Tarantelle.....Nic. Rubinstein
a. Danse des Prêtresses. { Samson et Dalila. Saint-Saëns
b. Bacchanale. (First time.)

Boston Symphony Concert. Gazette

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a spirited and well-colored performance of Weber's "Jubilee" overture. The symphony was Beethoven's in A, No. 7. It received an admirable interpretation, and was a vast improvement upon the reading given it last season. The allegretto, in particular, was rendered in an exceptionally fine manner, and the performance throughout left but little to be desired. It was in many respects the best symphony work Mr. Henschel has vouchsafed this season. Hiller's quaint, interesting, and effective capriccio, "The Sentinel," was heard again with pleasure through an excellent performance. The concert ended with a Slavie March by Tschaikowsky, which was given for the first time here. It is a curious mixture of grim seriousness and inexplicable triviality, highly effective in its sober moments and almost ludicrously ear-tickling at other times. A strain of the Russian national air is introduced toward the end with startling effect. The scoring is brilliant and strikingly original; but the musical worth of the composition is not great. The soloist was Miss Mary H. How, who sang Haydn's "Spirit Song" smoothly and broadly and with chaste expression. Her other contribution to the concert was Fides' scena, "Ah figlio," from "The Prophet," in which she was not so successful, the pathos and marked expressiveness of the music having eluded her. At the next concert a MS. symphony in E, by Max Bruch, will be played, and selections from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," both for the first time here. The soloist will be Miss Adele Margulies, who is to perform Chopin's concerto in F minor, and selections by Liszt and Nicolas Rubinstein.

Twenty-first Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening. The following programme was performed: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; the Spirit Song, Haydn; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Capriccio (The Sentinel), Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; March Slave (new, first time), Tschaikowsky. The performance throughout was one of the best of the season. The overture was given with great spirit and skill, and the symphony, barring too rapid a tempo in one or two instances, was given a very refined, thoughtful and appreciative rendering. As a whole this symphony was performed better than any others of Beethoven that have been given this season, and proved very interesting and satisfactory. Hiller's original caprice was performed in a manner to which no exception could be taken, and the brilliant march which closed the performance was given in a masterly fashion, especially the strong and exhilarating finale. Miss How, who was the soloist of the evening, sang with great success, and showed that she has of late made a marked advance in her art. The Haydn song was the better done, as her work in the Meyerbeer selection seemed to lack something of expression. The concert next Saturday evening will introduce a new pianist—Miss Adele Margulies—and the following programme will be performed: Overture (Fidello), Beethoven; Concerto for Piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.), Max Bruch; Piano Solo—a, Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b, Tarantelle, Rubinstein; c, Danse des Prêtresses, d, Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila), Saint-Saëns (first time).

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-First Programme of This Season's Series.

The 21st programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Miss Mary H. How and the selections as follows:

Overture, ("Jubilee").....Weber.
The Spirit Song.....Haydn.
Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven.
Capriccio, ("The Sentinel").....Hiller.
Scena, ("Il Profeta").....Meyerbeer.
March Slave.....Tschalkowsky.

Beethoven's estimate of his seventh symphony is a just valuation of its merits, for he spoke of it as "the grand symphony in A, one of my very best." Familiar as the work is by reason of its frequent playing, its beauties are such that each new hearing gives a fresh pleasure, and its melodious characteristics reward the closest study of its several movements. The story of the first performance of this great composition inevitably comes to the mind in listening to its presentation, and the imagination easily pictures the scene as the almost deaf composer directed the orchestra, which included the leading musicians and composers of the day. Among the string players were Romberg, Spohr, Mayseder and Dragonetti, while Hummel and Meyerbeer had the drums, Moscheles the cymbals and Beethoven's old teacher gave the time to the drums and salvos. The presentation of the work last evening was in keeping with its value as one of the highest examples of Beethoven's genius. While all the movements were read with admirable taste and intelligence by Mr. Henschel, there was a fidelity shown in producing the marked strength, vigor and, sometimes, grotesque originality of the finale, which gave exceptional pleasure in listening to the concluding portion of the work. The Tschalkowsky "March," heard here for the first time on this occasion, proved one of the most interesting novelties of the season, the striking originality of the introduction, the artistic use of the old Slavonic national airs and the theme of the Russian hymn, as well as the power and brilliancy shown in the masterly use of instruments, combining to hold alike the interest of the casual listener and that of the musical student. The work of the orchestra in this and the remaining instrumental numbers was eminently satisfactory, and the appreciation of the audience was generously shown through the evening. Miss How made by far her most successful effort on this occasion, and the merits of her vocal work richly deserved the exceptional favor shown this promising artist. Haydn's song was given with rare expression, and the delivery of the Meyerbeer scena displayed the keenest artistic instincts in the singer. Her voice appears to have improved in many ways since last season, and the musical intelligence exhibited in both of last evening's numbers shows the result of the most thorough study. As a whole, the programme proved one of the best offered this season, and the delight manifested by the audience, in listening to the instrumental numbers other than the symphony, fully proves the wisdom of this season's policy in making a lighter programme than those of many of the concerts of last year.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme was performed in Music Hall, Saturday evening last, at the twenty-first concert, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; the "Spirit Song," Haydn; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Capriccio (The Sentinel), Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; March Slave (new, first time), Tschalkowsky. The excellence of this programme was equalled only by the manner of its performance. Both were so satisfactory to the large audience present that encores were imminent as to several numbers, and would doubtless have been given had not the established rule forbidden. The Beethoven Symphony is one of the most spirited of all the composer's works, and its interpretation by Mr. Henschel and his orchestra on this occasion left very little to be desired. It seemed at times as though the tempo was somewhat too fast; but that was probably in accordance with the composer's intention, who ought to know better than others what he means, or how his work should be given. The performance of the other numbers of the programme was equally satisfactory, especially the overture and the Slav March. The latter was new and another rendering, which it is hoped may be given, will be needed to fully estimate its value. There could be no doubt, however, of the martial and general high character of its music. Miss How's singing was greatly praised for its beauty and expression in the Haydn song and the evidence of careful training in her art in the Meyerbeer selection. The next concert will be given as usual, on Saturday evening, at the same place when the following programme will be performed: Overture (Fidello), Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.), Max Bruch; Piano solo—a, Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b, Tarantelle, Rubinstein; a, Danse des Pretresses, b, Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila), Saint-Saens (first time). The soloist for this occasion will be Miss Adele Margulies, a new pianist.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1883

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-first concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening; the programme was as follows:

Jubilee Overture.....Weber
The Spirit Song.....Haydn
Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven
Capriccio, ("The Sentinel").....Hiller
Scena from "Il Profeta".....Meyerbeer
March Slave.....Tschalkowsky
(New. First time.)

Miss Mary H. How was the singer.

Weber's brilliant overture, which we are accustomed to hear at the end, rather than at the beginning of concerts, was played with striking effectiveness. The wonderful A-major symphony was given, in the main, superbly. Except in the Scherzo, Mr. Henschel's tempo carried the conviction of their own reason of being with them; they were admirably maintained and seemed just right, full of character and definite purpose. Not such tempi as are commonly misnamed "natural," such as Tom, Dick or Harry might take, and which, from their common-placeness, strike the truly musical sense as just wrong. In the second movement, too, we were glad to note once more that Mr. Henschel did not allow the principal theme to fall into the secondary position of a mere accompanying figure in presence of the more melodious cantilena which makes its appearance after the first twenty-six measures, and upon which most orchestras are inclined to throw such emphasis as casts all else into the shade. But we cannot feel the correctness of Mr. Henschel's tempo in the Scherzo; we can find no suggestion of presto in it, so heavy and lazy does it seem. This very slow tempo has, moreover, the disadvantage of depriving the "Assai meno presto" ("much less fast") in the Trio of all contrast. Hiller's fascinating and romantic little capriccio was delightfully played. As for Tschalkowsky's Slavic March, one does not quite know what to say. There certainly are impressive moments in it, but there is also much that is very trivial. One feels at times that the composer must have made a bet, for all that his professional reputation was worth, that he would write the most absolutely hideous thing that had ever been put on paper, and won it, too. Verily the passion for the fantastic and horrible has brought composition to a pretty pass nowadays. Here is a march, in writing which the composer surely had no especial object to gain by being hideous and terrific; true, he may have wished to give a musical sketch of the sort of country his Slavs were marching through, but even this was no excuse for his writing a piece of music so frightful that, to call it a tone-picture of Pandemonium would have been thought, twenty years ago, an unkind aspersion on the devil.

Miss How's rich and beautiful contralto was heard to good advantage in Haydn's ghostly "Spirit Song." The selection from the "Prophet" was less suited to the singer's capabilities. In addition to an organ of unusual splendor, she has feeling, and a natural capacity to express it strongly; but she has not yet acquired that even smoothness of delivery without which anything like fine phrasing is impossible; she sings too jerkily, and has little notion of working a long passage up to a dramatic climax.

The next programme is:

Overture to "Fidello".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E No. 3. (MS.).....Max Bruch
(New. First time.)
Pianoforte Solo.
a, "Au Bord d'une source".....Liszt
b, Tarantelle.....Nic. Rubinstein
Danse des Pretresses. } from "Samson Bacchanale. }
et Dalila.....Saint-Saens.
(First time.)

Miss Adele Margulies will be the pianist.

THE WEEKLY CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE TWENTY-FIRST ENTERTAINMENT IN THE SERIES — THE THEATRICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR THE WEEK; A SUMMARY CHANGE OF ATTRACTION AT THE PARK—A VARIETY OF NEWS AND GOSSIP OF THE STAGE.

A programme of moderate length, as compared with the average of those which have preceded it this season, and remarkably bright and stirring as a whole, was presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its twenty-first concert on Saturday evening. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, to which the phrase "bright and stirring" may be applied more appropriately than to any other of the nine, among which it is conspicuous for its capriciousness and at times almost boisterous vivacity. The other orchestral selections associated with the symphony were Weber's spirited "Jubilee" overture; Hiller's capriccio, "The Sentinel," which was performed at one of these concerts last season—a very striking conceit, belonging to the better class of "tone-paintings;" and the "Slav" march by Tschalkowsky, a new work which formed the sole novelty of the concert. This march, widely different as it is from the other works mentioned, is nevertheless well in keeping with the general enlivening character common to them all. Enlivening it certainly was, though the main purpose of the composer was evidently to produce an effect far more profound than this adjective describes. Nor will we presume to belittle his success in picturing the heroic and sombre aspects of a national character and history with which he may be presumed to be far more fully in sympathy than any one of a different nationality; but the sensational element of a work of this kind inevitably first impresses the average listener. The sensuous side of one's musical nature is first and most deeply penetrated by such martial rhythms, emphasized by such strongly marked drum-beats as abound in this work, and hardly less by its wild, almost savage minor melodies and its original orchestral coloring, well in keeping with the general character of the work. But this fact does not prevent the music from striking deeper than the tympanum, and indeed if one finds any considerable spiritual meaning, his enjoyment of it is only the broader and more complete. How much of real musical value there is in the work we will not attempt to guess after hearing it only once, especially as we found it so exhilarating a change from the more conventional beauties of the works to which it formed an afterpiece as to forget to listen critically. It is easy to find amusement in the grotesque elements of such a composition, provided one be in the mood for amusement, but what may seem grotesque to the super-

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-First Programme of This Season's Series.

The 21st programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Miss Mary H. How and the selections as follows:

- Overture, ("Jubilee").....Weber.
- The Spirit Song.....Haydn.
- Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven.
- Capriccio, ("The Sentinel").....Hiller.
- Scena, ("Il Profeta").....Meyerbeer.
- March Slave.....Tschalkowsky.

Beethoven's estimate of his seventh symphony is a just valuation of its merits, for he spoke of it as "the grand symphony in A, one of my very best." Familiar as the work is by reason of its frequent playing, its beauties are such that each new hearing gives a fresh pleasure, and its melodious characteristics reward the closest study of its several movements. The story of the first performance of this great composition inevitably comes to the mind in listening to its presentation, and the imagination easily pictures the scene as the almost deaf composer directed the orchestra, which included the leading musicians and composers of the day. Among the string players were Romberg, Spohr, Mayseder and Dragonetti, while Hummel and Meyerbeer had the drums, Moscheles the cymbals and Beethoven's old teacher gave the time to the drums and salvos. The presentation of the work last evening was in keeping with its value as one of the highest examples of Beethoven's genius. While all the movements were read with admirable taste and intelligence by Mr. Henschel, there was a fidelity shown in producing the marked strength, vigor and, sometimes, grotesque originality of the finale, which gave exceptional pleasure in listening to the concluding portion of the work. The Tschalkowsky "March," heard here for the first time on this occasion, proved one of the most interesting novelties of the season, the striking originality of the introduction, the artistic use of the old Slavonic national airs and the theme of the Russian hymn, as well as the power and brilliancy shown in the masterly use of instruments, combining to hold alike the interest of the casual listener and that of the musical student. The work of the orchestra in this and the remaining instrumental numbers was eminently satisfactory, and the appreciation of the audience was generously shown through the evening. Miss How made by far her most successful effort on this occasion, and the merits of her vocal work richly deserved the exceptional favor shown this promising artist. Haydn's song was given with rare expression, and the delivery of the Meyerbeer scena displayed the keenest artistic instincts in the singer. Her voice appears to have improved in many ways since last season, and the musical intelligence exhibited in both of last evening's numbers shows the result of the most thorough study. As a whole, the programme proved one of the best offered this season, and the delight manifested by the audience, in listening to the instrumental numbers other than the symphony, fully proves the wisdom of this season's policy in making a lighter programme than those of many of the concerts of last year.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme was performed in Music Hall, Saturday evening last, at the twenty-first concert, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; the "Spirit Song," Haydn; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Capriccio (The Sentinel), Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; March Slave (new, first time), Tschalkowsky. The excellence of this programme was equalled only by the manner of its performance. Both were so satisfactory to the large audience present that encores were imminent as to several numbers, and would doubtless have been given had not the established rule forbidden. The Beethoven Symphony is one of the most spirited of all the composer's works, and its interpretation by Mr. Henschel and his orchestra on this occasion left very little to be desired. It seemed at times as though the tempo was somewhat too fast; but that was probably in accordance with the composer's intention, who ought to know better than others what he means, or how his work should be given. The performance of the other numbers of the programme was equally satisfactory, especially the overture and the Slav March. The latter was new and another daring, which it is hoped may be given, will be needed to fully estimate its value. There could be no doubt, however, of the martial and general high character of its music. Miss How's singing was greatly praised for its beauty and expression in the Haydn song and the evidence of careful training in her art in the Meyerbeer selection. The next concert will be given as usual, on Saturday evening, at the same place when the following programme will be performed: Overture (Fidelio), Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.), Max Bruch; Piano solo—a, Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b, Tarantelle, Rubinstein; c, Danse des Pretresses, b, Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila), Saint-Saens (first time). The soloist for this occasion will be Miss Adele Margulies, a new pianist.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1883

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-first concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening; the programme was as follows:

- Jubilee Overture.....Weber
- The Spirit Song.....Haydn
- Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven
- Capriccio, ("The Sentinel").....Hiller
- Scena from "Il Profeta".....Meyerbeer
- March Slave.....Tschalkowsky

(New. First time.)
Miss Mary H. How was the singer.
Weber's brilliant overture, which we are accustomed to hear at the end, rather than at the beginning of concerts, was played with striking effectiveness. The wonderful A-major symphony was given, in the main, superbly. Except in the Scherzo, Mr. Henschel's tempo carried the conviction of their own reason of being with them; they were admirably maintained and seemed just right, full of character and definite purpose. Not such tempo as are commonly mis-called "natural," such as Tom, Dick or Harry might take, and which, from their common-placeness, strike the truly musical sense as just wrong. In the second movement, too, we were glad to note once more that Mr. Henschel did not allow the principal theme to fall into the secondary position of a mere accompanying figure in presence of the more melodious cantilena which makes its appearance after the first twenty-six measures, and upon which most orchestras are inclined to throw such emphasis as casts all else into the shade. But we cannot feel the correctness of Mr. Henschel's tempo in the Scherzo; we can find no suggestion of presto in it, so heavy and lazy does it seem. This very slow tempo has, moreover, the disadvantage of depriving the "Assai meno presto" ("much less fast") in the Trio of all contrast. Hiller's fascinating and romantic little capriccio was delightfully played. As for Tschalkowsky's Slavie March, one does not quite know what to say. There certainly are impressive moments in it, but there is also much that is very trivial. One feels at times that the composer must have made a bet, for all that his professional reputation was worth, that he would write the most absolutely hideous thing that had ever been put on paper, and won it, too. Verily the passion for the fantastic and horrible has brought composition to a pretty pass nowadays. Here is a march, in writing which the composer surely had no especial object to gain by being hideous and terrific; true, he may have wished to give a musical sketch of the sort of country his Slavs were marching through, but even this was no excuse for his writing a piece of music so frightful that, to call it a tone-picture of Pandemonium would have been thought, twenty years ago, an unkind aspersion on the devil.

Miss How's rich and beautiful contralto was heard to good advantage in Haydn's ghostly "Spirit Song." The selection from the "Prophet" was less suited to the singer's capabilities. In addition to an organ of unusual splendor, she has feeling, and a natural capacity to express it strongly; but she has not yet acquired that even smoothness of delivery without which anything like fine phrasing is impossible; she sings too jerkily, and has little notion of working a long passage up to a dramatic climax.

- The next programme is:
- Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven
 - Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
 - Symphony in E No. 3. (MS.).....Max Bruch
- (New. First time.)
Pianoforte Solo.
a, "Au bord d'une source".....Liszt
b, Tarantelle.....Nic. Rubinstein
Danse des Pretresses. { from "Samson
Bacchanale. { et Dalila".....Saint-Saens.

(First time.)
Miss Adele Margulies will be the pianist.

THE WEEKLY CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE TWENTY-FIRST ENTERTAINMENT IN THE SERIES — THE THEATRICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS FOR THE WEEK; A SUMMARY CHANGE OF ATTRACTION AT THE PARK—A VARIETY OF NEWS AND GOSSIP OF THE STAGE.

A programme of moderate length, as compared with the average of those which have preceded it this season, and remarkably bright and stirring as a whole, was presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra at its twenty-first concert on Saturday evening. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, to which the phrase "bright and stirring" may be applied more appropriately than to any other of the nine, among which it is conspicuous for its capriciousness and at times almost boisterous vivacity. The other orchestral selections associated with the symphony were Weber's spirited "Jubilee" overture; Hiller's caprice, "The Sentinel," which was performed at one of these concerts last season—a very striking conceit, belonging to the better class of "tone-paintings," and the "Slav" march by Tschalkowsky, a new work which formed the sole novelty of the concert. This march, widely different as it is from the other works mentioned, is nevertheless well in keeping with the general enlivening character common to them all. Enlivening it certainly was, though the main purpose of the composer was evidently to produce an effect far more profound than this adjective describes. Nor will we presume to belittle his success in picturing the heroic and sombre aspects of a national character and history with which he may be presumed to be far more fully in sympathy than any one of a different nationality; but the sensational element of a work of this kind inevitably first impresses the average listener. The sensuous side of one's musical nature is first and most deeply penetrated by such martial rhythms, emphasized by such strongly marked drum-beats as abound in this work, and hardly less by its wild, almost savage minor melodies and its original orchestral coloring, well in keeping with the general character of the work. But this fact does not prevent the music from striking deeper than the tympanum, and indeed if one finds any considerable spiritual meaning, his enjoyment of it is only the broader and more complete. How much of real musical value there is in the work we will not attempt to guess after hearing it only once, especially as we found it so exhilarating a change from the more conventional beauties of the works to which it formed an afterpiece as to forget to listen critically. It is easy to find amusement in the grotesque elements of such a composition, provided one be in the mood for amusement, but what may seem grotesque to the super-total view may be the honest reflection of times necessary to give the work its intended local color, and one in a soberly receptive mood may discover in it not a little to stir him deeply. For the originality of ideas and orchestral treatment displayed by the composer, if for no other reason, the march is well worth a respectful hearing. The ingenious manner in which the Russian national air is introduced into the closing measures of the march, without seeming to be "lugged in," of itself bespeaks the hand of a master.

Of the work of the orchestra during the evening it is not necessary to speak with much detail; it was very satisfactory throughout. It would not be easy to find fault with the performance of the symphony. The finale, especially, which did not go very well last season, was this time taken and maintained at a very just tempo, and was played with very appropriate spirit and clear and forcible delineation of details. The other orchestral selections were admirably performed. An agreeable foil to the strong colors which prevailed throughout the instrumental portion of the concert was furnished by the more sedate vocal selections by Miss Mary H. How, the soloist. These were the Spirit song, by Haydn, and the scene, "Ah, figlio," from "The Prophet" of Meyerbeer. Both were given with that rare good taste and moderation, that earnest sincerity of style and that expressive beauty of voice that the singer revealed to the patrons of these concerts last season. Her best work, however, was done in the Haydn song, which was given with exquisite beauty of expression and pensive sweetness of voice. The Meyerbeer scene was only less admirably sung, its chief weakness lying in the singer's lack of dramatic intensity.

The soloist for the next concert will be a new pianist, Miss Adele Margulies, and the programme will be as follows:—

Overture ("Fidelio"), Beethoven; concerto for piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E, No. 3 (M.S. new, first time), Max Bruch; piano solo (a) "Au bord d'une source," Liszt; (b) "Tarantelle," Nic. Rubinstein; (a) "Danse des Prêtresses," (b) "Bacchanale," from "Samson et Dalila," (first time), Saint-Saëns.

The Boston Symphony Concert of last Saturday presented a single novelty, as will be seen by the following programme: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; The Spirit Song, Haydn; Miss Mary H. How. Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Poco sostenuto; Vivace—Allegretto. Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo—Allegro con brio—Capriccio (The Sentinel). Hiller; Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; Miss How. March Slave, Tchaikowsky (new; first time).

Miss How sang with real breadth and feeling, and showed a marked improvement over her work of last year. The Meyerbeer aria was well calculated to display the large compass of her voice, and the spirit song (which, by the way, is not a drinking song) was noticeable for artistic contrast of timbre, and for earnest expression. As it had no forcible climax, no brilliant cadenza, no musical pyrotechnics of any kind, it did not win adequate applause. Once only in the course of Miss How's singing did I notice a flattening from pitch, a fault often found in a heavy voice like hers.

The symphony was given with a trifle too much of robustness and strength, but I found the tempo to be well taken, especially in the second movement, which Beethoven purposely changed to a quicker time than andante. The concert was full of military and brass band effects. The audience, however, seemed to relish it extremely, and the orchestra is well equipped for this kind of loudness. The last time that the Jubel Overture was performed in Boston the audience rose to their feet at the English anthem and remained standing. No such international courtesy was shown on this occasion, though it might be more sensible to rise at this than at the hallelujah chorus in the "Messiah." The "Slavonic

March" is a series of Russian melodies of weird and melancholy character, developed in the most striking modern manner with whirls of piccolo, startling contrasts, and strange wood-wind effects.

The Henschel vocal recitals came to a close last Monday evening with a request programme, in which, although nothing new was sung, the very best of the old repertoire was presented in a charming manner. The requests received demonstrated two facts: First, Mr. Henschel is liked best in the Loewe School of heroic ballads; and second, Mrs. Henschel is associated in the public mind with cradle songs.

Through the courtesy of Mr. George Henschel, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Society, we had the pleasure of listening, on Thursday evening, to one of the private rehearsals of that orchestral body, in which we recognized many personal old friends. Here, also, the strings (among whom we noticed Bern. Listemann, Leopold Lichtenberg and Carl Loeffler on the first violin; Wilhelm Mueller and Ernst Jonas on the cello, and Manoli on the contrabass) are the most proficient part of the organization, but the woodwind and brass are also highly acceptable and the whole forms an orchestra of which Boston may well be proud. We heard under Mr. Henschel's bâton two movements of Beethoven's A major Symphony, the "Fidelio" Overture, Weber's "Jubel" Overture and a new Slavonic march in B flat minor, by Peter Tschaikowsky, which is a highly interesting, if somewhat noisy, composition. As one can best appreciate an artist in his studio, so one also has the best chances for fairly judging a conductor when rehearsing; and let us here say at once that we were rather well pleased with Mr. Henschel's efforts in this direction. He evidently is a true artist, and in this capacity has done excellently. His orchestra plays with a good ensemble, in good tune, and follows the conductor's intentions. That the latter are so far concentrated mainly on obtaining the above results and a correct reading of the score, instead of refined working out of detail, seems to us to be the natural result of the newness of the organization and of Mr. Henschel's not very great experience in conducting. As both these drawbacks diminish with every day, we do not see why highly gratifying artistic results should not ultimately be attained. Mrs. L. L. L. 24 July 83 cial view may be the honest reflection of tints necessary to give the work its intended local color, and one in a soberly receptive mood may discover in it not a little to stir him deeply. For the originality of ideas and orchestral treatment displayed by the composer, if for no other reason, the march is well worth a respectful hearing. The ingenious manner in which the Russian national air is introduced into the closing measures of the march, without seeming to be "lugged in," of itself bespeaks the hand of a master.

Of the work of the orchestra during the evening it is not necessary to speak with much detail; it was very satisfactory throughout. It would not be easy to find fault with the performance of the symphony. The finale, especially, which did not go very well last season, was this time taken and maintained at a very just tempo, and was played with very appropriate spirit and clear and forcible delineation of details. The other orchestral selections were admirably performed. An agreeable foil to the strong colors which prevailed throughout the instrumental portion of the concert was furnished by the more sedate vocal selections by Miss Mary H. How, the soloist. These were the Spirit song, by Haydn, and the scene, "Ah, figlio," from "The Prophet" of Meyerbeer. Both were given with that rare good taste and moderation, that earnest sincerity of style and that expressive beauty of voice that the singer revealed to the patrons of these concerts last season. Her best work, however, was done in the Haydn song, which was given with exquisite beauty of expression and pensive sweetness of voice. The Meyerbeer scene was only less admirably sung, its chief weakness lying in the singer's lack of dramatic intensity.

The soloist for the next concert will be a new pianist,—Miss Adele Margulies,—and the programme will be as follows:—

Overture ("Fidelio"), Beethoven; concerto for piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E, No. 3 (MS. new, first time), Max Bruch; piano solo (a) "Au bord d'une source," Liszt; (b) "Farantelle," Nic. Rubinstein; (a) "Danse des Prêtresses," (b) "Bacchanale," from "Samson et Dalila," (first time), Saint-Saëns.

The Boston Symphony Concert of last Saturday presented a single novelty, as will be seen by the following programme: Overture (Jubilee), Weber; The Spirit Song, Haydn; Miss Mary H. How. Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Poco sostenuto: Vivace—Allegretto. Presto: Assai meno presto: Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.—Capriccio (The Sentinel). Hiller: Scena (Il Profeta), Meyerbeer; Miss How. March Slave, Tschaikowsky (new: first time).

Miss How sang with real breadth and feeling, and showed a marked improvement over her work of last year. The Meyerbeer aria was well calculated to display the large compass of her voice, and the spirit song (which, by the way, is not a drinking song) was noticeable for artistic contrast of timbre, and for earnest expression. As it had no forcible climax, no brilliant cadenza, no musical pyrotechnics of any kind, it did not win adequate applause. Once only in the course of Miss How's singing did I notice a flattening from pitch, a fault often found in a heavy voice like hers.

The symphony was given with a trifle too much of robustness and strength, but I found the tempi to be well taken, especially in the second movement, which Beethoven purposely changed to a quicker time than andante. The concert was full of military and brass band effects. The audience, however, seemed to relish it extremely, and the orchestra is well equipped for this kind of loudness. The last time that the Jubel Overture was performed in Boston the audience rose to their feet at the English anthem and remained standing. No such international courtesy was shown on this occasion, though it might be more sensible to rise at this than at the hallelujah chorus in the "Messiah." The "Slavonic

March" is a series of Russian melodies of weird and melancholy character, developed in the most striking modern manner with whirls of piccolo, startling contrasts, and strange wood-wind effects.

The Henschel vocal recitals came to a close last Monday evening with a request programme, in which, although nothing new was sung, the very best of the old repertoire was presented in a charming manner. The requests received demonstrated two facts: First, Mr. Henschel is liked best in the Loewe School of heroic ballads; and second, Mrs. Henschel is associated in the public mind with cradle songs.

Through the courtesy of Mr. George Henschel, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Society, we had the pleasure of listening, on Thursday evening, to one of the private rehearsals of that orchestral body, in which we recognized many personal old friends. Here, also, the strings (among whom we noticed Bern. Listemann, Leopold Lichtenberg and Carl Loeffler on the first violin; Wilhelm Mueller and Ernst Jonas on the 'cello, and Manoli on the contrabass) are the most proficient part of the organization, but the woodwind and brass are also highly acceptable and the whole forms an orchestra of which Boston may well be proud. We heard under Mr. Henschel's bâton two movements of Beethoven's A major Symphony, the "Fidelio" Overture, Weber's "Jubel" Overture and a new Slavonic march in B flat minor, by Peter Tschaikowsky, which is a highly interesting, if somewhat noisy, composition. As one can best appreciate an artist in his studio, so one also has the best chances for fairly judging a conductor when rehearsing; and let us here say at once that we were rather well pleased with Mr. Henschel's efforts in this direction. He evidently is a true artist, and in this capacity has done excellently. His orchestra plays with a good ensemble, in good tune, and follows the conductor's intentions. That the latter are so far concentrated mainly on obtaining the above results and a correct reading of the score, instead of refined working out of detail, seems to us to be the natural result of the newness of the organization and of Mr. Henschel's not very great experience in conducting. As both these drawbacks diminish with every day, we do not see why highly gratifying artistic results should not ultimately be attained.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Fidelio.) BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in F minor, No. 2, op. 21. CHOPIN.
Maestoso.—Larghetto.—Allegro vivace.—

SYMPHONY in E. No. 3. (MS.) MAX BRUCH.
Andante sostenuto; Allegro.—Adagio.—Scherzo. (Vivace, con spirito).—
Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace).—
(New. First time.)

PIANO SOLO.

a. AU BORD D'UNE SOURCE. LISZT.

b. TARANTELE. NIC. RUBINSTEIN.

a. DANSE DES PRÊTRESSES. } Samson et Dalila. SAINT-SAËNS.
b. BACCHANALE. }
(First time.)

SOLOIST:

MISS ADELE MARGULIES.

Miss Margulies will use a Steinway Piano.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture. (Fidello.)..... Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21..... Chopin
Maestoso—Larghetto—Allegro vivace. Scherzando—
Symphony in E. No. 3. (MS.)..... Max Bruch
Andante sostenuto; Allegro—Adagio—Scherzo. (Vivace, con
spirito.)
Finale. (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace.)—
(New. First time.)
Piano Solo. { a. Au bord d'une source..... Liszt
 b. Tarantelle..... Nic. Rubinstein
a. Danse des Prêtresses. { Samson et Dalila. Saint-Saëns
b. Bacchanale. (First time.)
Soloist, Miss Adele Margulies.

A programme somewhat longer than usual, containing more than the ordinary amount of novelty, and chiefly remarkable for the strong rhythmic, almost military character of its leading numbers. Almost everything was forte and fortissimo. Even the Chopin concerto is rather in the impetuous than in the sad vein of the composer. It introduced a new pianist to Boston. Miss Margulies at once made a good impression by her simple and unaffected manner, and her playing, if not yet well rounded, showed an artistic thought and insight. Her ideal was, however, higher than her execution. She gave a spirited rendering of the work, but it was an outline sketch rather than a full picture. Her scale runs were blurred, and the finale was rather jerkily played, and at the very close lacked the breadth which should have been most of all in this portion of the work. The larghetto was the best played movement, and proved that the pianist possessed good touch and a poetry which did not run into sentimentality. The orchestra was out of time more than once in the final movement. Miss Margulies' solos were given in a very pleasing manner and won most hearty applause. The orchestral work of the evening was good, as it generally is when the compositions are strong and powerful and have a well marked rhythm. We have space for a few remarks upon the new works only. The symphony is a fine one in its vein, which seems to be almost altogether military. The themes are all either marchlike, or broadly majestic as if the work were a hymn of Thanksgiving. There is continuity apparent also, for not only are several of the motives derived one from the other, but the same motives reappear with frequency in various parts of the work. The way in which Bruch can work up a military theme is apparent in such works as Fair Ellen, where The Campbells are Coming is made the basis of a most graphic development. The development of the themes of the first movement of this symphony is scarcely less grand. The slow movement seems to represent the devotional character. It has finely harmonized themes for brass quartet as in the Parsifal prelude, and fully as effective. The thematic treatment is very marked in the scherzo, which is practically founded on a figure of five notes, which not only forms the central idea of the movement but makes an abrupt and effective coda. The last movement, on a first hearing, seemed rather too much like "noise and fury, signifying nothing." It seems intricate enough, but not nearly so spontaneous or impressive as the other three. The two Saint-Saëns selections were odd enough to make one overlook the occasional straining for bizarrierie. The percussive instruments had, as in the previous numbers, to do a good deal of the work. The Danse was largely represented by united violins, and pizzicato effects reminding of Delibes' style in his Sylvia. The second, however, was wildly and furiously oriental, and did not escape, in its trio, bringing in strong reminiscences of the Suite Algerienne. The clash of cymbals, the clack of castanets, and the full force of a large orchestra, proved that the composer was picturing a very decided jamboree, and had succeeded. The next programme presents Mr. Toedt as soloist, and the following numbers:

Overture. (Genoveva)..... Schumann
Recitative and Air. (Iphigénie en Tauride)..... Gluck
Symphonic Poem. (The Tempest.) op. 31..... John K. Paine
[Conducted by the Composer.]
Songs with Piano.
a. "Lehn deine Wang' an Meine Wang'..... Jensen
b. "In Liebeslust"..... Liszt
Symphony in F. No. 8, op. 93..... Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.—

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 22d concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Miss Adele Margulies, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture ("Fidello")..... Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21..... Chopin
Symphony in E No. 3 (MS.)..... Max Bruch
Piano solo—(a) Au bord d'une source..... Liszt
 (b) Tarantelle..... Nic. Rubinstein
(a) Danse des Prêtresses. (b) Bacchanale, "Samson et Dalila"..... Saint-Saëns

The Max Bruch symphony was heard here for the first time on this occasion, the work being the one written for, and dedicated to, the New York Symphony Society, and played at its concert in December last, under the direction of Dr. Damrosch. It is modelled upon the Beethoven plan, and, though its themes and general characteristics are rather trivial for such a class of composition, there are evidences of careful, though not inspired, effort in all of the movements, which are as follows: Andante sostenuto, allegro, adagio, scherzo (vivace, con spirito). Finale (allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace). There is not a marked ability displayed in the use of the various instruments of the orchestra, and the brief themes are elaborated in a methodical fashion which gives little enjoyment to the listener. The best writing has been done in the finale, which shows an ability not observable in either of the earlier movements. As a whole, the symphony has little in it which will give it a permanent place upon concert programmes, though it has evidences of musical powers on the part of the composer which may result in more satisfactory works of this class later on. The soloist of the evening, Miss Adele Margulies, is a little lady who came from Vienna a year ago, and has been heard with the Theodore Thomas orchestra in other cities. Her playing has many sterling qualities, and the natural grace of her stage presence gave quite an indescribable charm to all her efforts. She lacks the physique at present (she is yet in her teens) to make an altogether effective artist in such a large auditorium with an orchestral accompaniment, but the intelligence and clearness of her interpretation of the numbers assigned her showed inborn genius of a rare quality. The solo selections fairly captivated the audience, and her playing created quite a sensation, particularly on account of the lack of any pretension on the part of the performer. The Saint-Saëns numbers were charming novelties, having all the quaint concert and dash of this composer's work, and, with the ever enjoyable "Fidello" overture, made up an admirably varied and pleasing programme. The work of the orchestra was evenly good in all the numbers, and the large audience gave many evidences of its appreciation.

Harold

MUSICAL GAZETTE

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was an exceptionally interesting one. It opened with the "Fidelio" overture, which was admirably interpreted. The symphony was by Max Bruch, and is still in manuscript. In form and treatment it shows but little of the eccentricity of the modern school. More than that it is melodious, strong and impressive. Its fault is in its persistently heavy orchestration which deprives it of needed contrast in effects. It opens with a dignified Andante sostenuto, abundant in fine work, and full of interest. The opening allegro is fiery, broad and stirring, somewhat triumphal in character, and only fails of achieving the best results through the noisiness of its instrumentation. The adagio has a flowing and stately theme, and is richly scored, but here again is want of contrast in the treatment of the orchestra. The scherzo is highly pleasing, of marked originality, vigorous in character, and charmingly scored throughout, especially for the wood wind. The finale is brilliant and stirring, large in style and masterly in its harmonies; but it is not always clear, and the fullness that pervades the score so painfully finds its culmination here and becomes at last monotonous. Still, such are the strength and the merits of the work that it is entitled to the most respectful consideration. We trust an opportunity may be afforded of hearing it again. The interpretation of it by the orchestra was distinguished by equal spirit and earnest care. The concert ended with a Dance of Priestesses and a Bacchanal from the "Samson and Dalila" of Saint-Saëns. The former is sensuous, pretty and quaint, and the latter melodious and effective. Both are strikingly original in theme and treatment, and of remarkable beauty and finish in orchestration. They were charmingly performed. The soloist was Miss Adele Margulies, who was heard here for the first time. She played Chopin's piano concerto in F minor, Liszt's "Au Bord d'une Source," and a Tarantelle by N. Rubinstein. The young artist, who interested everybody by her modest bearing, proved to be a delightful player. She has not great physical power, but her technique is beautiful in its brilliancy, its delicacy, its precision, and its high artistic refinement. She interpreted the concerto with an exquisitely tender grace and rare warmth of sentiment. Her playing throughout was characterized by purity of taste, expressiveness free from all affectation, perfect ease, and a sympathy with the sentiment of the work that was thoroughly charming. We have not often listened to a more chaste, a more interesting, or a more poetic performance of the concerto than was vouchsafed by Miss Margulies on this occasion. It only lacked something more of physical strength in the player to have made it satisfying in all things. She at once won the esteem and admiration of her hearers, and was recalled three times with great applause. Her performance of the Liszt selection was a fine display of delicate and graceful technique. The Tarantelle was taken at so rapid a pace that its rhythm was lost and its effect marred. Miss Margulies made so pleasing and so favorable an impression that we are sure she may rely upon a cordial welcome whenever she appears here again. At the next concert Mr. J. K. Paine's symphonic poem, "The Tempest," will be performed. It will be conducted by the composer. Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8, will also be given. The soloist is to be Mr. T. J. Toedt.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was unusually prolific of novelties, presenting two orchestra works here for the first time, and having for a soloist Miss Adele Margulies. Miss Margulies played Chapin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, and two solos. Max Bruch's third symphony in E, which is still in manuscript, and extracts from Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila," were the new instrumental attractions, while the concert was introduced by Beethoven's familiar Fidelio overture. The symphony proved to be in Bruch's usual happy vein. It was very fairly delivered. The work of the soloist of the evening was good and well received. The orchestra was in general good condition during the greater part of the evening, though they did not play the opening numbers in as good time as usual. This was owing, of course, to a lack of sufficient care in tuning the instruments previous to the concert. The programme for next week is as follows: Overture (Genoveva), Schumann; recitative and air (Iphigénie en Tauride), Gluck; symphonic poem (The Tempest) op. 31, John K. Paine, conducted by the composer; songs with piano, (a) "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen, (b) "In Liebeslust," Liszt; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven; soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT. The twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday night, when the following programme was performed: Overture (Fidelio), Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS., new, first time), Max Bruch; Piano solo, a. Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b. Tarantelle, Nic. Rubinstein; c. Danse des Prêtresses; d. Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila, first time), Saint-Saëns. Miss Adele Margulies was the soloist, and made her first appearance in Boston on this occasion. She proved to be an exceptionally fine player for a young woman still in her teens, and although as yet lacking in physical power she has an excellent style, and plays with unusual intelligence and spirit. The orchestral work was good throughout the evening, and a fine performance was given to the symphony—which proved to be an important one, with its movements brilliantly and effectively worked out. The new selections from Saint-Saëns proved to be exquisitely constructed and melodious, and made a very agreeable impression. The next programme presents Mr. Toedt as soloist, and the following numbers: Overture (Genoveva), Schumann; Recitative and Air (Iphigénie en Tauride), Gluck; Symphonic Poem (The Tempest), op. 31, John K. Paine, conducted by the composer; Songs with Piano—a. "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven.

MR. HENSCHEL RE-ENGAGED.

The musical public will learn with pleasure that Mr. Georg Henschel has been re-engaged for next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and that arrangements are being made which promise a most interesting series of concerts next season by this organization. No details of the plans have been made public, but there are indications that Boston will enjoy orchestral concerts next year which will rival any former performances of this class in this country. There is a possibility that Mr. Henschel may also lead a choral society of his own organization and his vocal recitals will also be made a marked feature of the musical season of 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-second concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.).....Max Bruch
(New. First time.)
Pianoforte solo—
a. "Au bord d'une source".....Liszt
b. Tarantelle.....Nic. Rubinstein
Danse des Prêtresses, { from "Samson et Dalila"
Bacchanale, { (First time.) Saint-Saëns

Miss Adele Margulies was the pianist.

Being obliged to take in the opera on Saturday evening, we could only go to the Friday-afternoon rehearsal of this concert. Max Bruch's symphony is a gorgeous piece of scoring—perhaps too uniformly gorgeous to escape monotony. It is melodious in its themes, in so far as there is a total absence of anything like ugliness or monstrosity, and struck us as rather an agreeable and euphonious than an interesting work. We enjoyed each successive movement heartily, in an animal sort of a way, but should have been puzzled to recall a single phrase two minutes afterwards. The ballet music from "Samson et Dalila" shows Saint-Saëns at his cleverest. Such cunning handling of the orchestra, such making much out of slight material, is worth listening to. Miss Margulies, the young pianist, has a positively astounding technique, and plays [the most taxingly difficult passages with absolute ease, clearness and grace. Since von Bülow played here, we have not heard anything played so exactly as it was written as she played the Chopin concerto. Every slightest hint in the text was given its full value. More than this, Miss Margulies plays with delightful expressiveness, and with the purest musical sense of beauty. All she lacks is physical strength.

The next programme is—

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Recitative and air from "Iphigénie en Tauride", Gluck
Symphonic Poem (The Tempest) op. 31, John K. Paine
(Conducted by the Composer.)
Songs with Pianoforte:
a. "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang".....Jensen
b. "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven
Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the singer.

... It is the current gossip that the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season will number a round hundred.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-second concert at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was well attended, notwithstanding the great throng of musical people who were at the Italian opera. The following programme was performed: Overture (Fidelio) Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21. Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS., new, first time) Max Bruch; Piano solo, a. Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b. Tarantelle, Nic. Rubinstein; c. Danse des Prêtresses; d. Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila, first time), Saint-Saëns. The work of the orchestra was exceptionally good, all the numbers (including the new Bruch Symphony, which proved to be one of much interest) being played with smooth and excellent effect. Miss Adele Margulies was the soloist, and for a young miss, as she may be termed, performed the Chopin pianoforte concerto and Liszt solo remarkably well. With the spirit and intelligence of her playing will come more strength and training in the future, and she will doubtless become an excellent artist. The twenty-third concert will be rehearsed as usual next Friday afternoon and performed on Saturday evening, the following being the programme: Overture (Genoveva), Schumann; Recitative and Air (Iphigénie en Tauride), Gluck; Symphonic Poem (The Tempest), op. 31, John K. Paine, conducted by the composer; Songs with piano—a. "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. Mr. Theodore Toedt will be the soloist.

MUSICAL Gossip

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was an exceptionally interesting one. It opened with the "Fidelio" overture, which was admirably interpreted. The symphony was by Max Bruch, and is still in manuscript. In form and treatment it shows but little of the eccentricity of the modern school. More than that it is melodious, strong and impressive. Its fault is in its persistently heavy orchestration which deprives it of needed contrast in effects. It opens with a dignified Andante sostenuto, abundant in fine work, and full of interest. The opening allegro is fiery, broad and stirring, somewhat triumphal in character, and only falls of achieving the best results through the noisiness of its instrumentation. The adagio has a flowing and stately theme, and is richly scored, but here again is want of contrast in the treatment of the orchestra. The scherzo is highly pleasing, of marked originality, vigorous in character, and charmingly scored throughout, especially for the wood wind. The finale is brilliant and stirring, large in style and masterly in its harmonies; but it is not always clear, and the fulness that pervades the score so painfully finds its culmination here and becomes at last monotonous. Still, such are the strength and the merits of the work that it is entitled to the most respectful consideration. We trust an opportunity may be afforded of hearing it again. The interpretation of it by the orchestra was distinguished by equal spirit and earnest care. The concert ended with a Dance of Priestesses and a Bacchanale from the "Samson et Dalila" of Saint-Saëns. The former is sensuous, pretty and quaint, and the latter melodious and effective. Both are strikingly original in theme and treatment, and of remarkable beauty and finish in orchestration. They were charmingly performed. The soloist was Miss Adele Margulies, who was heard here for the first time. She played Chopin's piano concerto in F minor, Liszt's "Au Bord d'une Source," and a Tarantelle by N. Rubinstein. The young artist, who interested everybody by her modest bearing, proved to be a delightful player. She has not great physical power, but her technique is beautiful in its brilliancy, its delicacy, its precision, and its high artistic refinement. She interpreted the concerto with an exquisitely tender grace and rare warmth of sentiment. Her playing throughout was characterized by purity of taste, expressiveness free from all affectation, perfect ease, and a sympathy with the sentiment of the work that was thoroughly charming. We have not often listened to a more chaste, a more interesting, or a more poetic performance of the concerto than was vouchsafed by Miss Margulies on this occasion. It only lacked something more of physical strength in the player to have made it satisfying in all things. She at once won the esteem and admiration of her hearers, and was recalled three times with great applause. Her performance of the Liszt selection was a fine display of delicate and graceful technique. The Tarantelle was taken at so rapid a pace that its rhythm was lost and its effect marred. Miss Margulies made so pleasing and so favorable an impression that we are sure she may rely upon a cordial welcome whenever she appears here again. At the next concert Mr. J. K. Paine's symphonic poem, "The Tempest," will be performed. It will be conducted by the composer. Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8, will also be given. The soloist is to be Mr. T. J. Toedt.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was unusually prolific of novelties, presenting two orchestra works here for the first time, and having for a soloist Miss Adele Margulies. Miss Margulies played Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, and two solos. Max Bruch's third symphony in E, which is still in manuscript, and extracts from Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila," were the new instrumental attractions, while the concert was introduced by Beethoven's familiar Fidelio overture. The symphony proved to be in Bruch's usual happy vein. It was very fairly delivered. The work of the soloist of the evening was good and well received. The orchestra was in general good condition during the greater part of the evening, though they did not play the opening numbers in as good tune as usual. This was owing, of course, to a lack of sufficient care in tuning the instruments previous to the concert. The programme for next week is as follows: Overture (Genoveva), Schumann; recitative and air (Iphigénie en Tauride), Gluck; symphonic poem (The Tempest) op. 31, John K. Paine, conducted by the composer; songs with piano, (a) "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen, (b) "In Liebeslust," Liszt; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven; soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT. The twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday night, when the following programme was performed: Overture (Fidelio), Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS., new, first time), Max Bruch; Piano solo, a. Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b. Tarantelle, Nic. Rubinstein; a. Danse des Pretresses; b. Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila, first time), Saint-Saëns. Miss Adele Margulies was the soloist, and made her first appearance in Boston on this occasion. She proved to be an exceptionally fine player for a young woman still in her teens, and although as yet lacking in physical power she has an excellent style, and plays with unusual intelligence and spirit. The orchestral work was good throughout the evening, and a fine performance was given to the symphony—which proved to be an important one, with its movements brilliantly and effectively worked out. The new selections from Saint-Saëns proved to be exquisitely constructed and melodious, and made a very agreeable impression.

The next programme presents Mr. Toedt as soloist, and the following numbers: Overture (Genoveva), Schumann; Recitative and Air (Iphigénie en Tauride), Gluck; Symphonic Poem (The Tempest), op. 31, John K. Paine, conducted by the composer; Songs with Piano—a. "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven.

MR. HENSCHEL RE-ENGAGED.

The musical public will learn with pleasure that Mr. Georg Henschel has been re-engaged for next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and that arrangements are being made which promise a most interesting series of concerts next season by this organization. No details of the plans have been made public, but there are indications that Boston will enjoy orchestral concerts next year which will rival any former performances of this class in this country. There is a possibility that Mr. Henschel may also lead a choral society of his own organization and his vocal recitals will also be made a marked feature of the musical season of 1883-84. March 1, 83

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-second concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.).....Max Bruch
(New. First time.)
Pianoforte solo—
a. "Au bord d'une source".....Liszt
b. Tarantelle.....Nic. Rubinstein
Danse des Pretresses, from "Samson et Dalila,"
Bacchanale, (First time.) Saint-Saëns

Miss Adele Margulies was the pianist.

Being obliged to take in the opera on Saturday evening, we could only go to the Friday-afternoon rehearsal of this concert. Max Bruch's symphony is a gorgeous piece of scoring—perhaps too uniformly gorgeous to escape monotony. It is melodious in its themes, in so far as there is a total absence of anything like ugliness or monstrosity, and struck us as rather an agreeable and euphonious than an interesting work. We enjoyed each successive movement heartily, in an animal sort of a way, but should have been puzzled to recall a single phrase two minutes afterwards. The ballet music from "Samson et Dalila" shows Saint-Saëns at his cleverest. Such cunning handling of the orchestra, such making much out of slight material, is worth listening to. Miss Margulies, the young pianist, has a positively astounding technique, and plays the most taxingly difficult passages with absolute ease, clearness and grace. Since von Bülow played here, we have not heard anything played so exactly as it was written as she played the Chopin concerto. Every slightest hint in the text was given its full value. More than this, Miss Margulies plays with delightful expressiveness, and with the purest musical sense of beauty. All she lacks is physical strength.

The next programme is—

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Recitative and air from "Iphigénie en Tauride", Gluck
Symphonic Poem (The Tempest) op. 31, John K. Paine
[Conducted by the Composer.]

Songs with Pianoforte:

a. "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang".....Jensen
b. "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven

Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the singer.

....It is the current gossip that the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season will number a round hundred.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's twenty-second concert at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was well attended, notwithstanding the great throng of musical people who were at the Italian opera. The following programme was performed: Overture (Fidelio) Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS., new, first time) Max Bruch; Piano solo, a. Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b. Tarantelle, Nic. Rubinstein; a. Danse des Pretresses; b. Bacchanale (Samson et Dalila, first time), Saint-Saëns. The work of the orchestra was exceptionally good, all the numbers (including the new Bruch Symphony, which proved to be one of much interest) being played with smooth and excellent effect. Miss Adele Margulies was the soloist, and for a young miss, as she may be termed, performed the Chopin pianoforte concerto and Liszt solo remarkably well. With the spirit and intelligence of her playing will come more strength and training in the future, and she will doubtless become an excellent artist. The twenty-third concert will be rehearsed as usual next Friday afternoon and performed on Saturday evening, the following being the programme: Overture (Genoveva), Schumann; Recitative and Air (Iphigénie en Tauride), Gluck; Symphonic Poem (The Tempest), op. 31, John K. Paine, conducted by the composer; Songs with piano—a. "Lehn deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. Mr. Theodore Toedt will be the soloist.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The strong counter-attraction of the "music drama" told somewhat on the attendance at the feast of pure music offered at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening; but, though the audience was considerably smaller than might otherwise have been expected, it was by no means of meagre proportions, and the vacancies were mainly confined to the higher-priced seats on the floor of the hall. The programme was doubly interesting from the intrinsic worth of the music presented and the large element of novelty which entered into it. The concert, in a word, was delightful from beginning to end. Its most important feature was the first production of Max Bruch's new symphony in E, No. 3, which was played from MS. score. Here is a work which, unlike so many another pretentious work that is frequently made the novel feature of our classical programmes, requires little or no guesswork or logical analysis to determine its true character on a first hearing. It bears its credentials on its face, and these proclaim in no ambiguous terms that it is a work of remarkable merit, everything considered. It manifestly does not aspire to the highest rank of symphonic composition, but it accomplishes all it sets out to do, and, if we are not greatly mistaken, rather rises above its standard than otherwise. It is a fine example of what may be accomplished by a composer with a good, but not extraordinary gift of inspiration, with exquisite musical sensibility, refined taste, great learning, and masterly command of his orchestral resources. These qualities make it impossible for him either to strain for effects beyond his powers, or to cover incompetency by shallow devices and tricks. His work is honest and straightforward, and having conceived intrinsically good material to work upon, he uses it to such excellent advantage as to produce a really impressive composition, worthy not only of respect, but of admiration. The symphony is truly a creation, and not a mere manufacture, though it is easy to see how important a part the composer's learning has played in giving shape to his musical promptings. The general character of the symphony is grave, thoughtful, dignified and chaste. It might well serve to illustrate some noble lyric treating of the more serious places of life as viewed by one with a fine, thoughtful nature, not lacking in the heroic quality, delicate fancy, and even a sense of humor, but all under the control of a well-developed judgment. The work is wholly classical in spirit, and might well have been written by a contemporary and apostle of Beethoven. Its moderation and reserve, and, not least, its fine rhythmic swing and unimpeded onflow through organic development to the goal of climax, all give gratifying assurance that the influence of the old masters has not wholly ceased to mould the style of our latter-day composers. One striking feature of this work is the manner in which the composer makes the orchestra play the part of one great instrument with varied functions, like a grand, full-toned organ, instead of making its different "voices" distinct individualities. This tendency to full scoring, although carried so far as sometimes to result in monotony, is with Bruch something more than a massing of instruments; it is rather a subtle interweaving of them, so to speak, in a manner to produce a skilfully wrought fabric, not only beautiful in its general effect, but well repaying study in its detail. One result of this method of construction is the full, singing effect which runs through the symphony. Complex as are many of the combinations, they rarely result in obscurity, but each instrument fills its proper place as an integral part of a well-defined effect. The symphony may not deserve the title of great, but it is worthy of an exalted rank as a work of high art. Its opening movement, with its impressive introduction, andante sostenuto, starting with a swell for strings on the common chord and leading up by stately measures to a spirited allegro with broad melodic themes, which are developed up to an imposing climax. This is, perhaps, the most effective of the four movements. The second, adagio, begins with a plain minor choral of antique form, ending in a major cadence precisely like that at the close of "The Old Hundredth." This sombre religious text is enlarged on by variation and contrapuntal expansion in a manner to produce what might be called a quaint musical sermon, the full bearing of which is not plain on a first hearing, but whose ingenuity and oddity make it highly interesting. It ends with a kind of refrain, like an amen, consisting of the opening phrase of the original choral. The scherzo with its strongly marked "holds" at the regular divisions of its melodies, has the flavor of a minuet in which the dancers have forgotten their courtly manners in the exhilaration of the sport. The movement is ingeniously humorous and entertaining. The finale is a skilful and impressive piece of writing, but not wholly clear on a first hearing.

The other novelties of the programme were the dances from Saint Saëns's "Samson et Dalila"—the dance of the priestesses and a "bacchanal." Both are delightful in their way. As usual with ballet music, they abound in effects of the castanets, cymbals and kettle-drums. The first of the pair strongly recalls the intermezzo of Delibes's "Sylvia," already familiar here. The "bacchanal," wild and grotesque in its melodies, is splendidly worked up, and is truly intoxicating in its suggestions of sensuous ballet evolutions. The solo part of the concert was contributed by Miss Adele Margulies, pianist, who came to this country from Vienna only about a year ago, and has played at some of Mr. Theodore Thomas's concerts. She appears to be a mere girl yet in her "teens," and her physique is slight even for one of her age. Her great effort was her performance of Chopin's concerto in F minor (No. 2, op. 21). Considering the pianist's youth and frail physique, and her apparent inexperience in public performances, her success with Chopin's work was astonishing. Her manual skill is very highly developed, and she seems almost equally at home in all varieties of technique. She has not the physical power to produce the highest effects in fortissimo passages, particularly when they are very fully scored, but even in this respect her deficiency is by no means conspicuous, and the effect of her playing is not on this account greatly impaired, even for listeners remote from the stage. Of native fire and energy she showed more than once on Saturday evening that there was little lack in her style. But the most surprising feature of her playing is the maturity of her style. She showed not only a clear comprehension of Chopin's music, but keen sympathy with its spirit, and ability to give material shape to her feeling. All the phases of this exquisitely poetic work were interpreted with almost equal luminousness, as though her playing were but a spontaneous reflection of the composer's thought. Her style is utterly free from affectations, and the purity of her musical sense is shown by her unswerving and apparently instinctive observance of the rhythmical structure of her music, a virtue lacking in so many pianists, who by a false sentimentality of expression rob the music of the form and substance which are the true basis of its sentiment. Few works offer more temptations to the pianist to over-sentimentalize than this, and its wealth of embellishment, in itself exquisitely beautiful, might easily mislead the performer from the central thought; but Miss Margulies seems to be secure from both these dangers. She showed in this instance a good sense of proportion and the relation of parts, and the ability to sustain the continuity of the composer's thought unbroken. Her best work was done in the larghetto, which offers few physical difficulties, but on the other hand is perhaps one of the highest tests of a pianist's purity of style that could be found. Who but Chopin could have created such a musical embodiment of a pensively entrancing dream? and how easy for a shallow pianist to turn it into the merest formless froth! It is sufficient praise for Miss Margulies to say that she gave it with delightful effect. Her other solos—Liszt's "Au Bord d'une Source" and a tarantelle by Nicolas Rubenstein—served to confirm, in the main, the favorable impression she had already produced. The little lady has, it is true, much to acquire in the way of largeness of style as well as in some particulars of technique, but whatever she may be in esse, here is certainly a most brilliant pianist in posse. She won a positive triumph from an audience at first perfectly indifferent to her, but at last enthusiastic in its applause, recalling her twice after her second effort.

The orchestral work of the evening was uniformly admirable. In addition to the selections already named, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture was performed in a style almost superb. For the next concert Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the soloist, and the programme will be as follows:—

Overture, ("Genoveva,") Schumann; recitative and air, ("Iphigénie en Tauride,") Gluck; symphonic poem, ("The Tempest,") op. 31, [conducted by the composer,] John K. Paine; songs with piano:—(a.) "Lehn Deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen; (b.) "In Liebeslust," Liszt; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven.

The latest concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave several novelties, as will be seen by the appended programme:

Overture (Fidelio), Beethoven. Concerto for Piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin—Maestoso, Larghetto, Allegro vivace—Miss Adele Margulies. Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.), Max Bruch: Andante sostenuto: Allegro, Adagio, Scherzo (Vivace, con spirito); Finale (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace); new, first time. Piano Solo—a. Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b. Tarantelle, Nic. Rubinstein—Miss Margulies. a. Danse Des Prêtresses; b. Bacchanale—Samson et Dalila—Saint-Saëns. First time.

I include the pianist among the novelties, since she has not been heard in Boston before. Her modest, straightforward demeanor was reflected in her playing, and in the concerto she showed an artistic insight into the spirit of the work, although the rapid passages in this, as in the Tarantelle, were somewhat blurred, and the finale was not forcible enough. But at least it was a performance of life and brio, and the larghetto showed that she had a fine touch and a poetic refinement, so it did not astonish me to find her a great favorite with the audience and winning hearty applause.

The "Bruch Symphony" is a really great work. It is almost wholly in a strong military vein, and even its slow portions have a broad, devotional character. The introduction is impressive and has some strong themes which reappear later on. The Allegro is gloriously developed, and has all the pomp of the full modern orchestral score. Yet it is melodious, too, as all Bruch's work is, in the highest sense. The Adagio is a good proof of this, where a horn quartet is finely harmonized and makes a strong effect. The Scherzo is thematically treated, one strongly marked motif of five notes being the groundwork of it all, and constituting even a remarkable cadence as coda.

The finale seems less inspired than the rest of the work, and even the strength, breadth and marked rhythm became somewhat monotonous for lack of contrast. But the work is undoubtedly a great addition to symphonic literature.

The first of the St. Saëns numbers had pizzicato consordine effects, somewhat like those used by Delibes, and the trio of the Bacchanale reminded strongly of St. Saëns' own suite algérienne. But the final moment with its crash of cymbals, clack of castanets, clang of brasses, etc., etc., was about as graphic a tone picture of a very big drunk, as could be imagined.

L. C. E.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The strong counter-attraction of the "music drama" told somewhat on the attendance at the feast of pure music offered at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening; but, though the audience was considerably smaller than might otherwise have been expected, it was by no means of meagre proportions, and the vacancies were mainly confined to the higher-priced seats on the floor of the hall. The programme was doubly interesting from the intrinsic worth of the music presented and the large element of novelty which entered into it. The concert, in a word, was delightful from beginning to end. Its most important feature was the first production of Max Bruch's new symphony in E, No. 3, which was played from MS. score. Here is a work which, unlike so many another pretentious work that is frequently made the novel feature of our classical programmes, requires little or no guesswork or logical analysis to determine its true character on a first hearing. It bears its credentials on its face, and these proclaim in no ambiguous terms that it is a work of remarkable merit, everything considered. It manifestly does not aspire to the highest rank of symphonic composition, but it accomplishes all it sets out to do, and, if we are not greatly mistaken, rather rises above its standard than otherwise. It is a fine example of what may be accomplished by a composer with a good, but not extraordinary gift of inspiration, with exquisite musical sensibility, refined taste, great learning, and masterly command of his orchestral resources. These qualities make it impossible for him either to strain for effects beyond his powers, or to cover incompetency by shallow devices and tricks. His work is honest and straightforward, and having conceived intrinsically good material to work upon, he uses it to such excellent advantage as to produce a really impressive composition, worthy not only of respect, but of admiration. The symphony is truly a creation, and not a mere manufacture, though it is easy to see how important a part the composer's learning has played in giving shape to his musical promptings. The general character of the symphony is grave, thoughtful, dignified and chaste. It might well serve to illustrate some noble lyric treating of the more serious places of life as viewed by one with a fine, thoughtful nature, not lacking in the heroic quality, delicate fancy, and even a sense of humor, but all under the control of a well-developed judgment. The work is wholly classical in spirit, and might well have been written by a contemporary and apostle of Beethoven. Its moderation and reserve, and, not least, its fine rhythmic swing and unimpeded onflow through organic development to the goal of climax, all give gratifying assurance that the influence of the old masters has not wholly ceased to mould the style of our latter-day composers. One striking feature of this work is the manner in which the composer makes the orchestra play the part of one great instrument with varied functions, like a grand, full-toned organ, instead of making its different "voices" distinct individualities. This tendency to full scoring, although carried so far as sometimes to result in monotony, is with Bruch something more than a massing of instruments; it is rather a subtle interweaving of them, so to speak, in a manner to produce a skilfully wrought fabric, not only beautiful in its general effect, but well repaying study in its detail. One result of this method of construction is the full, singing effect which runs through the symphony. Complex as are many of the combinations, they rarely result in obscurity, but each instrument fills its proper place as an integral part of a well-defined effect. The symphony may not deserve the title of great, but it is worthy of an exalted rank as a work of high art. Its opening movement, with its impressive introduction, andante sostenuto, starting with a swell for strings on the common chord and leading up by stately measures to a spirited allegro with broad melodic themes, which are developed up to an imposing climax. This is, perhaps, the most effective of the four movements. The second, adagio, begins with a plain minor choral of antique form, ending in a major cadence precisely like that at the close of "The Old Hundredth." This sombre religious text is enlarged on by variation and contrapuntal expansion in a manner to produce what might be called a quaint musical sermon, the full bearing of which is not plain on a first hearing, but whose ingenuity and oddity make it highly interesting. It ends with a kind of refrain, like an amen, consisting of the opening phrase of the original choral. The schizzo with its strongly marked "holds" at the regular divisions of its melodies, has the flavor of a minuet in which the dancers have forgotten their courtly manners in the exhilaration of the sport. The movement is ingeniously humorous and entertaining. The finale is a skilful and impressive piece of writing, but not wholly clear on a first hearing.

The other novelties of the programme were the dances from Saint Saëns' "Samson et Dalila"—the dance of the priestesses and a "baccanal." Both are delightful in their way. As usual with ballet music, they abound in effects of the castanets, cymbals and kettle-drums. The first of the pair strongly recalls the intermezzo of Delibes' "Sylvia," already familiar here. The "baccanal," wild and grotesque in its melodies, is splendidly worked up, and is truly intoxicating in its suggestions of sensuous ballet evolutions. The solo part of the concert was contributed by Miss Adele Margulies, pianist, who came to this country from Vienna only about a year ago, and has played at some of Mr. Theodore Thomas's concerts. She appears to be a mere girl yet in her "teens," and her physique is slight even for one of her age. Her great effort was her performance of Chopin's concerto in F minor (No. 2, op. 21). Considering the pianist's youth and frail physique, and her apparent inexperience in public performances, her success with Chopin's work was astonishing. Her manual skill is very highly developed, and she seems almost equally at home in all varieties of technique. She has not the physical power to produce the highest effects in fortissimo passages, particularly when they are very fully scored, but even in this respect her deficiency is by no means conspicuous, and the effect of her playing is not on this account greatly impaired, even for listeners remote from the stage. Of native fire and energy she showed more than once on Saturday evening that there was little lack in her style. But the most surprising feature of her playing is the maturity of her style. She showed not only a clear comprehension of Chopin's music, but keen sympathy with its spirit, and ability to give material shape to her feeling. All the phases of this exquisitely poetic work were interpreted with almost equal luminousness, as though her playing were but a spontaneous reflection of the composer's thought. Her style is utterly free from affectations, and the purity of her musical sense is shown by her unswerving and apparently instinctive observance of the rhythmic structure of her music, a virtue lacking in so many pianists, who by a false sentimentality of expression rob the music of the form and substance which are the true basis of its sentiment. Few works offer more temptations to the pianist to over-sentimentalize than this, and its wealth of embellishment, in itself exquisitely beautiful, might easily mislead the performer from the central thought; but Miss Margulies seem to be secure from both these dangers. She showed in this instance a good sense of proportion and the relation of parts, and the ability to sustain the continuity of the composer's thought unbroken. Her best work was done in the largo, which offers few physical difficulties, but on the other hand is perhaps one of the highest tests of a pianist's purity of style that could be found. Who but Chopin could have created such a musical embodiment of a pensively entrancing dream? and how easy for a shallow pianist to turn it into the merest formless froth! It is sufficient praise for Miss Margulies to say that she gave it with delightful effect. Her other solos—Liszt's "Au Bord d'une Source" and a tarantelle by Nicolas Rubenstein—served to confirm, in the main, the favorable impression she had already produced. The little lady has, it is true, much to acquire in the way of largeness of style as well as in some particulars of technique, but whatever she may be in esse, here is certainly a most brilliant pianist in posse. She won a positive triumph from an audience at first perfectly indifferent to her, but at last enthusiastic in its applause, recalling her twice after her second effort.

The orchestral work of the evening was uniformly admirable. In addition to the selections already named, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture was performed in a style almost superb. For the next concert Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the soloist, and the programme will be as follows:—

Overture, ("Genoveva.") Schumann; recitative and air, ("Iphigénie en Tauride.") Gluck; symphonic poem, ("The Tempest.") op. 31, [conducted by the composer.] John K. Paine; songs with piano:—(a.) "Lehn Deine Wang an meine Wang," Jensen; (b.) "In Liebeslust," Liszt; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 83, Beethoven.

The latest concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave several novelties, as will be seen by the appended programme:

Overture (Fidelio), Beethoven. Concerto for Piano-forte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin—Maestoso, Larghetto, Allegro vivace—Miss Adele Margulies. Symphony in E, No. 3 (MS.), Max Bruch: Andante sostenuto: Allegro, Adagio, Scherzo (Vivace, con spirito); Finale (Allegro con brio, ma non troppo vivace); new, first time. Piano Solo—a. Au bord d'une source, Liszt; b. Tarantelle, Nic. Rubinstein—Miss Margulies. a. Danse Des Prêtresses; b. Bacchanale—Samson et Dalila—Saint-Saëns. First time.

I include the pianist among the novelties, since she has not been heard in Boston before. Her modest, straightforward demeanor was reflected in her playing, and in the concerto she showed an artistic insight into the spirit of the work, although the rapid passages in this, as in the Tarantelle, were somewhat blurred, and the finale was not forcible enough. But at least it was a performance of life and brio, and the largo showed that she had a fine touch and a poetic refinement, so it did not astonish me to find her a great favorite with the audience and winning hearty applause.

The "Bruch Symphony" is a really great work. It is almost wholly in a strong military vein, and even its slow portions have a broad, devotional character. The introduction is impressive and has some strong themes which reappear later on. The Allegro is gloriously developed, and has all the pomp of the full modern orchestral score. Yet it is melodious, too, as all Bruch's work is, in the highest sense. The Adagio is a good proof of this, where a horn quartet is finely harmonized and makes a strong effect. The Scherzo is thematically treated, one strongly marked motif of five notes being the groundwork of it all, and constituting even a remarkable cadence as coda.

The finale seems less inspired than the rest of the work, and even the strength, breadth and marked rhythm became somewhat monotonous for lack of contrast. But the work is undoubtedly a great addition to symphonic literature.

The first of the St. Saëns numbers had pizzicato consordine effects, somewhat like those used by Debussy, and the trio of the Bacchanale reminded strongly of St. Saëns' own suite algérienne. But the final moment with its crash of cymbals, clack of castanets, clang of brasses, etc., etc., was about as graphic a tone picture of a very big drunk, as could be imagined.

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Genoveva.) SCHUMANN.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Iphigénie en Tauride.) GLUCK.

SYMPHONIC POEM. (The Tempest.) op. 31. JOHN K. PAINE.

[Conducted by the Composer.]

In four connected movements:

- I. ALLEGRO CON FUOCO, D minor. The Storm.
- II. ADAGIO TRANQUILLO, E major.
Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell.
Ariel appears. (Motives by Solo Flute, Clarinet and Harp, supported by Strings and Wind.)
- III. ALLEGRO MAESTOSO, C major. Prospero's Tale.
- IV. ALLEGRO MA NON TROPPO, D major.
The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban
(Solo Bassoon.) and Ariel. (Flutes, Harp, Clarinet and Strings.)
The Triumph of Prospero's "potent art."

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. "LEHN DEINE WANG' AN MEINE WANG." JENSEN.

b. "IN LIEBESLUST." LISZT.

SYMPHONY in F. No. 8, op. 93. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.—

SOLOIST:

MR. THEODORE J. TOEDT.

RECIT. AND AIR. (Iphigénie en Tauride.) GLUCK.

RECIT.

How these thy words, Orest, grieve me who loves thee! calm thyself, let us die worthy of each other. No longer in thy wrath reproach the Gods, thy friend and thyself. If both of us must fall a sacrifice, why tremble for thy friend? is Pylades deplorable since he may die at thy side?

AIR:

United from the earliest days of childhood, the same wishes, the same desires were ours. Now let us joyfully receive the blow that will unite us forever. Fate makes us perish together. I do not complain of its hardness. Death itself is a boon since one grave will receive us.

TWO SONGS.

(a) O LAY THY CHEEK ON MINE.

JENSEN.

O lay thy cheek on mine, dear love,
And so shall our tears flow together;
And to my heart press fast thy heart,
And so shall the flames beat together.
And when in those glowing flames shall fall
Our streams of tears fast thronging,
Holding thee close in my arms I would die,
Fainting with love's sweet longing.
O lay thy cheek on mine, dear love.

(b) IN LOVE'S BRIGHT JOY.

LISZT.

In love's bright joy, in yearning pain,
O list to me!
A thousand times I sing again!
And all for thee!
O'er hill and dale I fondly sing,
O list to me!
The world shall with my wild notes ring:—
I love but thee!
I dream and sing through silent night
In reverie;
I sing again in morning light,
I love but thee!
And when my heart shall cease to sigh,
O look on me!
And thou shalt read it in mine eye;—
I love but thee!

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The delights of the opera with Patti for its star and the discomforts of inclement weather doubtless conspired to limit the attendance on the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening, and as a result the audience was one of the smallest of the season. All who were present, however, were rewarded by an evening of well nigh unmixed pleasure—pleasure of a purely emotional kind, neither weighted with the necessity of undue intellectual effort to understand the music, nor marred by any doubt as to whether it were worth the attention it required, nor, on the other hand, unsatisfying by reason of the insipidity of the feast. Almost every selection was of solid worth, without ever degenerating into heaviness, and the concert was so short—ending at 20 minutes past nine o'clock—that no one at all musically inclined had the slightest excuse for pleading weariness, especially as the performance was of an almost uniformly high order of excellence. The interest of the concert naturally centred in the single novelty of the programme, particularly as this was a work by one of our most distinguished home musicians, Professor John K. Paine, and was performed under the composer's own direction. The character of the work, too, whose title promised something different from the severely classical order of writing that we have been accustomed to associate with this composer, belonging as it does to the general class of "programme" music, served to heighten curiosity as to the manner in which such a composer would treat a purely descriptive subject. The work, which is designated as a "symphonic poem," is entitled "The Tempest," and is intended to illustrate Shakespeare's imaginative play of that name. It consists of four movements, all, however, joined together without pause or break in the continuity of the musical thought. Its meaning and methods were so fully set forth by the programme that we cannot do better than repeat the scheme as there given, which is as follows:—

(I.) Allegro con fuoco, D minor—The Storm. (II.) Adagio tranquillo, D major—Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell. Ariel appears. (Movements by solo flute, clarinet and harp, supported by strings and wind). (III.) Allegro maestoso, C major—Prospero's aria. (IV.) Allegro ma non troppo, D major—The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban (solo bassoon) and Ariel. (Flute, harp, clarinet and strings). The triumph of Prospero's "potent art."

Professor Paine's work is a good illustration of the uncertainty of appearances. From such a title and such full detail of explanation of the work given to the listener in advance, one might well be excused for jumping to the conclusion that it would be found to be of the sensational character so common in modern "programme" music, in which form and purely musical sentiment are made subordinate to mere vividness of material suggestion; but the alchemy of genius turns even the basest elements to pure gold, and so Professor Paine, so far from being hampered by the conditions under which he placed himself in undertaking this work, has cunningly made these conditions to serve as suggestions and sources of inspiration in building up a structure of noble beauty and symmetry, whose chief value is purely musical, and its descriptive features merely embellishments. It is true that he had a subject full of poetic suggestion and wholly classic in spirit, but it is all the more creditable to his art that it has enabled him to penetrate beneath the outer form of Shakespeare's creation, and so successfully catch and reflect its spirit. The work, in a word, like everything else that has as yet come from Professor Paine's pen, is musically in the best sense of the word. It reflects not only great learning, but fine intuition, without which learning is but dross, and the composer's consummate command over the resources of the orchestra has enabled him to put his thought into such tangible shape as to enforce his thought with great clearness. Such being the general characteristics of the work, we are not sure that it would not be almost equally enjoyable without any definite explanation whatever, and yet the recognized fitness of many of its illustrative features is a source of considerable pleasure. At the very opening we have a very vivid tone-picture of a storm, with striking figures indicating the rolling of the billows and the fluctuations of the hurricane, and here the judicious use of dissonances and the general moderation shown in the strict observance of musical laws, are admirable. The picturesque significance of the Ariel and Caliban motives is less striking, on a first hearing, and it would seem that more might easily have been made of the Caliban episode, which, as it stands, seems rather too mild to meet the requirements of the case. The portions representing Prospero's tale and the love of Ferdinand and Miranda, however, are very happy in their poetic suggestiveness. The work, however, is too deep and rich to be fully understood at a single hearing, and it is to be hoped that it may be repeated at some one of our classical concerts before long. Professor Paine was received with very significant warmth, and on his retirement from the conductor's stand was recalled with great enthusiasm.

The other orchestral selections of the evening were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which stood at the head of the programme, and was performed with admirable smoothness and spirit, and Beethoven's eighth symphony, with which the concert closed. The symphony was delightfully given. The performance, indeed, may be called a real triumph, both for Mr. Henschel and his orchestra, similar to that which Mr. Zerrahn and his orchestra achieved with the same work at one of the Philharmonic concerts this season. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist of the concert. He sang with orchestral accompaniment, a noble aria and recitation from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Tauris," and, to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, Jansen's rather sickly song, "Oh, lay thy cheek on mine," and Liszt's "In love's bright joy." It is almost needless to say that Mr. Toedt's singing was extremely delightful. The almost ideal beauty of his voice, the pure sentiment of his style, his admirable method, and his clear and refined enunciation are qualities which combine to make him one of the most welcome interpreters of sentimental music now before the public. His voice seems to have gained somewhat in volume since he was last heard here, and he has corrected in a degree his fault of exaggeration in the expression of delicate sentiment, one result of which was the undue retardation of the time; but something of this tendency still clings to him. His efforts, as usual, were rewarded by very flattering demonstrations of approval.

For the next concert Mrs. George Henschel is announced as the soloist, and the programme is as follows:

Overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; air ("Tod Jesu"), Graun; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; air and gavotte (from the suite in D.), Bach; Clärchen's songs ("Egmont"), Beethoven; Slavonian dances, Dvorak.

RECIT. AND AIR. (Iphigénie en Tauride.) GLUCK.

RECIT.

How these thy words, Orest, grieve me who loves thee! calm thyself, let us die worthy of each other. No longer in thy wrath reproach the Gods, thy friend and thyself. If both of us must fall a sacrifice, why tremble for thy friend? is Pylades deplorable since he may die at thy side?

AIR:

United from the earliest days of childhood, the same wishes, the same desires were ours. Now let us joyfully receive the blow that will unite us forever. Fate makes us perish together. I do not complain of its hardness. Death itself is a boon since one grave will receive us.

TWO SONGS.

(a) O LAY THY CHEEK ON MINE.

JENSEN.

O lay thy cheek on mine, dear love,
And so shall our tears flow together;
And to my heart press fast thy heart,
And so shall the flames beat together.
And when in those glowing flames shall fall
Our streams of tears fast thronging,
Holding thee close in my arms I would die,
Fainting with love's sweet longing.
O lay thy cheek on mine, dear love.

(b) IN LOVE'S BRIGHT JOY.

LISZT.

In love's bright joy, in yearning pain,
O list to me!
A thousand times I sing again!
And all for thee!
O'er hill and dale I fondly sing,
O list to me!
The world shall with my wild notes ring:—
I love but thee!
I dream and sing through silent night
In reverie;
I sing again in morning light,
I love but thee!
And when my heart shall cease to sigh,
O look on me!
And thou shalt read it in mine eye:—
I love but thee!

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The delights of the opera with Patti for its star and the discomforts of inclement weather doubtless conspired to limit the attendance on the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening, and as a result the audience was one of the smallest of the season. All who were present, however, were rewarded by an evening of well nigh unmixed pleasure—pleasure of a purely emotional kind, neither weighted with the necessity of undue intellectual effort to understand the music, nor marred by any doubt as to whether it were worth the attention it required, nor, on the other hand, unsatisfying by reason of the insipidity of the feast. Almost every selection was of solid worth, without ever degenerating into heaviness, and the concert was so short—ending at 20 minutes past nine o'clock—that no one at all musically inclined had the slightest excuse for pleading weariness, especially as the performance was of an almost uniformly high order of excellence. The interest of the concert naturally centred in the single novelty of the programme, particularly as this was a work by one of our most distinguished home musicians, Professor John K. Paine, and was performed under the composer's own direction. The character of the work, too, whose title promised something different from the severely classical order of writing that we have been accustomed to associate with this composer, belonging as it does to the general class of "programme" music, served to heighten curiosity as to the manner in which such a composer would treat a purely descriptive subject. The work, which is designated as a "symphonic poem," is entitled "The Tempest," and is intended to illustrate Shakespeare's imaginative play of that name. It consists of four movements, all, however, joined together without pause or break in the continuity of the musical thought. Its meaning and methods were so fully set forth by the programme that we cannot do better than repeat the scheme as there given, which is as follows:—

(I.) Allegro con fuoco, D minor—The Storm. (II.) Adagio tranquillo, D major—Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell. Ariel appears. (Movements by solo flute, clarinet and harp, supported by strings and wind). (III.) Allegro maestoso, C major—Prospero's aria. (IV.) Allegro ma non troppo, D major—The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban (solo bassoon) and Ariel. (Flute, harp, clarinet and strings). The triumph of Prospero's "potent art."

Professor Paine's work is a good illustration of the uncertainty of appearances. From such a title and such full detail of explanation of the work given to the listener in advance, one might well be excused for jumping to the conclusion that it would be found to be of the sensational character so common in modern "programme" music, in which form and purely musical sentiment are made subordinate to mere vividness of material suggestion; but the alchemy of genius turns even the basest elements to pure gold, and so Professor Paine, so far from being hampered by the conditions under which he placed himself in undertaking this work, has cunningly made these conditions to serve as suggestions and sources of inspiration in building up a structure of noble beauty and symmetry, whose chief value is purely musical, and its descriptive features merely embellishments. It is true that he had a subject full of poetic suggestion and wholly classic in spirit, but it is all the more creditable to his art that it has enabled him to penetrate beneath the outer form of Shakespeare's creation, and so successfully catch and reflect its spirit. The work, in a word, like everything else that has as yet come from Professor Paine's pen, is musically in the best sense of the word. It reflects not only great learning, but fine intuition, without which learning is but dross, and the composer's consummate command over the resources of the orchestra has enabled him to put his thought into such tangible shape as to enforce his thought with great clearness. Such being the general characteristics of the work, we are not sure that it would not be almost equally enjoyable without any definite explanation whatever, and yet the recognized fitness of many of its illustrative features is a source of considerable pleasure. At the very opening we have a very vivid tone-picture of a storm, with striking figures indicating the rolling of the billows and the fluctuations of the hurricane, and here the judicious use of dissonances and the general moderation shown in the strict observance of musical laws, are admirable. The picturesque significance of the Ariel and Caliban motives is less striking, on a first hearing, and it would seem that more might easily have been made of the Caliban episode, which, as it stands, seems rather too mild to meet the requirements of the case. The portions representing Prospero's tale and the love of Ferdinand and Miranda, however, are very happy in their poetic suggestiveness. The work, however, is too deep and rich to be fully understood at a single hearing, and it is to be hoped that it may be repeated at some one of our classical concerts before long. Professor Paine was received with very significant warmth, and on his retirement from the conductor's stand was recalled with great enthusiasm.

The other orchestral selections of the evening were Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, which stood at the head of the programme, and was performed with admirable smoothness and spirit, and Beethoven's eighth symphony, with which the concert closed. The symphony was delightfully given. The performance, indeed, may be called a real triumph, both for Mr. Henschel and his orchestra, similar to that which Mr. Zerrahn and his orchestra achieved with the same work at one of the Philharmonic concerts this season. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist of the concert. He sang with orchestral accompaniment, a noble aria and recitation from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris," and, to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment, Jansen's rather sickly song, "Oh, lay thy cheek on mine," and Liszt's "In love's bright joy." It is almost needless to say that Mr. Toedt's singing was extremely delightful. The almost ideal beauty of his voice, the pure sentiment of his style, his admirable method, and his clear and refined enunciation are qualities which combine to make him one of the most welcome interpreters of sentimental music now before the public. His voice seems to have gained somewhat in volume since he was last heard here, and he has corrected in a degree his fault of exaggeration in the expression of delicate sentiment, one result of which was the undue retardation of the time; but something of this tendency still clings to him. His efforts, as usual, were rewarded by very flattering demonstrations of approval.

For the next concert Mrs. Georg Henschel is announced as the soloist, and the programme is as follows:

Overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; air ("Tod Jesu"), Graun; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; air and gavotte (from the suite in D.), Bach; Clorchen's songs ("Egmont"), Beethoven; Slavonian dances, Dvorak.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, (Genoveva.).....Schumann.
 Recitative and Air, (Iphigénie en Tauride.).....Gluck.
 Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

Symphonic Poem. (The Tempest,) op. 31.....John K. Paine.

[Conducted by the Composer.]

In four connected movements:

1. Allegro con fuoco, D minor. The Storm.
2. Adagio tranquillo, E major.
Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell.
Ariel appears. (Motives by Solo Flute, Clarinet and Harp, supported by Strings and Wind.)
3. Allegro maestoso, C major. Prospero's Tale.
4. Allegro ma non troppo, D major.
The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban. (Solo Bassoon,) and Ariel. (Flutes, Harp, Clarinet and Strings.)
The triumph of Prospero's "potent art."

Songs with Piano:

- a. "Lehn deine Wang' an Meine Wang'.".....Jensen
- b. "In Liebeslust,".....Liszt

Mr. Toedt,

Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven
 Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
 Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.—

A programme full of interest, and containing enough of lightness and easily-comprehended music to please musician and laity alike, since even the brightest selections did not depart from the classical character. The overture was played with all the necessary pomp and breadth. Mr. Toedt won the first popular success of the concert, and his singing certainly deserved the great applause which it received. His voice has gained in breadth since he has last been heard here and he avoids the tendency to exaggerate the shading which formerly was his chief (and almost only) blemish. His work in the Gluck aria was just in the vein of that solid, legato school; not unemotional, but never weakly tender. In the Jensen song the sweetness of his voice was heard to best advantage, and created almost a furor. Yet we cannot help dissenting from the extreme slowness and languor with which he took the beginning. Jensen is at times a little too sugary in his lieder, and to add to the saccharine effect is not the best art. Besides, this slowness anticipates and destroys the effect of the final phrase which is identical with it, and which may be given as slowly and as softly as the singer pleases, since the composer has marked it—"like a sigh of sweet reminiscence"—the most extraordinary expression mark we recollect ever having seen. More force could have been used in the single great crescendo. In the Liszt number Mr. Toedt deserves unqualified praise. The passionate force with which the phrase Ich liebe dich rang out and the excellent manner in which the climaxes were led up to, proves Mr. Toedt a lied singer of the first rank. Professor Paine won a hearty greeting as he quietly stepped to the conductor's stand to direct his Tempest. This is one of the happiest efforts of the great composer, its chief fault being its brevity. It dashes at once into the subject, the timpani giving the crash of the elements in the very first phase, and the roll of the billows being graphically portrayed in the strings by a strong figure. A unison figure of the strings, leads finally to a restful contrast in the scene before Prospero's cell. The lightness and beauty of the Ariel passage is finely managed, and the dignity of Prospero is well suggested in the following movement. But we could have wished a more extended bit of humor in the Caliban portion. The composer's customary reserve has withheld him from giving much prominence to this grotesque figure, but we should have enjoyed a picture of the intoxicated dwarf, in contrast with the tender picture of Miranda. The finale has a true triumphant swing, and brings the succession of short pictures to a worthy close. The composer was emphatically recalled at the conclusion, and the public testified their lively appreciation of the work. In a word the Tempest was a success. Possibly this is the tempest that Wiggins promised should come off on Saturday.

The Eighth Symphony was strongly played, and its humorous portions, so far as they lay in the bassoon part (Beethoven's favorite instrument) and in the double basses, were well marked. But there was a tendency to scramble in the finale, and the first part was somewhat rigidly taken, certainly in a less elastic and genial manner than at the recent Philharmonic concert. But there were also some effects in which this was superior to the last-named performance, notably in the brusque surprises and interruptions of the chief figure of the last part, a figure which Beethoven seems to enjoy and play with in the most capricious manner. The allegretto was also well done, especially in the dainty announcement of the theme in the strings, the double basses doing excellently in their subsequent imitative figures.

The next concert gives a somewhat more severe programme, but one which will appeal to all lovers of classical music. The programme is as follows:

Overture (Magic Flute).....Mozart
 Air (Tod Jesu).....Graum
 Mrs. Henschel.

Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
 Allegro non troppo—Adagio non troppo—
 Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino,) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.

Allegro con spirito.
 Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D.).....Bach
 Clarchen's Songs (Egmont).....Beethoven
 Mrs. Henschel.

Slavonian Dances.....Dvorak

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-third concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
 Aria from "Iphigénie en Tauride".....Gluck
 Symphonic Poem (The Tempest) op. 31, John K. Paine
 Songs with Pianoforte:
 a. "Lehn deine Wang' an meine Wang'.".....Jensen
 b. "In Liebeslust".....Liszt

Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven

Mr. Theodore Toedt was the singer.

Schumann's great romantic overture (romantic in contradistinction to his great tragic overture to "Manfred") was excellently played. Mr. Paine's "Tempest," which was brought out at Cambridge by the Thomas Orchestra some years ago, now makes its appearance in Boston, in a somewhat remodelled and improved shape. If one be a little surprised at first to find a man of Mr. Paine's musical antecedents and position writing anything under the heading "Symphonic Poem," a hearing of his work shows plainly enough that he takes the title without any of the imputed meaning that has come to it from the musical exploits of its inventor, Liszt. With Liszt's symphonic poems it has only this in common—that it, as well as they, might in all strictness be termed a romantic orchestral fantasy. It has definite musical form and purpose, apart from its picturesque suggestiveness. Even in his tone-painting the composer has kept far from that boundary line which separates poetico-musical suggestion from mere realistic portraiture. His dramatis personæ and their natural environment have, so to speak, put off all their earthly body, and have been completely absorbed into the universal World-spirit of music. The storm with which the piece opens suggests the hurricane by its force of movement, its violence and unbridled impetuosity, but without any attempt at reproducing the actual sounds of wind, rain and dashing waves. Caliban himself is no mere formless mass of orchestral croakings and sputterings, but comes before us in the guise of a coherent and even graceful melody, fantastic and frog-voiced, though it be made by the bassoon. The whole treatment is highly poetic in the best sense of the word, and the composition shows us just the reflection of a poetical or dramatic scene that such a mirror as music can give when its surface is not clouded by the breath of prosaic matter-of-fact. As a piece of musical writing the thing is absolutely charming, full of beautiful melody and fine, organically coherent details. The composer conducted in person, in a way to secure an admirable and finely shaded performance. The bright and beautiful eighth symphony was superbly played. Mr. Toedt sang the Gluck Aria and the pair of songs with all that charm and delicacy of sentiment for which he is noted. If he would only give his sentiment a more definitely musical shape by not utterly distorting all rhythmic proportion, as he is too prone to do, his singing would be beyond cavi.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a clear and spirited reading of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. The feature of the programme was Mr. J. K. Paine's symphonic poem, "The Tempest," op. 31, which was conducted by the composer. It is one of Mr. Paine's most imaginative and most finished works, abundant in beauties of every description, and extremely fine in its orchestration. It is divided into four movements, which, however, run into each other without any interruption. It opens with a storm, which breaks into a lovely adagio, intended to typify the calm of Prospero's home. This is followed by a fine and impressive allegro maestoso, descriptive of the story of his life told by Prospero to Miranda. The whole concludes with an allegro, which paints the happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda, and which ends with a strain which tells of the triumph of Prospero's art. The love scene overflows with exquisite melody treated in a most charming manner. The composition throughout shows the finished artist, whose command over the resources of his art is complete. It was listened to with most refined pleasure, and at its conclusion the composer was recalled twice amid the heartiest and most enthusiastic applause. We trust the work may be heard here again, as it is impossible to do all justice to its merits or to appreciate its many beauties on a single hearing. The concert ended with Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8, which received a graceful and sympathetic interpretation in general. The only blemish upon its performance was the cloudy and almost vulgar manner in which the lovely trio of the minuet was played. The allegretto was delightfully read and rendered. The soloist was Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, whose sweet and pleasing voice and refined method created so favorable an impression upon his earlier appearances here. He sang a recitative and aria from Gluck's "Iphigénie in Taurus" with fine dignity, smoothness and purity of style. Later in the evening he sang a song by Jensen, "O, lay thy cheek on mine," and Liszt's "In love's bright joy." The former is a bit of sickly sentimentality, and was sung with a sympathetic appropriateness of sickness and sentiment. If the word twaddle can be applied to music, this song and the manner in which it was given may be fitly described by that substantive. The Liszt song was given in a more healthy tone, as a whole, though Mr. Toedt once again dropped into an excess of sugariness almost nauseating when a favorable opportunity presented itself. At the next concert the Symphony will be Brahms's, in D, No. 2. Mrs. Georg Henschel is to be the soloist.

Sarotte

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was a very pleasant affair, though it was not attended by an unusually large audience. The chief attraction was the first production under the baton of the composer of John K. Paine's symphonic poem, "The Tempest." It is a kind of tone picture, based on Shakespeare's play, and the character of it may be best understood from a glance at the composer's synopsis, which appeared upon the programme last night. The four movements indicated by the figures were merged into a connected whole. 1. Allegro con fuoco, D minor. The storm. 2. Adagio tranquillo, E major. Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell. Ariel appears. (Motives by solo flute, clarinet and harp, supported by strings and wind.) 3. Allegro maestoso, C major. Prospero's tale. 4. Allegro ma non troppo, D major. The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban. The triumph of Prospero's "potent art." The workmanship of the piece is worthy the highest praise. The orchestration and instrumentation is unapproachable, and the themes appropriate to the subject and finely worked out. The work was well conducted and well played. It was well appreciated, too, Mr. Paine being enthusiastically recalled. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist, and did himself much credit by his singing of an air from Gluck's "Iphigénie" and two songs with the piano. These latter were none the less enjoyable on account of Mr. Henschel's splendid accompaniment. Mr. Toedt was honored with an encore. Beethoven's eighth symphony stood last upon the programme, and received a notable performance. Indeed, Mr. Henschel has done this season no work of Beethoven's better than that of last evening. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture ("Magic Flute").....Mozart
 Air ("Tod Jesu").....Graum
 Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
 Air and gavotte (from the Suite in D.).....Bach
 Clarchen's songs (Egmont).....Beethoven
 Slavonian dances.....Dvorak
 Soloist, Mrs. Georg Henschel.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist and the following programme was performed: Overture ("Genoveva"), Schumann; Recitative and air ("Iphigénie en Tauride"), Gluck; Symphonic poem ("The Tempest"), op. 31, John K. Paine; Songs with piano, a. "Lehn deine Wang' an meine Wang'," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. The orchestral work was of a high order in nearly every respect. The overture was very clearly and powerfully performed, and the symphony very well indeed, especially the second (allegretto) movement, which was perfectly rendered. Portions of the third movement (minuet) were very harshly played, however, and the final (allegro) movement was somewhat loosely given at the close. The composer of the "Tempest" symphonic poem led the performance of his own work and was warmly greeted. The composition proved to be one of his finest and most finished works, and about all the exception that can be taken to it is that it is not longer. It is in four parts, which run into each other without interruption. It opens with a storm, which dies away into an adagio measure showing calm of Prospero's home. Then Ariel appears in charming motives by flute, clarinet and harp, supported by string and wind instruments, following which appear in order "Prospero's tale," and a description of the happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda, with episodes with Caliban, in a grotesque bassoon solo, and Ariel, in which flutes, harp, clarinet and strings are again introduced. The beauty and learning of the whole work are marked, and it is earnestly to be hoped that it may be heard again very soon. Mr. Toedt

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.
Overture (Genoveva).....Schumann.
Recitative and Air, (Iphigénie en Tauride).....Gluck.
Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.
Symphonic Poem. (The Tempest,) op. 31.....John K. Paine.
[Conducted by the Composer.]
In four connected movements:

1. Allegro con fuoco, D minor. The Storm.
2. Adagio tranquillo, E major.
Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell.
Ariel appears. (Motives by Solo Flute, Clarinet and Harp, supported by Strings and Wind.)
3. Allegro maestoso, C major. Prospero's Tale.
4. Allegro ma non troppo, D major.
The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban. (Solo Bassoon,) and Ariel. (Flutes, Harp, Clarinet and Strings.)
The triumph of Prospero's "potent art."

Songs with Piano:
a "Lehn deine Wang' an Meine Wang.".....Jensen
b. "In Liebeslust,".....Liszt
Mr. Toedt.
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.—

A programme full of interest, and containing enough of lightness and easily-comprehended music to please musician and laity alike, since even the brightest selections did not depart from the classical character. The overture was played with all the necessary pomp and breadth. Mr. Toedt won the first popular success of the concert, and his singing certainly deserved the great applause which it received. His voice has gained in breadth since he has last been heard here and he avoids the tendency to exaggerate the shading which formerly was his chief (and almost only) blemish. His work in the Gluck aria was just in the vein of that solid, legato school; not unemotional, but never weakly tender. In the Jensen song the sweetness of his voice was heard to best advantage, and created almost a furor. Yet we cannot help dissenting from the extreme slowness and languor with which he took the beginning. Jensen is at times a little too sugary in his lieder, and to add to the saccharine effect is not the best art. Besides, this slowness anticipates and destroys the effect of the final phrase which is identical with it, and which may be given as slowly and as softly as the singer pleases, since the composer has marked it—"like a sigh of sweet reminiscence"—the most extraordinary expression mark we recollect ever having seen. More force could have been used in the single great crescendo. In the Liszt number Mr. Toedt deserves unqualified praise. The passionate force with which the phrase Ich liebe dich rang out and the excellent manner in which the climaxes were led up to, proves Mr. Toedt a lied singer of the first rank. Professor Paine won a hearty greeting as he quietly stepped to the conductor's stand to direct his Tempest. This is one of the happiest efforts of the great composer, its chief fault being its brevity. It dashes at once into the subject, the timpani giving the crash of the elements in the very first phase, and the roll of the billows being graphically portrayed in the strings by a strong figure. A unison figure of the strings, leads finally to a restful contrast in the scene before Prospero's cell. The lightness and beauty of the Ariel passage is finely managed, and the dignity of Prospero is well suggested in the following movement. But we could have wished a more extended bit of humor in the Caliban portion. The composer's customary reserve has withheld him from giving much prominence to this grotesque figure, but we should have enjoyed a picture of the intoxicated dwarf, in contrast with the tender picture of Miranda. The finale has a true triumphant swing, and brings the succession of short pictures to a worthy close. The composer was emphatically recalled at the conclusion, and the public testified their lively appreciation of the work. In a word the Tempest was a success. Possibly this is the tempest that Wiggins promised should come off on Saturday.

The Eighth Symphony was strongly played, and its humorous portions, so far as they lay in the bassoon part (Beethoven's favorite instrument) and in the double basses, were well marked. But there was a tendency to scramble in the finale, and the first part was somewhat rigidly taken, certainly in a less elastic and genial manner than at the recent Philharmonic concert. But there were also some effects in which this was superior to the last-named performance, notably in the brusque surprises and interruptions of the chief figure of the last part, a figure which Beethoven seems to enjoy and play with in the most capricious manner. The allegretto was also well done, especially in the dainty announcement of the theme in the strings, the double basses doing excellently in their subsequent imitative figures.

The next concert gives a somewhat more severe programme, but one which will appeal to all lovers of classical music. The programme is as follows:

Overture (Magic Flute).....Mozart
Air (Tod Jesu).....Graum
Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Allegro non troppo—Adagio non troppo—
Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino,) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.
Allegro con spirito.
Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D).....Bach
Clarchen's Songs (Egmont).....Beethoven
Mrs. Henschel.
Slavonian Dances.....Dvorak

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-third concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Aria from "Iphigénie en Tauride".....Gluck
Symphonic Poem (The Tempest) op. 31, John K. Paine
Songs with Pianoforte:
a. "Lehn deine Wang' an Meine Wang".....Jensen
b. "In Liebeslust".....Liszt
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven
Mr. Theodore Toedt was the singer.

Schumann's great romantic overture (romantic in contradistinction to his great tragic overture to "Manfred") was excellently played. Mr. Paine's "Tempest," which was brought out at Cambridge by the Thomas Orchestra some years ago, now makes its appearance in Boston, in a somewhat remodelled and improved shape. If one be a little surprised at first to find a man of Mr. Paine's musical antecedents and position writing anything under the heading "Symphonic Poem," a hearing of his work shows plainly enough that he takes the title without any of the imputed meaning that has come to it from the musical exploits of its inventor, Liszt. With Liszt's symphonic poems it has only this in common—that it, as well as they, might in all strictness be termed a romantic orchestral fantasy. It has definite musical form and purpose, apart from its picturesque suggestiveness. Even in his tone-painting the composer has kept far from that boundary line which separates poetico-musical suggestion from mere realistic portraiture. His dramatis personæ and their natural environment have, so to speak, put off all their earthly body, and have been completely absorbed into the universal World-spirit of music. The storm with which the piece opens suggests the hurricane by its force of movement, its violence and unbridled impetuosity, but without any attempt at reproducing the actual sounds of wind, rain and dashing waves. Caliban himself is no mere formless mass of orchestral croakings and sputterings, but comes before us in the guise of a coherent and even graceful melody, fantastic and frog-voiced, though it be made by the bassoon. The whole treatment is highly poetic in the best sense of the word, and the composition shows us just the reflection of a poetical or dramatic scene that such a mirror as music can give when its surface is not clouded by the breath of prosaic matter-of-fact. As a piece of musical writing the thing is absolutely charming, full of beautiful melody and fine, organically coherent details. The composer conducted in person, in a way to secure an admirable and finely shaded performance. The bright and beautiful eighth symphony was superbly played. Mr. Toedt sang the Gluck Aria and the pair of songs with all that charm and delicacy of sentiment for which he is noted. If he would only give his sentiment a more definitely musical shape by not utterly distorting all rhythmic proportion, as he is too prone to do, his singing would be beyond cavil.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with a clear and spirited reading of Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. The feature of the programme was Mr. J. K. Paine's symphonic poem, "The Tempest," op. 31, which was conducted by the composer. It is one of Mr. Paine's most imaginative and most finished works, abundant in beauties of every description, and extremely fine in its orchestration. It is divided into four movements, which, however, run into each other without any interruption. It opens with a storm, which breaks into a lovely adagio, intended to typify the calm of Prospero's home. This is followed by a fine and impressive allegro maestoso, descriptive of the story of his life told by Prospero to Miranda. The whole concludes with an allegro, which paints the happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda, and which ends with a strain which tells of the triumph of Prospero's art. The love scene overflows with exquisite melody treated in a most charming manner. The composition throughout shows the finished artist, whose command over the resources of his art is complete. It was listened to with most refined pleasure, and at its conclusion the composer was recalled twice amid the heartiest and most enthusiastic applause. We trust the work may be heard here again, as it is impossible to do all justice to its merits or to appreciate its many beauties on a single hearing. The concert ended with Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8, which received a graceful and sympathetic interpretation in general. The only blemish upon its performance was the cloudy and almost vulgar manner in which the lovely trio of the minuet was played. The allegretto was delightfully read and rendered. The soloist was Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, whose sweet and pleasing voice and refined method created so favorable an impression upon his earlier appearances here. He sang a recitative and aria from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Tauride" with fine dignity, smoothness and purity of style. Later in the evening he sang a song by Jensen, "O, lay thy cheek on mine," and Liszt's "In love's bright joy." The former is a bit of sickly sentimentality, and was sung with a sympathetic appropriateness of sickness and sentiment. If the word twaddle can be applied to music, this song and the manner in which it was given may be fitly described by that substantive. The Liszt song was given in a more healthy tone, as a whole, though Mr. Toedt once again dropped into an excess of sugariness almost nauseating when a favorable opportunity presented itself. At the next concert the Symphony will be Brahms's, in D, No. 2. Mrs. Georg Henschel is to be the soloist.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was a very pleasant affair, though it was not attended by an unusually large audience. The chief attraction was the first production under the baton of the composer of John K. Paine's symphonic poem, "The Tempest." It is a kind of tone picture, based on Shakespeare's play, and the character of it may be best understood from a glance at the composer's synopsis, which appeared upon the programme last night. The four movements indicated by the figures were merged into a connected whole. 1. Allegro con fuoco, D minor. The storm. 2. Adagio tranquillo, E major. Calm and happy scene before Prospero's cell. Ariel appears. (Motives by solo flute, clarinet and harp, supported by strings and wind.) 3. Allegro maestoso, C major. Prospero's tale. 4. Allegro ma non troppo, D major. The happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda. Episode with Caliban. The triumph of Prospero's "patent art." The workmanship of the piece is worthy the highest praise. The orchestration and instrumentation is unapproachable, and the themes appropriate to the subject and finely worked out. The work was well conducted and well played. It was well appreciated, too, Mr. Paine being enthusiastically recalled. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist, and did himself much credit by his singing of an air from Gluck's "Iphigénie" and two songs with the piano. These latter were none the less enjoyable on account of Mr. Henschel's splendid accompaniment. Mr. Toedt was honored with an encore. Beethoven's eighth symphony stood last upon the programme, and received a notable performance. Indeed, Mr. Henschel has done this season no work of Beethoven's better than that of last evening. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture ("Magic Flute").....Mozart
Air ("Tod Jesu").....Graum
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D).....Bach
Clarchen's songs (Egmont).....Beethoven
Slavonian dances.....Dvorak
Soloist, Mrs. Georg Henschel.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist and the following programme was performed: Overture ("Genoveva"), Schumann; Recitative and air ("Iphigénie en Tauride"), Gluck; Symphonic poem ("The Tempest"), op. 31, John K. Paine; Songs with piano, a. "Lehn deine Wang' an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. The orchestral work was of a high order in nearly every respect. The overture was very clearly and powerfully performed, and the symphony very well indeed, especially the second (allegretto) movement, which was perfectly rendered. Portions of the third movement (minuet) were very harshly played, however, and the final (allegro) movement was somewhat loosely given at the close. The composer of the "Tempest" symphonic poem led the performance of his own work and was warmly greeted. The composition proved to be one of his finest and most finished works, and about all the exception that can be taken to it is that it is not longer. It is in four parts, which run into each other without interruption. It opens with a storm, which dies away into an adagio measure showing calm of Prospero's home. Then Ariel appears in charming motives by flute, clarinet and harp, supported by string and wind instruments, following which appear in order "Prospero's tale" and a description of the happy love of Ferdinand and Miranda, with episodes with Caliban, in a grotesque bassoon solo, and Ariel, in which flutes, harp, clarinet and strings are again introduced. The beauty and learning of the whole work are marked, and it is earnestly to be hoped that it may be heard again very soon. Mr. Toedt made an exceedingly favorable impression by his singing. His voice seems stronger and broader than when last heard here, and he has to a considerable degree abandoned the excessive employment of fading expression of which he used to be so fond. Always an extremely refined and wholesomely emotional singer, he also showed on this occasion the possession of much power.

The programme for next week is as follows: Overture (Magic Flute), Mozart; Air (Tod Jesu), Graun; Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D), Bach; Clärchen's Songs (Egmont), Beethoven; Slavonian Dances, Dvorak. Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist on this occasion.

Harold

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-third concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening, before a large audience. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist, and the following programme was performed: Overture ("Genoveva"), Schumann; Recitative and air ("Iphigénie en Tauride"), Gluck; Symphonic poem ("The Tempest"), op. 31, John K. Paine; Songs with piano, a. "Lehn deine Wang' an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. The work of the orchestra was of most superior character throughout, while Mr. Toedt's singing was of a high order of merit. The John K. Paine composition proved an able piece of work well performed by the orchestra, under the author's baton. The next concert will take place on Saturday night of this week, with Mr. Georg Henschel as soloist. The programme will be as follows: Overture (Magic Flute), Mozart; Air (Tod Jesu), Graun; Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D), Bach; Clärchen's Songs (Egmont), Beethoven; Slavonian Dances, Dvorak.

sang better. Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-third concert of this season with a programme comprising orchestral works from Schumann, Paine, and Beethoven. Mr. Toedt gave songs from Liszt, Jensen, and Gluck.

Mr. Toedt's singing made a great success. His voice is more powerful than it was last season, and his phrasing in the Gluck Aria was excellent. In the latter he gave clear enunciation, and, in the last one, real expression and artistic contrast.

The 8th Symphony of Beethoven went well, save that the first part was somewhat rigid in tempo, and the whole work was rather heavy for the gemüthlichkeit which characterizes (or should characterize) it. The bassoons and double basses did excellently, and the chief difficulties of the work are in these instruments. Paine's Symphonic Poem is rather short, but it is a really successful work, finely scored, full of admirable contrasts and with strong climaxes. It begins at once with a picture of a storm, kettledrums, crashes of full orchestra, a heaving figure on the strings, short runs upon flute in highest register—all combining to make this one of the most powerful of movements. The contrast with the calm scene before Prospero's cell, and the light, airy character of the Ariel music, is very effective. I wish that the composer had given more prominence to the grotesque element in the Caliban music. The finale is especially triumphant and stirring. I hope to hear the work soon again and to write more at length about it. Meantime I can close this long letter by saying that although Wiggins' tempest did not come off, Paine's did, and I much prefer the latter to the former.

L. C. E.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

THE novelties in the musical field have not been so numerous as during last month. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, since their Wagner night, have contented themselves with programmes of conventional interest. Yet two new works of great merit have been produced in this series recently. The first was a new symphony by Max Bruch, which was performed with great spirit and achieved a success. As a work, it must be very favorably judged. It has none of the vagueness which too often characterizes the modern school. It is, on the contrary, well-defined, triumphant, and almost military in its style, and has many very stirring effects. The thematic treatment of its Scherzo and the breadth and dignity of its first movement seemed to us the most marked features. The second novelty was Prof. Paine's Symphonic poem, The Tempest, which was produced under the composer's own direction. This work, whose chief defect is that the composer's reserve has made it too short, is founded upon scenes from Shakspeare's play, and pictures the varying emotions of that work in a most graphic and well-contrasted manner. It opens very boldly, with a representation of the storm at sea; and, in this part, the strings have a very picturesque figure, while the crash of the full orchestra makes the scene a very vivid one. The second part (although the work is not divided into separated movements) pictures in strong contrast the calm scene before the cell of Prospero. Now follow the love passages, sweetly depicted with harp and flute as leading instruments, and then the grotesque Caliban, portrayed by bassoon, which Prof. Paine uses in a very genial and humorous vein, reminding of the effects made by Beethoven in his Sixth and Eighth Symphonies. The work closes with a brilliant and majestic finale, picturing the triumph of Prospero's magic art. It was received with real enthusiasm, and the composer was compelled to bow his thanks again and again.

The Philharmonic Society have not given any especially new works in their last two programmes, if we except the Scherzo Symphonique for piano, played and composed by Mr. Sherwood. This work was a very pleasing composition, with a certain amount of preluding harmonies in its trio, and a fine first theme, but scarcely of sufficient development to warrant the use of the term "symphonique." At this concert, the lofty but somewhat prolix Fest Scene by Dr. Louis Maas and the beautiful but also elongated Scandinavian Symphonique by Cowen were performed. The programme suffered from being too long, and was not so carefully played by the orchestra as usual, although Mr. Zerrahn's leading was as masterly and carefully considered as ever. Naturally, the chief event of the past month has been the short season of Mapleson's

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Magic Flute.)	MOZART.
AIR. (Tod Jesu.)	GRAUN.
SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 73.	BRAHMS.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.— Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.— Allegro con spirito.—
AIR AND GAVOTTE (from the Suite in D.)	BACH.
CLÄRCHEN'S SONGS. (Egmont.)	BEETHOVEN.
SLAVONIAN DANCES. (Nos. 6 and 5.)	DVORAK.
Allegretto scherzando.—Vivace.—

SOLOIST:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

On account of the preparations for the chorus-stage necessary for the Good-Friday Performance of the Hændel and Haydn Society, the next Public Rehearsal will take place on THURSDAY, MARCH 22D, at 2.30 P. M., instead of Good Friday.

made an exceedingly favorable impression by his singing. His voice seems stronger and broader than when last heard here, and he has to a considerable degree abandoned the excessive employment of fading expression of which he used to be so fond. Always an extremely refined and wholesomely emotional singer, he also showed on this occasion the possession of much power.

The programme for next week is as follows: Overture (Magic Flute), Mozart; Air (Tod Jesu), Graun; Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D), Bach; Clärchen's Songs (Egmont), Beethoven; Slavonian Dances, Dvorak. Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist on this occasion.

Harold

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-third concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening, before a large audience. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist, and the following programme was performed: Overture ("Genoveva"), Schumann; Recitative and air ("Iphigénie en Tauride"), Gluck; Symphonic poem ("The Tempest"), op. 31, John K. Paine; Songs with piano, a. "Lehn deine Wang' an meine Wang," Jensen; b. "In Liebeslust," Liszt; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. The work of the orchestra was of most superior character throughout, while Mr. Toedt's singing was of a high order of merit. The John K. Paine composition proved an able piece of work well performed by the orchestra, under the author's baton. The next concert will take place on Saturday night of this week, with Mr. Georg Henschel as the soloist. The programme will be as follows: Overture (Magic Flute), Mozart; Air (Tod Jesu), Graun; Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D), Bach; Clärchen's Songs (Egmont), Beethoven; Slavonian Dances, Dvorak.

sang better. Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its twenty-third concert of this season with a programme comprising orchestral works from Schumann, Paine, and Beethoven. Mr. Toedt gave songs from Liszt, Jensen, and Gluck.

Mr. Toedt's singing made a great success. His voice is more powerful than it was last season, and his phrasing in the Gluck Aria was excellent. In the latter he gave clear enunciation, and, in the last one, real expression and artistic contrast.

The 8th Symphony of Beethoven went well, save that the first part was somewhat rigid in tempo, and the whole work was rather heavy for the gemüthlichkeit which characterizes (or should characterize) it. The bassoons and double basses did excellently, and the chief difficulties of the work are in these instruments. Paine's Symphonic Poem is rather short, but it is a really successful work, finely scored. Full of admirable contrasts and with strong climaxes. It begins at once with a picture of a storm, kettledrums, crashes of full orchestra, a heaving figure on the strings, short runs upon flute in highest register—all combining to make this one of the most powerful of movements. The contrast with the calm scene before Prospero's cell, and the light, airy character of the Ariel music, is very effective. I wish that the composer had given more prominence to the grotesque element in the Caliban music. The finale is especially triumphant and stirring. I hope to hear the work soon again and to write more at length about it. Meanwhile I can close this long letter by saying that although Wiggins' tempest did not come off, Paine's did, and I much prefer the latter to the former.

L. C. E.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

THE novelties in the musical field have not been so numerous as during last month. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, since their Wagner night, have contented themselves with programmes of conventional interest. Yet two new works of great merit have been produced in this series recently. The first was a new symphony by Max Bruch, which was performed with great spirit and achieved a success. As a work, it must be very favorably judged. It has none of the vagueness which too often characterizes the modern school. It is, on the contrary, well-defined, triumphant, and almost military in its style, and has many very stirring effects. The thematic treatment of its Scherzo and the breadth and dignity of its first movement seemed to us the most marked features. The second novelty was Prof. Paine's Symphonic poem, The Tempest, which was produced under the composer's own direction. This work, whose chief defect is that the composer's reserve has made it too short, is founded upon scenes from Shakspeare's play, and pictures the varying emotions of that work in a most graphic and well-contrasted manner. It opens very boldly, with a representation of the storm at sea; and, in this part, the strings have a very picturesque figure, while the crash of the full orchestra makes the scene a very vivid one. The second part (although the work is not divided into separated movements) pictures in strong contrast the calm scene before the cell of Prospero. Now follow the love passages, sweetly depicted with harp and flute as leading instruments, and then the grotesque Caliban, portrayed by bassoon, which Prof. Paine uses in a very genial and humorous vein, reminding of the effects made by Beethoven in his Sixth and Eighth Symphonies. The work closes with a brilliant and majestic finale, picturing the triumph of Prospero's magic art. It was received with real enthusiasm, and the composer was compelled to bow his thanks again and again.

The Philharmonic Society have not given any especially new works in their last two programmes, if we except the Scherzo Symphonique for piano played and composed by Mr. Sherwood. This work was a very pleasing composition, with a certain amount of preluding harmonies in its trio, and a fine first theme, but scarcely of sufficient development to warrant the use of the term "symphonique." At this concert, the lofty but somewhat prolix Fest Scene by Dr. Louis Maas and the beautiful but also elongated Scandinavian Symphonique by Cowen were performed. The programme suffered from being too long, and was not so carefully played by the orchestra as usual, although Mr. Zerrahn's leading was as masterly and carefully considered as ever. Naturally, the chief event of the past month has been the short season of Mapleson's

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Magic Flute.)	MOZART.
AIR. (Tod Jesu.)	GRAUN.
SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 73.	BRAHMS.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.— Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.— Allegro con spirito.—
AIR AND GAVOTTE (from the Suite in D.)	BACH.
CLÄRCHEN'S SONGS. (Egmont.)	BEETHOVEN.
SLAVONIAN DANCES. (Nos. 6 and 5.)	DVORAK.
Allegretto scherzando.—Vivace.—

SOLOIST:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

On account of the preparations for the chorus-stage necessary for the Good-Friday Performance of the Hændel and Haydn Society, the next Public Rehearsal will take place on THURSDAY, MARCH 22D, at 2.30 P. M., instead of Good Friday.

AIR. (Tod Jesu.)

GRAUN.

Lo! the heaven descended prophet,
Who to us glad tidings bringeth,
News whereat each soul upspringeth;
Every creature sing His praise!

Thou that mounting wings unfoldest
And the stars beneath thy very feet beholdest.
Now thy full reward receiving
From a mortal to a Seraph upward rising,
O my soul, to God thy song upraise!

CLÄERCHEN'S SONGS.

BEETHOVEN.

- (a) The drum is resounding
And shrill the fife plays;
My love, for the battle,
His brave troop arrays;
He lifts his lance high,
And the people he sways.
- My blood, oh it boils,
And my heart throbs, Ah me!
With jacket and hose,
How proud I would be!
- How boldly I'd follow
And march through the gate;
Through all the wide province
I'd follow him straight.
- The foe yield, we capture
Or shoot them! Ah me!
What heart-thrilling rapture
A soldier to be.

- (b) Blissful and tearful
With thought-teeming brain;
Hoping and fearing
In wavering pain;
Shouting in triumph,
Now sunk in despair—
With love's thrilling rapture
What joy can compare!

(From the German of Goethe.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Another hard lesson in Brahms was inflicted on the patrons of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening, in the shape of that composer's second symphony (op. 73), which had already been heard at one of these concerts last season. The discipline was patiently submitted to, with how much of profit each must decide for himself. As for ourselves, we are content to maintain the humble attitude which we assumed in regard to the work last year, and, while frankly acknowledging that to us the work has but very slight relation to what constitutes the very essentials of music, at the same time confessing that there doubtless are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy, and that in the world of music this production of Brahms may be one of those undreamt of things to whose truth and beauty our musical perception has not yet been awakened. We venture to believe, however, that to the majority of genuine music-lovers, with whom musical devotion is first a matter of the heart, and second of the intellect, Brahms in his most elaborate productions is as yet a puzzle, the solution of which they are by no means certain it is worth the while to find out. However, such a puzzle has its fascinations, and we would be very sorry not to have the occasional opportunity of grappling with it. As to the rest of the programme, comprising selections wholly delightful and performed without material flaw, we have space for little more than the bare record, which is as follows: "Magic Flute" overture, Mozart; air from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu"; air and gavotte from Bach's suite in D; two songs from Beethoven's "Egmont" music; Slavonian dances, Nos. 6 and 5. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist and sang superbly, better than the best we ever heard from her in similar music. The next public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, as usual. Professor Carl Baermann will be the soloist and the programme is as follows:—

Overture, op. 115, Beethoven; concerto in C, No. 1, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20, Gade; piano solo, "Carneval," op. 9, Schumann; "Invitation à la valse," Weber-Berlioz.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. It opened with an admirable reading of Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture. The symphony was Brahms's, No. 2, in D. The work does not gain upon a closer acquaintance. The opening movement, with its almost interminable development of its slight leading theme, is exceedingly wearisome, and the Adagio we give up as one of the most perplexing and uninteresting musical conundrums to which we have ever listened. The Allegretto is pleasing, and the finale abundant in fire and spirit, but the interest of the whole is disproportionate to the length of the symphony. It was finely interpreted. In fact, in many respects it was among the best efforts of the season. An air and gavotte by Bach also received excellent treatment. The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel, who in the first part sang the aria from Graun's "Tod Jesu," in which she has been heard here several times. She sang it chastely, and with rare grace and brilliancy. Her singing of Clärchen's songs from Beethoven's "Egmont" was also very charming, though she was somewhat lacking in force to give all due spirit to the drum song. At the next concert the symphony will be Gade's No. 4, in B flat. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and will play Mozart's Concerto in C, No. 1, and Schumann's "Carneval."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture (Magic Flute).....	Mozart
Air (Tod Jesu).....	Graun
Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73.....	Brahms
Allegro non troppo—Adagio non troppo—
Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.
Allegro con spirito.
Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D.).....	Bach
Clärchen's Songs (Egmont).....	Beethoven
Slavonian Dances (Nos. 6 and 5).....	Dvorak
Allegretto scherzando.—Vivace.

The beautiful overture which began the above programme might have had more lightness in its first part, at the beginning of the allegro, but its closing portion was given with spirit and force, and made atonement for a rather dry commencement. The Symphony is a more abstruse one than the first symphony by Brahms, and the development of the first movement is by no means easily understood. Its last two movements are comparatively clear and melodious, and it was these which seemed to please the audience by far the best. The reading was, as before, a masterly one, but in the coda of the first movement, and in the passage for wood wind against pizzicato strings in the last movement, the ensemble was not well preserved, and there was a tendency to lag behind the conductor's beat. The climax of the finale was splendidly rendered, and the adagio was finely given, especially in the clearness with which the bass portion, often consisting of important phrases, was brought out. The first of the Bach numbers gave the strings an opportunity to show their excellent discipline. The last of the two was more fully scored, but still kept the strings in the foreground. Both movements are among the clearest and most melodious of Bach's instrumental works, and have become familiar in piano (by Schulhoff) and violoncello arrangements, and won the heartiest applause. Their execution was clearness itself. The Slavonian dances added the usual spice to the programme. Mrs. Henschel's singing was admirable. In the Beethoven songs, one might have wished for more power, but the artistic ideal was so clearly set forth that no one could have been dissatisfied. But in the Graun aria there was both the ideal and its perfect execution. The phrasing was excellent, and given without apparent effort; the scales were clear and sure; the high passages of the second part, just preceding the reprise were of good, unforced quality, and, all in all, it was one of Mrs. Henschel's most successful efforts. The next programme offers Professor Baermann as soloist, and the following programme:—

Overture op. 115.....	Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C. No. 1.....	Mozart
Allegro maestoso—Andante—Allegro vivace assai.
Symphony in B flat. No. 4, op. 20.....	Gade
Piano solo.
Carneval, op. 9.....	Schumann
Invitation à la Valse.....	Weber-Berlioz

RL BAERMANN.

se a Chickering Piano.

AIR. (Tod Jesu.)

GRAUN.

Lo! the heaven descended prophet,
Who to us glad tidings bringeth,
News whereat each soul upspringeth;
Every creature sing His praise!

Thou that mounting wings unfoldest
And the stars beneath thy very feet beholdest.
Now thy full reward receiving
From a mortal to a Seraph upward rising,
O my soul, to God thy song upraise!

CLÄRCHEN'S SONGS.

BEETHOVEN.

- (a) The drum is resounding
And shrill the fife plays;
My love, for the battle,
His brave troop arrays;
He lifts his lance high,
And the people he sways.
My blood, oh it boils,
And my heart throbs, Ah me!
With jacket and hose,
How proud I would be!
How boldly I'd follow
And march through the gate;
Through all the wide province
I'd follow him straight.
The foe yield, we capture
Or shoot them! Ah me!
What heart-thrilling rapture
A soldier to be.

- (b) Blissful and tearful
With thought-teeming brain;
Hoping and fearing
In wavering pain;
Shouting in triumph,
Now sunk in despair—
With love's thrilling rapture
What joy can compare!

(From the German of Goethe.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Another hard lesson in Brahms was inflicted on the patrons of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening, in the shape of that composer's second symphony (op. 73), which had already been heard at one of these concerts last season. The discipline was patiently submitted to, with how much of profit each must decide for himself. As for ourselves, we are content to maintain the humble attitude which we assumed in regard to the work last year, and, while frankly acknowledging that to us the work has but very slight relation to what constitutes the very essentials of music, at the same time confessing that there doubtless are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy, and that in the world of music this production of Brahms may be one of those undreamt of things to whose truth and beauty our musical perception has not yet been awakened. We venture to believe, however, that to the majority of genuine music-lovers, with whom musical devotion is first a matter of the heart, and second of the intellect, Brahms in his most elaborate productions is as yet a puzzle, the solution of which they are by no means certain it is worth the while to find out. However, such a puzzle has its fascinations, and we would be very sorry not to have the occasional opportunity of grappling with it. As to the rest of the programme, comprising selections wholly delightful and performed without material flaw, we have space for little more than the bare record, which is as follows: "Magic Flute" overture, Mozart; air from Graun's "Der Tod Jesu"; air and gavotte from Bach's suite in D; two songs from Beethoven's "Egmont" music; Slavonian dances, Nos. 6 and 5. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist and sang superbly,—better than the best we ever heard from her in similar music. The next public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, instead of Friday, as usual. Professor Carl Baermann will be the soloist and the programme is as follows:—

Overture, op. 115, Beethoven; concerto in C, No. 1, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20, Gade; piano solo, "Carneval," op. 9, Schumann; "Invitation à la valse," Weber-Berlioz.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. It opened with an admirable reading of Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture. The symphony was Brahms's, No. 2, in D. The work does not gain upon a closer acquaintance. The opening movement, with its almost interminable development of its slight leading theme, is exceedingly wearisome, and the Adagio we give up as one of the most perplexing and uninteresting musical conundrums to which we have ever listened. The Allegretto is pleasing, and the finale abundant in fire and spirit, but the interest of the whole is disproportionate to the length of the symphony. It was finely interpreted. In fact, in many respects it was among the best efforts of the season. An air and gavotte by Bach also received excellent treatment. The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel, who in the first part sang the aria from Graun's "Tod Jesu," in which she has been heard here several times. She sang it chastely, and with rare grace and brilliancy. Her singing of Clärchen's songs from Beethoven's "Egmont" was also very charming, though she was somewhat lacking in force to give all due spirit to the drum song. At the next concert the symphony will be Gade's No. 4, in B flat. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and will play Mozart's Concerto in C, No. 1, and Schumann's "Carneval."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Concert

Overture (Magic Flute).....	Mozart
Air (Tod Jesu).....	Graun
Symphony in D No. 2, op. 73.....	Brahms
Allegro non troppo—Adagio non troppo—
Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.
Allegro con spirito.
Air and Gavotte (from the Suite in D.).....	Bach
Clärchen's Songs (Egmont).....	Beethoven
Slavonian Dances (Nos. 6 and 5).....	Dvorak
Allegretto scherzando.—Vivace.

The beautiful overture which began the above programme might have had more lightness in its first part, at the beginning of the allegro, but its closing portion was given with spirit and force, and made atonement for a rather dry commencement. The Symphony is a more abstruse one than the first symphony by Brahms, and the development of the first movement is by no means easily understood. Its last two movements are comparatively clear and melodious, and it was these which seemed to please the audience by far the best. The reading was, as before, a masterly one, but in the coda of the first movement, and in the passage for wood wind against pizzicato strings in the last movement, the ensemble was not well preserved, and there was a tendency to lag behind the conductor's beat. The climax of the finale was splendidly rendered, and the adagio was finely given, especially in the clearness with which the bass portion, often consisting of important phrases, was brought out. The first of the Bach numbers gave the strings an opportunity to show their excellent discipline. The last of the two was more fully scored, but still kept the strings in the foreground. Both movements are among the clearest and most melodious of Bach's instrumental works, and have become familiar in piano (by Schulhoff) and violoncello arrangements, and won the heartiest applause.

Their execution was clearness itself. The Slavonian dances added the usual spice to the programme. Mrs. Henschel's singing was admirable. In the Beethoven songs, one might have wished for more power, but the artistic ideal was so clearly set forth that no one could have been dissatisfied. But in the Graun aria there was both the ideal and its perfect execution. The phrasing was excellent, and given without apparent effort; the scales were clear and sure; the high passages of the second part, just preceding the reprise were of good, unforced quality, and, all in all, it was one of Mrs. Henschel's most successful efforts. The next programme offers Professor Baermann as soloist, and the following programme:—

Overture op. 115.....	Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C. No. 1.....	Mozart
Allegro maestoso—Andante—Allegro vivace assai.
Symphony in B flat. No. 4, op. 20.....	Gade
Piano solo.
Carneval, op. 9.....	Schumann
Invitation à la Valse.....	Weber-Berlioz

RL BAERMANN.

se a Chickering Piano.

AN OPERATIC SCHEME.

The patronage given the performances of Manager Mapleson's organization during the last two weeks indicates that a good support can be relied upon for such work as that given upon the principal nights of the season, and appears to insure success for any manager who shall succeed in giving equally good presentations in future seasons. To secure such performances, for a more extended season, there appears to be a necessity for some combined action on the part of those whose financial ability and inclinations put them in a position to assist in developing the musical possibilities of the future in the largest way. A plan for next season which has found favor with those whose attention has been called to it appears to offer an opportunity in this direction worthy of careful consideration. It will be very generally admitted that a large, well organized orchestra will add greatly to the success of any operatic scheme of performances, but more especially is this true in regard to the Wagnerian repertoire which is now so rapidly gaining popular favor. It has been deemed possible and practicable to utilize the Boston symphony orchestra, as well as the services of its talented leader, in this department of next season's operatic performances. Some adverse comment has been made by patrons of the present season's symphony concerts upon the length of the series, and it has been suggested that, if one series was arranged for the fall season and another for the spring months, with an interval of a few weeks between the two, there would be a greater interest felt in the later concerts of the scheme than if they were continued every week as they have been this and last season. Should such a change be made next season, an arrangement, if an early movement is made, might be effected with either Manager Mapleson or Manager Abbey by which the services of the symphony orchestra could be availed of for a season of opera occupying the interval between the fall and spring concerts. A special advantage might be gained in this way in the presentation of the Wagnerian repertoire by giving one of these operas each week under the direction of Mr. Henschel, who could drill the orchestra during the fall season in anticipation of such performances. It seems entirely reasonable that, with a little combined and intelligent effort, some such plan as this can be shaped and carried out; and by such means ensure a starting point for more extended and satisfactory seasons of operatic performances in this city than have been enjoyed of late years. The rapid development of a high local standard of musical taste in regard to orchestral works, which has followed the establishment of the symphony orchestra as a permanent organization, appears to warrant a similar advance movement in regard to operatic performances.

Harold

Twenty-fourth Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was presented: Overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; air ("Tod Jesu"), Graun; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; air and gavotte (from the suite in D), Bach; Clärchen's songs ("Egmont"), Beethoven; Slavonian dances (Nos. 6 and 5), Dvorak. The performance, as a whole, was one of the very best of the season, the only exception that could be taken with the orchestral work being a slight want of lightness in the first part of the Mozart overture. The symphony was splendidly played, and read with excellent judgment by Mr. Henschel, who, indeed, we may safely class as the best interpreter, as he is one of the greatest admirers, of Brahms in this country. A remarkably fine piece of work was done by the strings in the first of the two numbers by Bach. The Brahms symphony, however well played, is not likely to become a favorite work with any except the most devoted musicians. Its first two movements are intensely tiresome and dry, and although the other two movements have considerable interest and a purpose which can be, in part at least, apprehended, they hardly compensate an audience for the weariness caused by the rest of the work. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist on this occasion, and sang unusually well. Her best effort was made in the Graun air, which she sang with force and fine emotion; the Beethoven songs were also well done, although we could have wished for more energy and power. The next concert will present Prof. Carl Baermann as soloist, and offer the following programme: Overture, op. 115, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C, No. 1, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20, Gade; piano solo; "Carneval," op. 9, Schumann; "Invitation a la Valse," Weber-Berlioz.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 19, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-fourth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening with the following programme:

Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Air from "Der Tod Jesu".....Graun
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Air and gavotte (from the Suite in D).....Bach
Clärchen's songs from "Egmont".....Beethoven
Slavonian dances (Nos. 6 and 5).....Dvorak
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

The performance of Mozart's great overture was decidedly the finest we have ever listened to in this country. The tempo was moderate enough to allow of perfect distinctness of playing, while the accents were so vigorously italicized (albeit without exaggeration) that the general effect was more lively and vital than could have been produced by the most nimble prestissimo. Especially praiseworthy was the fine, even pianissimo of the orchestra in the softer passages; it was just right; as far removed from that meaningless mezzo forte which is the too common result of careless playing, as from that overdone, scarcely audible whisper which, beautiful as it may be in itself, has nothing whatever to do with Mozart, or the music of his period. The Brahms symphony was hugely enjoyed by us, if in a purely animal and irrational way; the music came in at one ear and went out at the other, but it left a delightful impression behind. You see, we are really getting on; here we are at last enjoying one of the Brahms symphonies. In a year or two we may be able really to understand them! The performance seemed to us wholly admirable. The Bach air and gavotte were played quite as well as we have heard them, the latter especially well. As for the air, we have yet to hear a performance of it which can be called really masterly, one in which the phrasing is at once natural and elegant. In phrasing Bach's beautiful melody, the first violins seem to be guided by no artistic conception of the melody, as such; they do not play it as a fine singer would sing it. In the distribution of accents they seem wholly guided by the length of the violin bow, and not by the natural division of the melody into phrases. One constantly hears certain notes accented in parts of the phrase where no accent is musically conceivable, and the easy flow of the melody is consequently disturbed. It sounds as if it were sung by a singer who kept taking breath in wrong places. The Slavonian dances were brilliantly played and much enjoyed.

Mrs. Henschel's singing of Graun's aria was superb at every point, such singing as one only hears from a complete artist. Thorough mastery of technique was here made the means of realizing a fiery artistic, intelligent and soulful conception. Not less admirable was the singing of the two wonderful songs from "Egmont." Never have poet and composer been more completely and sympathetically interpreted.

On account of the preparations for the chorus-stage for the Good Friday performance of the Handel and Haydn Society, the next public rehearsal will take place on Thursday, March 22, at 2.30 P. M., instead of on Good Friday. The programme is—

Overture, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C, No. 1.....Mozart
Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, op. 20.....Gade
Pianoforte Solo. Carneval, op. 9.....Schumann
Invitation a la valse.....Weber-Berlioz
Professor Carl Baermann will be the pianist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The twenty-fourth symphony concert by the Henschel orchestra on Saturday night in Music Hall was one of the distinguished successes of the season's series. A very large audience was in attendance, and the programme was a well-selected one, finely performed. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist, and her beautiful voice was never heard to better advantage. Following was the programme: Overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; air ("Tod Jesu"), Graun; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; air and gavotte (from the suite in D), Bach; Clärchen's songs ("Egmont"), Beethoven; Slavonian dances (Nos. 6 and 5), Dvorak. Professor Carl Baermann will be the soloist for the next occasion, which will take place as usual on Saturday night, though the public rehearsal will take place on Thursday afternoon instead of on Friday. The following programme will then be presented: Overture, op. 115, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C, No. 1, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20, Gade; piano solo, "Carneval," op. 9, Schumann; "Invitation a la Valse," Weber-Berlioz.

Music Hall.

1882 - 83.

NY ORCHESTRA,

HEL, CONDUCTOR.

NCERT.

I 3D, AT 8, P. M.

AMME.

BEETHOVEN.

minor, No. 2, op. 21. CHOPIN.

MAX BRUCH.

Scherzo. (Vivace, con spirito.)— op. vivace.)—

st time.)

LISZT.

NIC. RUBINSTEIN.

nson et Dalila.

SAINT-SAËNS.

time.)

IST:

MARGULIES.

se a Steinway Piano.

Boston Correspondence.

BOSTON, March 22.

THE twenty fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Saturday at Music Hall. The programme consisted of the following selections :

Overture, " Magic Flute ".....Mozart
Air, " Tod Jesu ".....Graun
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Air and Gavot, from Suite in D.....Bach
Clarcheus Songs (Egmont).....Beethoven
Slavonian Dances, Nos. 6 and 5.....Dvorak

Mrs. Henschel was the vocalist and sang with her usual good taste and finish. Her voice is scarcely large enough for Music Hall, but aside from this, her renditions are full of real musicianly feeling and her style of singing is of the very best. The Symphony of Brahms was well given. I cannot, with the best of good will, be friendly myself to the symphonies of this famous composer, often as I have heard them. His motives are lacking in clearness, his form is ill-defined, and his orchestration is not always well sounding. A particular weakness is his continually writing for many parts, with little relief for the basses, whereby the style becomes thickset and heavy ; light and shade are not properly balanced, and the end effect is monotony. Much as I admire many of the other works of this composer, I consider his symphonies his weakest efforts. Mme. Nilsson gave her farewell concert on Saturday afternoon before a large audience. She was in better voice than at her first concert, and created the usual enthusiasm.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, op. 115. BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in C. MOZART.

(No. 25 of Breitkopf's edition. Koechel No. 503.)

Allegro maestoso.—Andante.—Finale. (Allegretto.)—

[The Cadenza in the first movement is by Hummel.]

SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 4, op. 20. GADE.

Andantino. Allegro vivace e grazioso.—Andante con moto.—

Scherzo. (Allegro, ma non troppo.)—Finale. (Allegro molto vivace.)—

PIANO SOLO.

CARNAVAL. Scenes mignonnes for piano. Op. 9. SCHUMANN.

Préambule. Pierrot. Arlequin. Valse noble. Eusebius. Florestan.
Coquette. Réplique. Papillons. Lettres dansantes. Chiarina.
Chopin. Estrella. Reconnaissance. Pantalon et Colombine. Valse allemande. Paganini. Aveu. Promenade. Pause, Marche des
"Davidsbündler" contre les Philistins.

INVITATION A LA VALSE. WEBER-BERLIOZ.

SOLOIST :

PROFESSOR CARL BAERMANN.

Mr. Baermann will use a Chickering Piano.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened Beethoven's overture, op. 115, which was not clearly or well interpreted. The symphony was Gade's, in B-flat, No. 4, one of the most delightful, fresh and melodious of the composer's works in this class. It was charmingly read and performed throughout, and with a warmth and a delicacy wholly admirable. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of B. rilloz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation a la Valse." The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, who played Mozart's concerto for piano in C (No. 25 Breitkopf and Haertel), a beautiful work fascinating in its fluent melody, its grace, its tenderness and its delicate brilliancy. It is not prolific in the technical difficulties which form so large a staple in the more modern concerto, and affords the performer but little opportunity to astonish by mere finger play; but it is none the less difficult on that account. On the contrary, it is about as trying a work to render efficiently, and in its true spirit, as is contained in the repertory of piano music. It required some courage in Mr. Baermann to select a concerto that appealed so little to the eye and has so little to astonish from the standpoint of technique, but he had already achieved the highest distinction as a master of the most intricate finger work, and could well afford to make an experiment with a composition purely musical. It proved to be somewhat above the heads of hearers who have grown accustomed to piano gymnastics and prefer shadow to substance. Mr. Baermann has never done any finer work here than he did in this concerto. His phrasing of it throughout was exquisite. There was nothing in his interpretation of that flinical affectation with which it is the fashion to read Mozart's piano music. His rendering was broad, manly, vital and abundant in the expressiveness of the most refined character. The devoted artist and the conscientious musician were prominent in every bar of his performance. It was a genuine treat to every truly musical nature that listened to it, and the applause that greeted him at the end, if not as strong as he has received on other occasions, was none the less appreciative and sincere. Later in the evening he played Schumann's "Carnival," in which he has been heard here once before. On this occasion he excelled himself. No finer Schumann playing has ever been heard here, and it has been seldom indeed that anything as good has been vouchsafed. The poetry, the brilliancy, the fire, the sentiment and tenderness that characterized his playing of this work were as remarkable as they were masterly. He was recalled three times amid great enthusiasm. The next concert will be the last of the series. Beethoven's 9th Symphony will be given, and a Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra, by Mr. Henschel, will be heard for the first time here.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for piano-forte in C.....Mozart
Allegro maestoso—Andante—Finale. (Allegretto.)—
Professor Carl Baermann.
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20.....Gade
Andantino. Allegro vivace e grazioso.—Andante con moto.
Scherzo. (Allegro, ma non troppo.)—Finale. (Allegro molto vivace.)
Piano solo.
Carnaval. Scenes mignonnes for piano. Op. 9. Schumann
Invitation a la Valse.....Weber-Berlioz
Professor Baermann.

This concert was a red letter one in the series. Everything was interesting and almost everything was well played. The opening overture was a trifle too robust, but for the rest, one can only praise. We regret that want of space prevents this becoming a detailed account of ex-

cellences. Chief in interest was the performance of Schumann's Carnaval, which we have not heard so well rendered since Rubinstein played it here. The shifting scenes were brought in in most vivid contrast, and in every emotion the pianist was all that could be wished. It was a perfect performance, if we except a little lack of power in the finale. The concerto, a delightful work, clear and symmetrical, was as well played, but of course in a totally different vein. We are astonished at the versatility and keen intelligence displayed by this pianist. In Beethoven, Schumann and Mozart he is the embodiment of the composer's style, differing essentially in his interpretation of each. We were especially sorry to see that the audience did not appreciate the Mozart work. It was received without enthusiasm, although it was a beautiful number, thoroughly played. Schumann, on the other hand, was received with rapture, perhaps because of the Schumann fever with which the city has become inundated this month. The symphony was a noble one, full of exquisite thoughts, and redounding with those effects of tone color which Gade can use better than almost any other of the "romantic" composers. It has notably the merit of growing steadily in interest from first to last, its last movement being highly wrought up, yet never becoming unintelligible. The concert came to a conclusion with the brilliant Berlioz transcription, and the whole programme was one of the best made up and best carried out that we have had in this crowded musical season. The next will be the last of the series, and, of course, can culminate only in one way,—in the glorious (but unsingable) Ninth Symphony. The list for next Saturday is as follows: Overture (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Te Deum, for chorus, soli and orchestra (MS.), Henschel; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, Op. 125, Beethoven. The soloists will be Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Mr. V. Cirillo, bass; and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist.

Twenty-fifth Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fifth (and last but one) concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, the following fine programme being performed, Mr. Carl Baermann appearing as the soloist of the occasion: Overture, op. 115, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20, Gade; piano solo, carnaval (Scenes Mignonnes), for piano, op. 9, Schumann; Invitation a la valse, Weber-Berlioz. The concert was one of the finest of the series, and notable for the high and sustained order of excellence which attended it. The orchestral work, with the exception of the effort put into the overture, which was roughly performed, was remarkably fine, rising to its highest point in the interpretation of the symphony. This is a work delightful alike in sentiment and expression, richly toned and strongly developed, and one of the most interesting compositions of its class that have ever been played here. The orchestra brought out its beauties most effectively, and attained a very great success in the evenness, confidence and good judgement with which it played it. Mr. Carl Baermann's piano playing on this occasion was, as we have become accustomed to regarding it, quite beyond criticism. He played the concerto in a grand way, but as it is a work purely musical, quiet, fluent and graceful, and did not call for any marked manifestation of technical skill, it received but a very small reward of applause. Nevertheless, as a piece of pure and grand piano playing, its performance was worthy to rank among Mr. Baermann's finest efforts. His playing of Schumann's "Carnival" pieces, however—in which he showed the most extraordinary versatility, brill-

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened Beethoven's overture, op. 115, which was not clearly or well interpreted. The symphony was Gade's, in B-flat, No. 4, one of the most delightful, fresh and melodious of the composer's works in this class. It was charmingly read and performed throughout, and with a warmth and a delicacy wholly admirable. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of Berlioz's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation a la Valse." The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, who played Mozart's concerto for piano in C (No. 25 Breitkopf and Haertel), a beautiful work fascinating in its fluent melody, its grace, its tenderness and its delicate brilliancy. It is not prolific in the technical difficulties which form so large a staple in the more modern concerto, and affords the performer but little opportunity to astonish by mere finger play; but it is none the less difficult on that account. On the contrary, it is about as trying a work to render efficiently, and in its true spirit, as is contained in the repertory of piano music. It required some courage in Mr. Baermann to select a concerto that appealed so little to the eye and has so little to astonish from the standpoint of technique, but he had already achieved the highest distinction as a master of the most intricate finger work, and could well afford to make an experiment with a composition purely musical. It proved to be somewhat above the heads of hearers who have grown accustomed to piano gymnastics and prefer shadow to substance. Mr. Baermann has never done any finer work here than he did in this concerto. His phrasing of it throughout was exquisite. There was nothing in his interpretation of that finical affectation with which it is the fashion to read Mozart's piano music. His rendering was broad, manly, vital and abundant in the expressiveness of the most refined character. The devoted artist and the conscientious musician were prominent in every bar of his performance. It was a genuine treat to every truly musical nature that listened to it, and the applause that greeted him at the end, if not as strong as he has received on other occasions, was none the less appreciative and sincere. Later in the evening he played Schumann's "Carnival," in which he has been heard here once before. On this occasion he excelled himself. No finer Schumann playing has ever been heard here, and it has been seldom indeed that anything as good has been vouchsafed. The poetry, the brilliancy, the fire, the sentiment and tenderness that characterized his playing of this work were as remarkable as they were masterly. He was recalled three times amid great enthusiasm. The next concert will be the last of the series. Beethoven's 9th Symphony will be given, and a Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra, by Mr. Henschel, will be heard for the first time here.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

- Overture, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for piano-forte in C.....Mozart
Allegro maestoso—Andante—Finale. (Allegretto.)—
Professor Carl Baermann.
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20.....Gade
Andantino. Allegro vivace e grazioso.—Andante con moto.
Scherzo. (Allegro, ma non troppo.)—Finale. (Allegro molto vivace.)
Piano solo.
Carnaval. Scenes mignonnes for piano. Op. 9. Schumann
Invitation a la Valse.....Weber-Berlioz
Professor Baermann.

This concert was a red letter one in the series. Everything was interesting and almost everything was well played. The opening overture was a trifle too robust, but for the rest, one can only praise. We regret that want of space prevents this becoming a detailed account of ex-

cellences. Chief in interest was the performance of Schumann's Carnaval, which we have not heard so well rendered since Rubinstein played it here. The shifting scenes were brought in in most vivid contrast, and in every emotion the pianist was all that could be wished. It was a perfect performance, if we except a little lack of power in the finale. The concerto, a delightful work, clear and symmetrical, was as well played, but of course in a totally different vein. We are astonished at the versatility and keen intelligence displayed by this pianist. In Beethoven, Schumann and Mozart he is the embodiment of the composer's style, differing essentially in his interpretation of each. We were especially sorry to see that the audience did not appreciate the Mozart work. It was received without enthusiasm, although it was a beautiful number, thoroughly played. Schumann, on the other hand, was received with rapture, perhaps because of the Schumann fever with which the city has become incubated this month. The symphony was a noble one, full of exquisite thoughts, and redounding with those effects of tone color which Gade can use better than almost any other of the "romantic" composers. It has notably the merit of growing steadily in interest from first to last, its last movement being highly wrought up, yet never becoming unintelligible. The concert came to a conclusion with the brilliant Berlioz transcription, and the whole programme was one of the best made up and best carried out that we have had in this crowded musical season. The next will be the last of the series, and, of course, can culminate only in one way,—in the glorious (but unsingable) Ninth Symphony. The list for next Saturday is as follows: Overture (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Te Deum, for chorus, soli and orchestra (MS.), Henschel; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, Op. 125, Beethoven. The soloists will be Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Mr. V. Cirillo, bass; and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist.

Twenty-fifth Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fifth (and last but one) concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, the following fine programme being performed, Mr. Carl Baermann appearing as the soloist of the occasion: Overture, op. 115, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20, Gade; piano solo, carnival (Scenes Mignonnes), for piano, op. 9, Schumann; invitation a la valse, Weber-Berlioz. The concert was one of the finest of the series, and notable for the high and sustained order of excellence which attended it. The orchestral work, with the exception of the effort put into the overture, which was roughly performed, was remarkably fine, rising to its highest point in the interpretation of the symphony. This is a work delightful alike in sentiment and expression, richly toned and strongly developed, and one of the most interesting compositions of its class that have ever been played here. The orchestra brought out its beauties most effectively, and attained a very great success in the evenness, confidence and good judgement with which it played it. Mr. Carl Baermann's piano playing on this occasion was, as we have become accustomed to regarding it, quite beyond criticism. He played the concerto in a grand way, but as it is a work purely musical, quiet, fluent and graceful, and did not call for any marked manifestation of technical skill, it received but a very small reward of applause. Nevertheless, as a piece of pure and grand piano playing, its performance was worthy to rank among Mr. Baermann's finest efforts. His playing of Schumann's "Carnival" pieces, however—in which he showed the most extraordinary versatility, brill-

Handy and grasp of idea—was enthusiastically applauded, and he was thrice recalled at its close. The present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will end with the 26th programme at Music Hall next Saturday evening. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven will be the leading feature of this occasion, and the work will be given with the assistance of Miss Katherine von Arnheim, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Sig. V. Cirillo, bass, and a chorus formed under Mr. Henschel's direction. A manuscript "Te Deum" by Mr. Henschel, for chorus, soli and orchestra, will also be performed, and the "St. Paul" overture by Mendelssohn will introduce the programme, which will be publicly rehearsed, as usual, on Friday afternoon.

It is to be hoped that some arrangement will be made whereby there will be additional opportunities afforded the general public to hear the performance of the ninth symphony under Mr. Henschel's direction, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before the final concert on the 31st inst. It will be remembered that between 1500 and 2000 applicants for seats last year were disappointed and prevented from hearing this symphony. The difficulty will be increased this year, unless an additional performance is planned, as not only are the evening seats practically all sold, but the large lot of seats sold for the season at the rehearsals limits the general public to a very small chance of getting into the hall. The members of the chorus are of course taxed by any extra demand upon their time, but the pleasure given to thousands by an extra presentation of the work should be their reward, especially as they are by such an effort aiding in the good work of the generous founder of the orchestra. An extra public rehearsal on Friday evening, the 30th inst., would undoubtedly be availed of by large numbers of the musical public unable to attend the afternoon rehearsal, even if admission could be had to the hall.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-fifth concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was—

Overture: "Namensfeier," op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C.....Mozart
[No. 25, Breitkopf und Härtel; Koechel, No. 503.]
(Cadenza by Hummel.)
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 20.....Gade
Pianoforte solo: Carneval, op. 9.....Schumann
Invitation à la Valse.....Weber-Berlioz

Professor Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The "Namensfeier" is one of the least played of Beethoven's overtures, and perhaps with reason. Yet, although it cannot bear comparison with its greater companions, it is too fine a work to be laid wholly upon the shelf. Its themes are a thought insignificant for Beethoven, but the working-up is irresistibly fine and exciting. It was capitally played. Gade's B-flat symphony, which one is tempted to call its composer's most perfect orchestral work, all things considered, always comes back like an old and loved friend. A more entrancingly delightful piece of scoring can hardly be imagined, and the intrinsic beauty of the music makes it in every way worthy of its rich orchestral dress. The performance was eminently a fine one, except that we cannot but feel that Mr. Henschel's too rapid tempo in the Scherzo (the movement which was, at one time, as regularly encored in Germany as the Allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's eighth symphony), robbed it of the better part of its charm. But the other movements were given absolutely well in every respect. We were glad to hear once more Berlioz's admirable orchestral setting of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," originally arranged to supply ballet-music for the performances of "Der Freischütz" at the Paris Opéra. It was excellently played upon the whole, except that, during the second waltz theme, the horns, which have to strike the second and third beats of every measure, made much confusion in the rhythm by playing persistently behind time.

The Mozart concerto is in every way a delightful work, in its composer's most fascinating vein. The little reminiscence of "Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen" ("Zauberflöte") in the second theme of the first movement only added to the charm of the whole. Mr. Baermann's playing was brilliant, full of fire and sentiment, and unaffectedly straightforward. It was plain that the artist played straight from his heart, under the immediate spell of the beautiful music. Indeed, this is a sine qua non of success in playing Mozart, the pure maidenly beauty of whose melody will not endure the profanation of sophisticated "rendering." In so far as Mr. Baermann's playing had this quality of heartfelt sincerity and perfect artlessness, it was admirable. Yet, on the other hand, we felt perforce that, except for this sincerity, there was little real sympathy between the performer and the composer; in other words, that Mr. Baermann's sentiment was by no means Mozart's sentiment; or, to speak more strictly, that Mr. Baermann does not instinctively express his feelings as Mozart did. Of that peculiarly Italian graceful elegance which is very characteristic of Mozart, and of which we find no suggestion in any other German composer (unless we except Händel, who was at one time much under Italian influence), we found no trace in Mr. Baermann's playing. That, in lack of this native airy grace, he did not try to foist any affected posing upon his audience was eminently praiseworthy; but the fact still remains that his style, which would have suited Haydn, Schubert or even Weber to a T, did not reveal all the peculiar beauty of Mozart's inspiration. But in the Schumann "Carneval" he was superb at every point. Here we had a horse of another color, and Mr. Baermann dived straight to the very heart of the music. The next programme is—

Overture to St. Paul.....Mendelssohn
Te Deum for Chorus, Soli and Orchestra (MS.).....Henschel.
The Ninth Symphony.....Beethoven
(In D Minor, op. 125.)

The solo singers will be—Miss Katherine van Arnheim soprano, Miss Gertrude Edmonds contralto, Mr. Jules Jordan tenor, Mr. V. Cirillo bass. Mr. B. J. Lang will play the organ part in the Te Deum.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-Fifth of the Present Season's Programmes.

The 25th of the present season's programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Prof. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C.....Mozart
Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, op. 20.....Gade
Piano solo—Carneval. Scenes mignonnes for piano, op. 9.....Schumann
"Invitation à la Valse".....Weber-Berlioz

The concerto, with its echoes of "Il Flauto Magico," and the symphony, full of the poetic coloring of the Scandinavian folk songs, divided the interest of the occasion, each form of melodious beauty appealing with equal force to the mind and sentiment of the listener. The dainty graceful interpretation of the piano score of the concerto again proved the great abilities of Prof. Baermann in this style of composition, and the piano sang the melodious measures under his marvellous touch. It is a work of supererogation, however, to elaborate upon the musical gifts or the playing of this artist, who has so quietly established himself as a favorite with the concert going public. It need only be said that the concerto and the Schumann "Carneval" were interpreted in Prof. Baermann's happiest way to fully convey an idea of the pleasure caused by his playing. It is, however a matter of doubt if it be policy to place so large a proportion of pianoforte music upon a programme for a miscellaneous audience; as the average concert patron has not as yet shown a very decided prejudice in favor of this class of music. The entrancing beauties of the Gade symphony were played in an almost faultless manner by the orchestra, and it is so full of the northern melodies, which so richly color all of this composer's work, that there is a peculiar and indescribable charm to all its movements. The opening overture, and the Berlioz setting of the familiar Weber valse, were both admirably well played, making altogether a bright and pleasing programme.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will sail for London early in May, and will make their first appearance in that city as the soloists of the Richter concert of May 28. At the following Richter concert on June 4, Mr. Henschel will play his own pianoforte concerto, which was heard here for the first time early in the present season, with Prof. Baermann as soloist.

It has been found impossible to arrange for an additional public rehearsal of the ninth symphony under Mr. Henschel's direction, the time of the singers and the orchestra being so fully occupied as to render such an extra presentation of the work impossible. The regular rehearsal of Friday afternoon next and the public performance on Saturday evening will therefore be the only opportunities of hearing the work this season.

As the last of the Boston Symphony concerts is to be held on Saturday evening next, the thought must have suggested itself to not a few of those who have been regular attendants at these entertainments that some means might be devised by which their tickets could be extended, so as to avoid the trouble and uncertainty which occurred in securing seats last September. It must have been obvious to the manager of this series of concerts that those who patronized his entertainments the past season were mainly those who also held tickets to the first series, and it is inherently probable that the same people will be purchasers of tickets to the concerts given next season. This being the case, the inconvenience of standing all night in a line, or the expense of hiring some one else to perform this duty, or purchasing tickets from speculators, might be overcome by simply giving to those who now hold tickets an opportunity of retaining next season the seats they have had for the last six months. There are, no doubt, some who would like to improve the location of their seats, and an opportunity to make such a change might be accorded by allowing them to have a preferred claim on such seats as were not subscribed for by their present holders. A request on the part of the manager that holders of tickets should, before giving them up, write their names upon them, would probably be complied with, and he would thus be placed in a position to determine exactly who his patrons were. We make this suggestion for the reason that it is understood that Mr. Higginson was not satisfied with the manner in which his tickets were sold six months ago.

hancy and grasp of idea—was enthusiastically applauded, and he was thrice recalled at its close. The present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will end with the 26th programme at Music Hall next Saturday evening. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven will be the leading feature of this occasion, and the work will be given with the assistance of Miss Katherine von Arnheim, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Sig. V. Cirillo, bass, and a chorus formed under Mr. Henschel's direction. A manuscript "Te Deum" by Mr. Henschel, for chorus, soli and orchestra, will also be performed, and the "St. Paul" overture by Mendelssohn will introduce the programme, which will be publicly rehearsed, as usual, on Friday afternoon.

It is to be hoped that some arrangement will be made whereby there will be additional opportunities afforded the general public to hear the performance of the ninth symphony under Mr. Henschel's direction, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, before the final concert on the 31st inst. It will be remembered that between 1890 and 2000 applicants for seats last year were disappointed and prevented from hearing this symphony. The difficulty will be increased this year, unless an additional performance is planned, as not only are the evening seats practically all sold, but the large lot of seats sold for the season at the rehearsals limits the general public to a very small chance of getting into the hall. The members of the chorus are of course taxed by any extra demand upon their time, but the pleasure given to thousands by an extra presentation of the work should be their reward, especially as they are by such an effort aiding in the good work of the generous founder of the orchestra. An extra public rehearsal on Friday evening, the 30th inst., would undoubtedly be availed of by large numbers of the musical public unable to attend the afternoon rehearsal, even if admission could be had to the hall.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 26, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-fifth concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was—

Overture: "Namensfeier," op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C.....Mozart
[No. 25, Breitkopf und Härtel; Koechel, No. 503.]
(Cadenza by Hummel.)
Symphony No. 4, in B-flat, op. 20.....Gade
Pianoforte solo: "Carneval," op. 9.....Schumann
Invitation à la Valse.....Weber-Berlioz

Professor Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The "Namensfeier" is one of the least played of Beethoven's overtures, and perhaps with reason. Yet, although it cannot bear comparison with its greater companions, it is too fine a work to be laid wholly upon the shelf. Its themes are a thought insignificant for Beethoven, but the working-up is irresistibly fine and exciting. It was capably played. Gade's B-flat symphony, which one is tempted to call its composer's most perfect orchestral work, all things considered, always comes back like an old and loved friend. A more entrancingly delightful piece of scoring can hardly be imagined, and the intrinsic beauty of the music makes it in every way worthy of its rich orchestral dress. The performance was eminently a fine one, except that we cannot but feel that Mr. Henschel's too rapid tempo in the Scherzo (the movement which was, at one time, as regularly encoired in Germany as the Allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's eighth symphony), robbed it of the better part of its charm. But the other movements were given absolutely well in every respect. We were glad to hear once more Berlioz's admirable orchestral setting of Weber's "Invitation à la Valse," originally arranged to supply ballet-music for the performances of "Der Freischütz" at the Paris Opera. It was excellently played upon the whole, except that, during the second waltz theme, the horns, which have to strike the second and third beats of every measure, made much confusion in the rhythm by playing persistently behind time.

The Mozart concerto is in every way a delightful work, in its composer's most fascinating vein. The little reminiscence of "Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen" ("Zauberflöte") in the second theme of the first movement only added to the charm of the whole. Mr. Baermann's playing was brilliant, full of fire and sentiment, and unaffectedly straightforward. It was plain that the artist played straight from his heart, under the immediate spell of the beautiful music. Indeed, this is a sine qua non of success in playing Mozart, the pure maidenly beauty of whose melody will not endure the profanation of sophisticated "rendering." In so far as Mr. Baermann's playing had this quality of heartfelt sincerity and perfect artlessness, it was admirable. Yet, on the other hand, we felt perforce that, except for this sincerity, there was little real sympathy between the performer and the composer; in other words, that Mr. Baermann's sentiment was by no means Mozart's sentiment; or, to speak more strictly, that Mr. Baermann does not instinctively express his feelings as Mozart did. Of that peculiarly Italian graceful elegance which is very characteristic of Mozart, and of which we find no suggestion in any other German composer (unless we except Händel, who was at one time much under Italian influence), we found no trace in Mr. Baermann's playing. That, in lack of this native airy grace, he did not try to foist any affected posing upon his audience was eminently praiseworthy; but the fact still remains that his style, which would have suited Haydn, Schubert or even Weber to a T, did not reveal all the peculiar beauty of Mozart's inspiration. But in the Schumann "Carneval" he was superb at every point. Here we had a horse of another color, and Mr. Baermann dived straight to the very heart of the music. The next programme is—
Overture to St. Paul.....Mendelssohn
Te Deum for Chorus, Soli and Orchestra (MS.).....Henschel
The Ninth Symphony.....Beethoven
(In D Minor, op. 125.)

The solo singers will be—Miss Katherine van Arnheim soprano, Miss Gertrude Edmonds contralto, Mr. Jules Jordan tenor, Mr. V. Cirillo bass. Mr. B. J. Lang will play the organ part in the Te Deum.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-Fifth of the Present Season's Programmes.

The 25th of the present season's programmes by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Prof. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C.....Mozart
Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, op. 20.....Gade
Piano solo—Carnaval. Scenes mignonnes
for piano, op. 9.....Schumann
"Invitation à la Valse".....Weber-Berlioz

The concerto, with its echoes of "Il Flauto Magico," and the symphony, full of the poetic coloring of the Scandinavian folk songs, divided the interest of the occasion, each form of melodious beauty appealing with equal force to the mind and sentiment of the listener. The dainty graceful interpretation of the piano score of the concerto again proved the great abilities of Prof. Baermann in this style of composition, and the piano sang the melodious measures under his marvellous touch. It is a work of supererogation, however, to elaborate upon the musical gifts or the playing of this artist, who has so quietly established himself as a favorite with the concert-going public. It need only be said that the concerto and the Schumann "Carnival" were interpreted in Prof. Baermann's happiest way to fully convey an idea of the pleasure caused by his playing. It is, however, a matter of doubt if it be policy to place so large a proportion of pianoforte music upon a programme for a miscellaneous audience, as the average concert patron has not as yet shown a very decided prejudice in favor of this class of music. The entrancing beauties of the Gade symphony were played in an almost faultless manner by the orchestra, and it is so full of the northern melodies, which so richly color all of this composer's work, that there is a peculiar and indescribable charm to all its movements. The opening overture, and the Berlioz setting of the familiar Weber valse, were both admirably well played, making altogether a bright and pleasing programme.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will sail for London early in May, and will make their first appearance in that city as the soloists of the Richter concert of May 28. At the following Richter concert on June 4, Mr. Henschel will play his own pianoforte concerto, which was heard here for the first time early in the present season, with Prof. Baermann as soloist.

It has been found impossible to arrange for an additional public rehearsal of the ninth symphony under Mr. Henschel's direction, the time of the singers and the orchestra being so fully occupied as to render such an extra presentation of the work impossible. The regular rehearsal of Friday afternoon next and the public performance on Saturday evening will therefore be the only opportunities of hearing the work this season.

As the last of the Boston Symphony concerts is to be held on Saturday evening next, the thought must have suggested itself to not a few of those who have been regular attendants at these entertainments that some means might be devised by which their tickets could be extended, so as to avoid the trouble and uncertainty which occurred in securing seats last September. It must have been obvious to the manager of this series of concerts that those who patronized his entertainments the past season were mainly those who also held tickets to the first series, and it is inherently probable that the same people will be purchasers of tickets to the concerts given next season. This being the case, the inconvenience of standing all night in a line, or the expense of hiring some one else to perform this duty, or purchasing tickets from speculators, might be overcome by simply giving to those who now hold tickets an opportunity of retaining next season the seats they have had for the last six months. There are, no doubt, some who would like to improve the location of their seats, and an opportunity to make such a change might be accorded by allowing them to have a preferred claim on such seats as were not subscribed for by their present holders. A request on the part of the manager that holders of tickets should, before giving them up, write their names upon them, would probably be complied with, and he would thus be placed in a position to determine exactly who his patrons were. We make this suggestion for the reason that it is understood that Mr. Higginson was not satisfied with the manner in which his tickets were sold six months ago.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH SYMPHONY-CONCERT.

With such of "the elect" of the worshippers at Music's shrine as were present at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening, the occasion, we venture to say, will long be remembered as one of rare pleasure and spiritual edification. By "the elect" we mean those whose love of music for its own sake is primarily an instinct,—a passion,—as distinguished on the one hand from the pretenders, whose devotion is an affectation, and on the other from the self-deceived, who mistake a warm adherence to a creed or the pleasure which comes from purely intellectual exercise for the vital spirit, which is really not in them, or who think they are enjoying music when they are only worshipping the skill or personal fascinations of the performer. The genuine enthusiast, on the contrary, lets all his physical senses except that of hearing rest in abeyance for the time being, and measures the value, to him, of a given work solely by the emotions which are awakened by the sounds that reach his ear,—emotions as distinct, yet undefinable, as the pleasure which comes, through another physical sense, from the perfume of a rose. To such as were capable of this purely spiritual enjoyment, the concert of Saturday evening offered a rare feast, while all grosser tastes must have found themselves but meagrely ministered to. There was nothing on the programme that catered to the love of sensation or display, no striking novelty to whet curiosity, and no vexed problems to distract the musical sense by torturing the brain; yet so free from triviality was the programme that the most devoted attention was well rewarded. The list of selections was very happily arranged, not only for purposes of variety, but for symmetry of general impression, and the average character of the music lay along that agreeable level as effectually removed from the dizzy heights of genius in its most aspiring mood as from the low plane of commonplace and realism. It was just the kind of programme which permits a listener of reasonable musical cultivation to enjoy without the embarrassment of conscious effort, while yet his best faculties shall be employed in natural, and therefore agreeable exercise. Its general tenor was sunny and serene, and its effect was highly conducive to serenity in the listener. It opened with Beethoven's noble opus 115 overture, otherwise known as the "Namensfeier," which was performed fairly well, but with not all due delicacy and clearness of treatment. The symphony was Gade's No. 4 (opus 20) in B flat. The work is in Gade's best vein—snave, beautifully finished in detail, melodious, and quite characteristic in its picturesque suggestions of out-door scenes. This work might well have been written under the influence of a serene landscape in a clime at least temporarily emancipated from the rigors of snow and ice. It was played with delightful warmth and delicacy. Equally well done was the orchestra's performance of the Berlioz arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," which was the only other purely orchestral selection of the evening.

Professor Carl Baermann was on this occasion the soloist, for the third time during the present series of concerts. He played Mozart's concerto in C (No. 25 of Breitkopf's edition), and the "Carnaval" group of piano pieces by Schumann. His performance in each case was but a new illustration of the pianist's masterly powers of interpretation, which have been so many times recognized before. With a command of technique that seems to be practically unlimited for all legitimate purposes, he unites the power, apparently to put himself in perfect sympathy with his composer, and he seems equally at home with composers of the most diverse styles. His playing of the Mozart and Schumann works was in each case a model of intelligent and sympathetic interpretation, as have been on former occasions his interpretations of Beethoven. No more significant evidence of his rare artistic powers could be adduced than the fact that, while he is playing, one forgets to observe the skill shown, so absorbing is the enjoyment of its results. Less perhaps than in the case of any other pianist now before the public does his personality obtrude itself on the listener, so thoroughly does he identify himself with his composer. The audience seemed strangely indifferent to the great beauties of the concerto and its masterly interpretation, but at the close of the Schumann number the pianist was greeted with much of the peculiar warmth of applause which has always before marked the receptions given him at our concerts.

The next concert will close the present long series, and will be signalized, as was the closing concert of last season, by the performance of Beethoven's choral symphony. The soloists will be Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Mr. V. Cirillo, bass; and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist. The programme also comprises Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" overture and Mr. Henschel's Te Deum for chorus, soli and orchestra.

special clientele. It is doubtful if the plan goes any further than talk. Mr. H. L. Higginson, the banker, who owns a controlling interest in the building, is not likely to enter into competition with the scholarly Stetson or the finical Fiete and lay snares to catch stray combinations and opera troupes. His temper is too uncertain to permit his engaging in managerial work, I think. If he is so easily ruffled over trifling troubles in his musical season, what a bear Higginson would be in what would be, in all but the name, a combination house? Of course, the managers wouldn't welcome Music Hall as a competitor. The only one who has given any encouragement at all, so far as known, is Colonel Mapleson, who cherishes unpleasant memories of being worsted by the Boston theatre people in his recent opera season, and longs for an opportunity to give a lyric week elsewhere next year.

You have heard something about the sale of the great organ. Higginson has incurred the undying hostility of a good many old women of both sexes by his openly expressed contempt for what was once thought an eighth wonder of the world, and by his outspoken readiness to sell the organ in Music Hall to the highest bidder. "I don't care what the public think," Mr. Higginson is understood to have said to a remonstrant. "As for the newspapers, I don't read them. That organ I propose to sell to whoever makes the highest bid. I don't care where he lives. Oshkosh is just as good a place to hail from as Philadelphia." Some time between June 15 and Aug. 15, the instrument will be taken from Music Hall, and quite a large stage will be constructed, in the rear of which probably a cheap organ may be housed. As I have previously said, there is little chance that Music Hall will be made over into an opera house; but to meet occasional requirements there will undoubtedly be a proscenium, some show of scenery, and a few stage appurtenances.

Boston Correspondence.

Boston, April 1.

THE last two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on March 24th and 31st, thus ending the series for this season.

The programme of March 24th was:

Overture, Op. 115.....	Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte, C major.....	Mozart
Symphony, B flat, No. 4, op. 20.....	Gade
Piano Solo, Carnaval, op. 9.....	Schumann
Invitation a la Valse, Berlioz.....	Weber

I was unable to hear this concert, but from a trustworthy source am informed that the orchestral selections lacked finish, and that the interest centred in the magnificent playing of Prof. Carl Baermann, who was the soloist. The playing of a Mozart concerto by Mr. Baermann was a great piece of self-denial, since the concerto, as was to be expected, was not appreciated by the audience. Mozart's naïveté, his beautifully clear and pure style are too far removed from American sentiments and feelings to be enjoyed by concert-goers here. Baermann is too great and true an artist for Boston. This may sound strange, but it is nevertheless true. Not that there are not some people here who can understand his real worth, but the question is, how must a real artist like Baermann, who must be conscious of his superior powers, feel, when he sees the same audiences that enthusiastically applaud his playing, applaud and support the performances of sham-artists or musicians who are no more than good amateurs, but who have a fashionable crowd behind them, and the sang-froid—or in plain English, cheek—to perform publicly great works in a bad manner and with the music under their noses; also, how must he feel to see the same critics who praise his good work, praise the other bad work just as highly. It must be highly discouraging! This lack of discrimination in a Boston audience extends also to orchestral and other performances, for I have seen the rendering of a certain symphony of Beethoven enthusiastically applauded here, when no doubt it would have been heartily hissed in the smallest German town. What is the cause of this? It is because in America art as yet is treated in the same way as politics. The political wire-puller, by the aid of his friends, gets into an office for which he is not at all qualified, and where he has no business to be. Just so the musical wire-puller, who, as a rule, is at best a mediocrity, by the aid of his friends and by catering to fashionable and wealthy people who have no judgment, gets into a position, where, by his incapacity, he does the greatest harm to the cause of real art. The natural consequence of such a state of things is that audiences do not learn to discriminate between good and bad. This is why I say that Baermann, Sherwood, and one or two others are too good artists for Boston as yet. They suffer, and will continue to suffer for the present through the intrigues and cabals of ascertain clique of ignoramuses. It is the old story of the eternal war waged by inferiority against superiority.

244

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXVI. CONCERT.

(THE LAST OF THE SECOND SEASON.)

1883
SATURDAY, MARCH 31ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (St. Paul.) MENDELSSOHN.

TE DEUM FOR CHORUS, SOLI AND ORCHESTRA. (MS.) . . . HENSCHEL.

THE NINTH (CHORAL) SYMPHONY. BEETHOVEN.
In D minor, op. 125.

SOLOISTS:

MISS KATHERINE VAN ARNHEM, Soprano.

MISS GERTRUDE EDMANDS, Contralto.

MR. JULES JORDAN, Tenor.

MR. V. CIRILLO, Bass.

MR. B. J. LANG, Organ.

246

THE NINTH SYMPHONY. . . . BEETHOVEN.

- I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.—
II. Molto Vivace. Presto.—
Molto Vivace. Presto.—
III. Adagio molto e cantabile. Andante moderato.
Tempo primo. Andante moderato. Adagio.—
IV. Presto. [Recitative for Basses, interspersed with changes of movement: Allegro ma non troppo—Vivace—Adagio cantabile—Allegro assai.]
Allegro assai. Presto.—

RECITATIVE: O dearest brothers, these tones no longer!
Rather, let us raise together now our voices,
And sing more joyfully!

SOLI AND CHORUS: SCHILLER'S "ODE TO JOY."

Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness,
Daughter from Elysium!
Hearts on fire, with steps of lightness,
On thy holy ground we come.

Thou canst bind all, each to other,
Custom sternly rends apart,
All mankind are friend and brother
Where thy soft wing fans the heart.

He whom happy fate has granted
Friend to have and friend to be,
Faithful wife who never wanted,
Mingle in our jubilee;

Yea, who in his heart's sure keeping
Counts but one true soul his own.
Who cannot—oh, let him weeping
Steal away and live alone.

Joy all living things are drinking,
Nature's breasts for all do flow;
Good and evil, all unthinking,
On her rosy way we go.

Kisses gave she, wine-crowned leisure,
Friends in death, aye, true to friends.
Meanest worm hath sense of pleasure,
Before God the Seraph stands.

Joyous as yon orbs in gladness
Speed along their path on high,
Brothers come! Away with sadness,
Let us on to victory.

Oh, embrace now, all ye millions!
Here's a kiss to all the world.
Brothers, o'er yon azure fold
Is a loving Father's dwelling.

Why on bended knees, ye millions?
Feel ye your Creator near?
Search beyond that boundless sphere,
High among the star pavilions.

247

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

THE CONCERTS

WILL BE RESUMED ON SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13TH.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (St. Paul) Mendelssohn
Te Deum for chorus solo and orchestra (MS.) Henschel
The Ninth (Choral) Symphony Beethoven
In D minor, op. 125.

Soloists:
Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, Soprano.
Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Contralto.
Mr. Jules Jordan, Tenor.
Mr. V. Cirillo, Bass.

Mr. J. B. Lang, Organ.

The performance of the great Ninth Symphony is always an event of the highest artistic importance, and is sure to attract an audience of exceptional size and intelligence. It is almost equally sure that many of the audience are invariably disappointed with the work after hearing it. The massive treatment of the themes in the first movement, the exquisite simplicity and beauty of the trio of the scherzo, and the strong contrasts of rhythm in this portion, and the tenderness and sweetness of the principal theme of the adagio, with its variations and alternations with the second subject; all these produce the profoundest impression in the mind of the listener and this impression, is only deepened in the introduction of the Finale where theme after theme from the earlier portions of the work, passes in review, and is dismissed by a stately recitative. This recitative (instrumental) and the announcement of the theme in unison, by the cellos and contra-basses, is one of the simplest yet grandest effects of all. But now follows the elaboration and variation in the vocal parts, in which every unvocal act is committed, in which the voices are treated utterly without mercy, and forced into the highest tessitura, ending with a stretto which is screamed out prestissimo and leaves both the singers and audience exhausted.

Beethoven, always an orchestral and instrumental composer, in his deafness conceived a great musical thought which was too broad for the instruments for which he was writing—the human voice. It remains therefore a thought, which can always appeal more to the eye of the musician from the score than to the ear of the auditor from the performance.

One can almost doubt, from the effect of some of the vocal numbers, whether, had Beethoven possessed his hearing, and been entirely conscious of the strained result of some portions of the finale, he would not have materially altered many passages. This criticism is, however, rather that of the singing teacher than of the general musician, to whom the breadth of the final idea is compensation for all defects. The occasion partook last evening of the character of a solemnity, since we cannot believe it was chance that made up the programme of such serious works.

The overture with its broad organ accompaniment, put the audience into an appropriate mood for the earnest works to follow. Mr. Henschel's own Te Deum is one of the broadest, and highest works he has given forth. There is, at times, as in the Holy, Holy, a flavor of Mendelssohn apparent, but nothing like a plagiarism. There are many sudden contrasts, and quick transitions of shading in the composition, the final cadence being one of them. The duet for female voices. Also the Holy Ghost, was well sung, and is true, singable music. At the close of the work and also at the close of the concert Mr. Henschel received a perfect ovation, which must have assured him, better than our pen can do, that his efforts in the cause of Boston's music have been appreciated.

To return to the Symphony. The performance of the instrumental portion of the work was excellent, save that the second theme of the Scherzo, in the wood wind was overbalanced by the strings. The placing of the contra basses at the back of the orchestra, for the first time this season, gave to their very important part in the finale, just the right degree of mellowness. The contra bassoon was heard to great advantage in the march movement of the finale; and the horns did their difficult work in the two preceding movements with thoroughness. But the vocal work can scarcely be as leniently reviewed. All of the soloists, save perhaps Mr. Jordan, sang with apparent effort, and the final quartet was by no means an adequate representation of the composer's thoughts, but, as above hinted, the composer himself may be to blame for this, since each of these artists have proved themselves admirable in less exacting works. The chorus did better than that of last season, save for the fact that a few over-ambitious basses often attacked phrases prematurely. The sopranos deserve praise especially, since they gave the high notes very clearly, and with as little screaming as possible under the circumstances.

With this worthy programme ended the most phenomenal series of orchestral concerts that Boston has ever enjoyed. Next season the orchestra, under the same director, will give its first concert October 13.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. Mendelssohn's overture to "St. Paul," a MS "Te Deum" for chorus, solo and orchestra, by Mr. Henschel, and Beethoven's ninth symphony constituted the programme. Mr. Henschel's "Te Deum" is a broadly-written, impressive and musicianly work, clear, strongly colored and interesting throughout. It is perhaps somewhat too heavily scored for the voices to be heard to the best effect, but the composition as a whole is creditable to the taste, skill and musical knowledge of the composer. It was well sung and cordially received. The symphony was, on the whole, admirably read and performed. Its interpretation was an advance on that of last season in almost every respect. This time Mr. Henschel did not trust to his memory, but had the score before him and the better results attained were the consequence. The tempi were taken with excellent judgment. The only blemishes were in one or two places in the slow movement, where there was a slight hesitation in attack among the wind instruments, and in the opening presto of the finale, where there was a lack of clearness generally. The recitatives of the basses were taken more rapidly than we have been accustomed to hear them, and, as we think, with loss of breadth and dignity. But the performance as a whole was a pleasing surprise, and worthily emphasized and brought to a creditable culmination the improved work Mr. Henschel has done this season. The chorus acquitted itself very well indeed. The voices were fresh, and the sopranos went through their difficult task with less of that screaming effect which generally signalizes the singing of this music. The soloists were Miss Katherine Von Arnhem, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. V. Cirillo. Their achievements were not of the best. Miss Von Arnhem did not seem to have sufficient power to bring out the upper notes with sufficient strength or clearness, and Mr. Jordan made very queer work of at least one of his solos. The applause at the end was very enthusiastic, and the audience recalled Mr. Henschel with much heartiness by way of farewell. The concerts are to be resumed Oct. 13th.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-sixth and last concert of the present season was given on Saturday evening in the Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "St. Paul" Mendelssohn
Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra (MS.) Henschel
Ninth Symphony in D minor Beethoven

The solo singers were—Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. Vincenzo Cirillo. Mr. B. J. Lang played the organ part in the overture and the Te Deum. Mendelssohn's brilliant overture was capitally played, and made a great effect. Mr. Henschel's Te Deum is eminently an effective work, full of passages of intense emotional vigor. The treatment of the text is concise, and the composer has allowed himself little extended elaboration of his themes. Beyond the evident effectiveness and brilliancy of the work one could judge little of it at a single hearing. The orchestration is very full and evidently calculated for stronger solo voices than those that sang last Saturday evening. At times it seemed as if the use made of the orchestra were not quite so skilful as is Mr. Henschel's habit, and some of the brass passages sounded a little coarse. There is some rather astounding harmony, too, at the beginning of the work; one or two sudden changes which take one by surprise and tend to throw the ear off its balance at first. But it would take greater familiarity with the work to enable one to estimate the true value of these extreme effects. Suffice it to say that the music seems written at a fine fever heat, and that the interest does not flag for a moment. The Ninth Symphony had one of the best performances that have been heard here. The chorus did especially well, and showed the carefulest and most intelligent drilling. A fine quality of tone is not to be expected from sopranos whose part clings so affectionately to the high A, but the whole choir actually sang the music allotted them, and sang it with spirit, vigor and effect. A nice attention to effects of light and shade was peculiarly noteworthy. The solo singers did fairly well, as a rule, the only serious shortcomings being noticeable in passages which require utterly exceptional vocal powers. One thing we have always been surprised at in performances of the work—why do not solo tenors take advantage of Beethoven's direction at the close of the solo, "Joyous as yon orbs of gladness"? The direction in question is to the effect that the closing measures may be omitted by the solo voice, but not by the chorus. The passage in question can be made effective only by the strongest-voiced singer, by a Wachtel or a Mazzoleni, for instance. For a singer to make the phrase just barely audible is to introduce an element of weakness into what should be a very strong climax; if his voice cannot decisively dominate both chorus and orchestra, and make the final B-flat the most prominent feature in the whole ensemble, he had far better follow Beethoven's suggestion, and remain silent—a feat, upon the whole, not difficult to perform. The orchestra played in general extremely well. To be sure, the wooden wind was not so effective as usual, the chorus seats on the stage crowding the players out of their usual raised position, so that their tone was frequently covered up by the strings. Mr. Henschel's conception of the grand work seemed to us absolutely fine. The whole occasion was one of enthusiasm, and, at the close, the audience's farewell to Mr. Henschel after this his second season was of the warmest description. The next season will begin on Oct. 13.

The Last Symphony Concert.

The twenty-sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening before one of the largest and most critical audiences of the season. The programme was as follows: Overture (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra (MS), Henschel; the Ninth (Choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. The overture, in which the strong organ accompaniment by Mr. B. J. Lang appeared with marked effect, was fairly well played, and served as a good introduction for the more important numbers on the programme. Mr. Henschel's "Te Deum," which was heard for the first time, proved to be an interesting composition, although there were points in it suggestive of Mendelssohn which the performance of the overture just before it made more marked than might otherwise have been the case. Its instrumental effects were rather too strong for the force of the voices that were enlisted in its performance, but in a church service, and with organ accompaniment, it would probably be more symmetrically effective. As for the solo parts, however, they are so inconspicuous and unimportant that it would seem as well if they were left out altogether. As a whole, however, and in the matter of fine musical effects and knowledge of the demands of religious musical composition, this work is of much interest. The performance of the symphony was as good as any one could reasonably expect, in view of the fact that, so far at least as the vocal parts are concerned, it is quite beyond human powers to give a perfect rendering of it. The instrumental portions of the symphony were very finely performed, not only much better than last year, but fully as well as on any previous occasion in this city. Particularly fine was the third movement, and the latter half of the second. The soloists were Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass. Their success was not in any instance remarkable, but they did as well as could reasonably be demanded of them under the circumstances. The chorus acquitted itself creditably, always, however, under the reflection that the music allotted to it is of the utmost difficulty, and almost impossible of successful rendering by any body of singers. The next season of concerts by this association will begin on October 13, Mr. Henschel retaining his present position of conductor.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (St. Paul) Mendelssohn
Te Deum for chorus solo and orchestra (MS.) Henschel
The Ninth (Choral) Symphony Beethoven
In D minor, op. 125.

Soloists:
Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, Soprano.
Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Contralto.
Mr. Jules Jordan, Tenor.
Mr. V. Cirillo, Bass.
Mr. J. B. Lang, Organ.

The performance of the great Ninth Symphony is always an event of the highest artistic importance, and is sure to attract an audience of exceptional size and intelligence. It is almost equally sure that many of the audience are invariably disappointed with the work after hearing it. The massive treatment of the themes in the first movement, the exquisite simplicity and beauty of the trio of the scherzo, and the strong contrasts of rhythm in this portion, and the tenderness and sweetness of the principal theme of the adagio, with its variations and alternations with the second subject; all these produce the profoundest impression in the mind of the listener and this impression, is only deepened in the introduction of the Finale where theme after theme from the earlier portions of the work, passes in review, and is dismissed by a stately recitative. This recitative (instrumental) and the announcement of the theme in unison, by the cellos and contra-basses, is one of the simplest yet grandest effects of all. But now follows the elaboration and variation in the vocal parts, in which every unvocal act is committed, in which the voices are treated utterly without mercy, and forced into the highest lessitura, ending with a stretto which is screamed out prestissimo and leaves both the singers and audience exhausted.

Beethoven, always an orchestral and instrumental composer, in his deafness conceived a great musical thought which was too broad for the instruments for which he was writing—the human voice. It remains therefore a thought, which can always appeal more to the eye of the musician from the score than to the ear of the auditor from the performance.

One can almost doubt, from the effect of some of the vocal numbers, whether, had Beethoven possessed his hearing, and been entirely conscious of the strained result of some portions of the finale, he would not have materially altered many passages. This criticism is, however, rather that of the singing teacher than of the general musician, to whom the breadth of the final idea is compensation for all defects. The occasion partook last evening of the character of a solemnity, since we cannot believe it was chance that made up the programme of such serious works.

The overture with its broad organ accompaniment, put the audience into an appropriate mood for the earnest works to follow. Mr. Henschel's own Te Deum is one of the broadest, and highest works he has given forth. There is, at times, as in the Holy, Holy, a flavor of Mendelssohn apparent, but nothing like a plagiarism. There are many sudden contrasts, and quick transitions of shading in the composition, the final cadence being one of them. The duet for female voices. Also the Holy Ghost, was well sung, and is true, singable music. At the close of the work and also at the close of the concert Mr. Henschel received a perfect ovation, which must have assured him, better than our pen can do, that his efforts in the cause of Boston's music have been appreciated.

To return to the Symphony. The performance of the instrumental portion of the work was excellent, save that the second theme of the Scherzo, in the wood wind was overbalanced by the strings. The placing of the contra basses at the back of the orchestra, for the first time this season, gave to their very important part in the finale, just the right degree of mellowness. The contra bassoon was heard to great advantage in the march movement of the finale; and the horns did their difficult work in the two preceding movements with thoroughness. But the vocal work can scarcely be as leniently reviewed. All of the soloists, save perhaps Mr. Jordan, sang with apparent effort, and the final quartet was by no means an adequate representation of the composer's thoughts, but, as above hinted, the composer himself may be to blame for this, since each of these artists have proved themselves admirable in less exacting works. The chorus did better than that of last season, save for the fact that a few over-ambitious basses often attacked phrases prematurely. The sopranos deserve praise especially, since they gave the high notes very clearly, and with as little screaminess as possible under the circumstances.

With this worthy programme ended the most phenomenal series of orchestral concerts that Boston has ever enjoyed. Next season the orchestra, under the same director, will give its first concert October 13.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. Mendelssohn's overture to "St. Paul," a MS "Te Deum" for chorus, soli and orchestra, by Mr. Henschel, and Beethoven's ninth symphony constituted the programme. Mr. Henschel's "Te Deum" is a broadly-written, impressive and musically work, clear, strongly colored and interesting throughout. It is perhaps somewhat too heavily scored for the voices to be heard to the best effect, but the composition as a whole is creditable to the taste, skill and musical knowledge of the composer. It was well sung and cordially received. The symphony was, on the whole, admirably read and performed. Its interpretation was an advance on that of last season in almost every respect. This time Mr. Henschel did not trust to his memory, but had the score before him and the better results attained were the consequence. The tempi were taken with excellent judgment. The only blemishes were in one or two places in the slow movement, where there was a slight hesitation in attack among the wind instruments, and in the opening presto of the finale, where there was a lack of clearness generally. The recitatives of the basses were taken more rapidly than we have been accustomed to hear them, and, as we think, with loss of breadth and dignity. But the performance as a whole was a pleasing surprise, and worthily emphasized and brought to a creditable culmination the improved work Mr. Henschel has done this season. The chorus acquitted itself very well indeed. The voices were fresh, and the sopranos went through their difficult task with less of that screaming effect which generally signalizes the singing of this music. The soloists were Miss Katherine Von Arnhem, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. V. Cirillo. Their achievements were not of the best. Miss Von Arnhem did not seem to have sufficient power to bring out the upper notes with sufficient strength or clearness, and Mr. Jordan made very queer work of at least one of his solos. The applause at the end was very enthusiastic, and the audience recalled Mr. Henschel with much heartiness by way of farewell. The concerts are to be resumed Oct. 13th.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-sixth and last concert of the present season was given on Saturday evening in the Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "St. Paul" Mendelssohn
Te Deum for chorus, soli and orchestra (MS.) Henschel
Ninth Symphony in D minor Beethoven

The solo singers were—Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, Mr. Jules Jordan and Mr. Vincenzo Cirillo. Mr. B. J. Lang played the organ part in the overture and the Te Deum. Mendelssohn's brilliant overture was capitally played, and made a great effect. Mr. Henschel's Te Deum is eminently an effective work, full of passages of intense emotional vigor. The treatment of the text is concise, and the composer has allowed himself little extended elaboration of his themes. Beyond the evident effectiveness and brilliancy of the work one could judge little of it at a single hearing. The orchestration is very full and evidently calculated for stronger solo voices than those that sang last Saturday evening. At times it seemed as if the use made of the orchestra were not quite so skilful as is Mr. Henschel's habit, and some of the brass passages sounded a little coarse. There is some rather astounding harmony, too, at the beginning of the work; one or two sudden changes which take one by surprise and tend to throw the ear off its balance at first. But it would take greater familiarity with the work to enable one to estimate the true value of these extreme effects. Suffice it to say that the music seems written at a fine fever heat, and that the interest does not flag for a moment. The Ninth Symphony had one of the best performances that have been heard here. The chorus did especially well, and showed the carefulest and most intelligent drilling. A fine quality of tone is not to be expected from sopranos whose part clings so affectionately to the high A, but the whole choir actually sang the music allotted them, and sang it with spirit, vigor and effect. A nice attention to effects of light and shade was peculiarly noteworthy. The solo singers did fairly well, as a rule, the only serious shortcomings being noticeable in passages which require utterly exceptional vocal powers. One thing we have always been surprised at in performances of the work—why do not solo tenors take advantage of Beethoven's direction at the close of the solo, "Joyous as yon orbs of gladness"? The direction in question is to the effect that the closing measures may be omitted by the solo voice, but not by the chorus. The passage in question can be made effective only by the strongest-voiced singer, by a Wachtel or a Mazzoleni, for instance. For a singer to make the phrase just barely audible is to introduce an element of weakness into what should be a very strong climax; if his voice cannot decisively dominate both chorus and orchestra, and make the final B-flat the most prominent feature in the whole ensemble, he had far better follow Beethoven's suggestion, and remain silent—a feat, upon the whole, not difficult to perform. The orchestra played in general extremely well. To be sure, the wooden wind was not so effective as usual, the chorus seats on the stage crowding the players out of their usual raised position, so that their tone was frequently covered up by the strings. Mr. Henschel's conception of the grand work seemed to us absolutely fine. The whole occasion was one of enthusiasm, and, at the close, the audience's farewell to Mr. Henschel after this his second season was of the warmest description. The next season will begin on Oct. 13.

The Last Symphony Concert.

The twenty-sixth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening before one of the largest and most critical audiences of the season. The programme was as follows: Overture (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra (MS), Henschel; the Ninth (Choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. The overture, in which the strong organ accompaniment by Mr. B. J. Lang appeared with marked effect, was fairly well played, and served as a good introduction for the more important numbers on the programme. Mr. Henschel's "Te Deum," which was heard for the first time, proved to be an interesting composition, although there were points in it suggestive of Mendelssohn which the performance of the overture just before it made more marked than might otherwise have been the case. Its instrumental effects were rather too strong for the force of the voices that were enlisted in its performance, but in a church service, and with organ accompaniment, it would probably be more symmetrically effective. As for the solo parts, however, they are so inconspicuous and unimportant that it would seem as well if they were left out altogether. As a whole, however, and in the matter of fine musical effects and knowledge of the demands of religious musical composition, this work is of much interest. The performance of the symphony was as good as any one could reasonably expect, in view of the fact that, so far at least as the vocal parts are concerned, it is quite beyond human powers to give a perfect rendering of it. The instrumental portions of the symphony were very finely performed, not only much better than last year, but fully as well as on any previous occasion in this city. Particularly fine was the third movement, and the latter half of the second. The soloists were Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass. Their success was not in any instance remarkable, but they did as well as could reasonably be demanded of them under the circumstances. The chorus acquitted itself creditably, always, however, under the reflection that the music allotted to it is of the utmost difficulty, and almost impossible of successful rendering by any body of singers. The next season of concerts by this association will begin on October 13, Mr. Henschel retaining his present position of conductor.

250

Herald

With the presentation of the 26th programme of the second season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, which is duly commented upon in another column, these entertainments come to an end until next October. The record made by the orchestra and its accomplished director, Mr. Georg Henschel, during the past six months, is a highly creditable one, and it can be assumed with confidence that no city in America has ever enjoyed so extended and generally satisfactory a series of orchestral concerts as that given the past winter by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Henschel has shown a broad, liberal and progressive spirit in his selection of programmes, he has, while selecting the best available solo talent, shown a desire to advance capable aspirants for popular favor by permitting their debut at these concerts, and he has, more than all, avoided a tendency toward elevating the character of the concerts above the taste of the concert patrons of average musical intelligence. While many new works have found a place upon the programmes, there has been no attempt to cater to the craving for novelties, which a small number of patrons might applaud, to the neglect of standard compositions. The works which have been heard for the first time at the concerts of the past season are Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony, Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, Schubert's (manuscript) B flat symphony, Max Bruch's (manuscript) symphony in E, the "Parsifal" prelude, Mr. Henschel's pianoforte concert and "Te Deum," G. W. Chadwick's "Thalia" overture, Massenet's "Scenes Alsaciennes," Grieg's "Melodies for Strings," Tschalkowsky's "March Slave" and Saint-Saëns' "Bacchanale." The nine symphonies of Beethoven have been performed also, as well as the standard symphonies of other composers. Among the solo artists introduced to the Boston public at these concerts during the last season have been the dramatic soprano, Mme. Gabriella Boema; the prima donna soprano, Miss Katherine Van Arnhem; the pianists, Miss Olga Van Raedeck and Miss Adele Marquies; the violinist, Mr. Louis Schmidt, and the cellist, Mr. Wilhelm Mueller, the last two being members of the orchestra. No less than 10 of the concerts have included pianoforte selections, and a half-dozen resident pianists have acted as soloists, while a score of vocalists have taken part in the programmes. In addition to the series of 26 concerts given at Music Hall, the orchestra has given repetitions of the programmes presented here as follows: At Sanders Theatre, Harvard College, Cambridge, 6; Salem, 3; Newport, R. I., 1; Providence, 3; Worcester, 3; Portland, 2; Lowell, 2; Fitchburg, 2; New Bedford, 2; Lynn, 1—in all, 51 concerts for the season. The success attending the concerts in other cities has not been as substantial from a pecuniary standpoint as their merit deserved, but the interest shown has been such that the system of giving an additional concert each week outside the city will be adhered to next season, and a series of programmes will be presented at the Sanders Theatre and at Newport, R. I., as well. The financial results of the season's work are of interest only to Mr. Henry L. Higginson of this city, who created and has maintained the orchestra for two seasons. That the receipts from the sale of tickets at 25 and 50 cents for admissions and reserved seats cannot have equalled the expenses is patent to all familiar with such concert enterprises, and, in meeting the deficit, the founder of these concerts has given the best evidence of his earnest desire to afford an opportunity for the musical education of the public in this line of compositions, an opportunity which could not possibly be enjoyed in this city, under existing circumstances, if it were not for the public spirited liberality of Mr. Higginson.

THE CONCERT PATRONAGE.

It is gratifying to know that the aggregate attendance during the past season at the city performances of the orchestra has exceeded, by no less than 80,000, the attendance during the season of 1881-82. This is especially gratifying, as this increase has been in the patronage of the public rehearsals, which have thus far been the best test of the public appreciation of the wisdom of the founder in providing this scheme of musical instruction for Boston. The rehearsal audiences are largely made up of those who pay their 25 cents each week, and can omit attending whenever convenience or inclination shall lead them to do so without financial loss; and it would undoubtedly add to the public benefit gained if the concert audiences could be attracted as surely throughout the season by the same plan as that followed at the rehearsals. That the idea of the founder of these concerts—i. e., to give the people at large an opportunity to hear the best orchestral music played in the best manner—is a beneficent one will not be disputed; but how "the people" are to gain the opportunity of hearing the evening concerts, under any system of season tickets, is a problem which offers many difficulties in its solution. No system of sale which permits of the holding of seats by individuals for successive seasons will be found to be a benefit, in the long run, to any scheme of concerts in this country. The constant changes in society as constantly bring forward a new amusement seeking public, and the true principle to be recognized in these ticket sales is that the larger the public appealed to, the surer and the more permanent the patronage. For many reasons the season ticket sale is a necessity, but if the winter concerts of 1883-84 can be given in two courses of 10 or 12 each, the public at large would have two chances to the one of this season, and the smaller investment demanded would throw open the ticket sale to many excluded by the plan of last fall.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Twenty-Sixth and Last Programme of the Season.

Herald

The 26th and last of the second season's concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme, with Miss Katherine Van Arnhem (soprano), Miss Gertrude Edmonds (contralto), Mr. Jules Jordan (tenor) and Mr. V. Cirillo (bass) as soloists, and Mr. B. J. Lang as organist, being:

Overture—"St. Paul".....Mendelssohn
Te Deum for chorus, soli and orchestra
(manuscript).....Henschel
The Ninth (choral) symphony in D minor,
op. 125.....Beethoven

Mr. Henschel's "Te Deum" was heard for the first time on this occasion, and seemed a work worthy the high reputation of the composer. Such compositions are, however, poorly suited for the concert hall, and its effect in the church service would undoubtedly be much more pleasing than it could be without the religious surroundings which such music demands. The instrumental part is richly scored, the chorus is used with admirable taste, and there are many melodious ideas throughout the work. The presentation was not altogether satisfactory, on account of the lack of clearness in enunciation on the part of the soloists as well as of the chorus, but there was an evident enjoyment of the work on the part of many of the audience, and Mr. Henschel was made the subject of an ovation at its conclusion. In the symphony, which is most fitly chosen as the climax of the season of these concerts, Mr. Henschel's abilities as chorus master and conductor were, however, unimpeachably shown, and the audience was keenly alive to the stirring performance of the grand composition. The purely instrumental movements, notably the third, were played with a rarely beautiful effect, and fully prepared the listener for the brilliant work of the soloists, chorus and orchestra in the great finale. Miss Van Arnhem was apparently not in good voice, and the telling effect of the soprano role was missed; but Miss Edmonds and Messrs. Jordan and Cirillo were heard with pleasure in the remaining solo work. The chorus showed the result of skilful training and its members sang with telling results throughout the trying measures of the composition. The overture was admirably well played, and its beauties were more fully appreciated than when it is heard as a prelude to the oratorio, with the usual confusion incidental to such performances. The conclusion of the concert was the occasion of a second ovation to Mr. Henschel, who was applauded again and again as he ended his arduous labors of the season, a more fitting tribute and one honestly earned by this devoted and able musician. The announcement was made on the evening programme that the concerts, under Mr. Henschel's direction, will be resumed on Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

Herald

CLOSE OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The audience which filled Music Hall to overflowing on Saturday evening was as large and as brilliant as it well could be. Every seat was taken and all practical standing places were occupied on the floor and in the balconies. The occasion was the twenty-sixth and final concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was certainly a musical event of sufficient importance to warrant the unusually large and critical attendance. The programme presented was as follows: Overture (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra (MS.), Henschel; the Ninth (Choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. One of the notable things concerning the performance of this programme was the marked improvement discovered in the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's conductorship, not only over that of last year, but from the beginning of the present season. This was shown in the splendid manner in which the overture was rendered, as well as in the instrumental parts of the Te Deum. The improved work of the orchestra and conductor over last season was also very decidedly apparent in the performance of the Ninth Symphony, which was eminently satisfactory to the listeners. Mr. Henschel's

To Deum, which was in MS. and heard for the first time, proved a most interesting work, and stamped its composer again as a master in the art to which he has so successfully devoted his talents. Besides the chorus the work abounds in passages for solo voices, which parts were filled by Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass. These were well rendered, and at the close Mr. Henschel was in a manner congratulated by the audience, who made such complimentary demonstrations as to bring the composer back to bow his acknowledgments. In the Ninth Symphony the work of the chorus and soloists was of excellent character, on the whole, considering the vocal difficulties of Beethoven's music, and like that of the orchestra, showed a notable advance in precision and expression over the performance of last season. The Symphony concerts will be resumed on Saturday evening, October 13, as announced on the programme.

Slope

Over at last! The long series of orchestral concerts which have enlisted in friendly rivalry the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonic organizations is ended, and the record has been creditable both to Mr. Henschel and Mr. Zerrahn. We are inclined to think that the higher honors of the season rest with the Philharmonics, but it would be foolish to deny the general excellence of the results gained by the orchestra engaged in the Saturday night concerts. Whatever criticisms were made—and justly—with regard to the work of Mr. Henschel during the first season of the Higginson concerts, and however just may have seemed the supposition that the director was selected on grounds of relationship rather than professional fitness, every one must agree that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made very great advance during the season just closed. Banker Higginson having re-engaged Mr. Henschel for another year's work, to begin next October, the public may look for still higher attainments by the musicians who appear from week to week under his baton. And it is to be hoped that the Philharmonics also will enter the field, and with the cordial support which the public owe to so honorable and so skilfully led a body of musicians.

250

Herald

With the presentation of the 26th programme of the second season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, which is duly commented upon in another column, these entertainments come to an end until next October. The record made by the orchestra and its accomplished director, Mr. Georg Henschel, during the past six months, is a highly creditable one, and it can be assumed with confidence that no city in America has ever enjoyed so extended and generally satisfactory a series of orchestral concerts as that given the past winter by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Henschel has shown a broad, liberal and progressive spirit in his selection of programmes, he has, while selecting the best available solo talent, shown a desire to advance capable aspirants for popular favor by permitting their debut at these concerts, and he has, more than all, avoided a tendency toward elevating the character of the concerts above the taste of the concert patrons of average musical intelligence. While many new works have found a place upon the programmes, there has been no attempt to cater to the craving for novelties, which a small number of patrons might applaud, to the neglect of standard compositions. The works which have been heard for the first time at the concerts of the past season are Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony, Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, Schubert's (manuscript) B flat symphony, Max Bruch's (manuscript) symphony in E, the "Parsifal" prelude, Mr. Henschel's pianoforte concert and "Te Deum," G. W. Chadwick's "Thalia" overture, Massenet's "Scenes Alsaciennes," Grieg's "Melodies for Strings," Tschalkowsky's "March Slave" and Saint-Saën's "Bacchanale." The nine symphonies of Beethoven have been performed also, as well as the standard symphonies of other composers. Among the solo artists introduced to the Boston public at these concerts during the last season have been the dramatic soprano, Mme. Gabriella Boema; the prima donna soprano, Miss Katherine Van Arnhem; the pianists, Miss Olga Van Raddecki and Miss Adele Marquies; the violinist, Mr. Louis Schmidt, and the cellist, Mr. Wilhelm Mueller, the last two being members of the orchestra. No less than 10 of the concerts have included pianoforte selections, and a half-dozen resident pianists have acted as soloists, while a score of vocalists have taken part in the programmes. In addition to the series of 26 concerts given at Music Hall, the orchestra has given repetitions of the programmes presented here as follows: At Sanders Theatre, Harvard College, Cambridge, 6; Salem, 3; Newport, R. I., 1; Providence, 3; Worcester, 3; Portland, 2; Lowell, 2; Fitchburg, 2; New Bedford, 2; Lynn, 1—in all, 61 concerts for the season. The success attending the concerts in other cities has not been as substantial from a pecuniary standpoint as their merit deserved, but the interest shown has been such that the system of giving an additional concert each week outside the city will be adhered to next season, and a series of programmes will be presented at the Sanders Theatre and at Newport, R. I., as well. The financial results of the season's work are of interest only to Mr. Henry L. Higginson of this city, who created and has maintained the orchestra for two seasons. That the receipts from the sale of tickets at 25 and 50 cents for admissions and reserved seats cannot have equalled the expenses is patent to all familiar with such concert enterprises, and, in meeting the deficit, the founder of these concerts has given the best evidence of his earnest desire to afford an opportunity for the musical education of the public in this line of compositions, an opportunity which could not possibly be enjoyed in this city, under existing circumstances, if it were not for the public spirited liberality of Mr. Higginson.

THE CONCERT PATRONAGE.

It is gratifying to know that the aggregate attendance during the past season at the city performances of the orchestra has exceeded, by no less than 80,000, the attendance during the season of 1881-82. This is especially gratifying, as this increase has been in the patronage of the public rehearsals, which have thus far been the best test of the public appreciation of the wisdom of the founder in providing this scheme of musical instruction for Boston. The rehearsal audiences are largely made up of those who pay their 25 cents each week, and can omit attending whenever convenience or inclination shall lead them to do so without financial loss; and it would undoubtedly add to the public benefit gained if the concert audiences could be attracted as surely throughout the season by the same plan as that followed at the rehearsals. That the idea of the founder of these concerts—i. e., to give the people at large an opportunity to hear the best orchestral music played in the best manner—is a beneficent one will not be disputed; but how "the people" are to gain the opportunity of hearing the evening concerts, under any system of season tickets, is a problem which offers many difficulties in its solution. No system of sale which permits of the holding of seats by individuals for successive seasons will be found to be a benefit, in the long run, to any scheme of concerts in this country. The constant changes in society as constantly bring forward a new amusement seeking public, and the true principle to be recognized in these ticket sales is that the larger the public appealed to, the surer and the more permanent the patronage. For many reasons the season ticket sale is a necessity, but if the winter concerts of 1883-84 can be given in two courses of 10 or 12 each, the public at large would have two chances to the one of this season, and the smaller investment demanded would throw open the ticket sale to many excluded by the plan of last fall.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Twenty-Sixth and Last Programme of the Season.

Herald

The 26th and last of the second season's concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme, with Miss Katherine Van Arnhem (soprano), Miss Gertrude Edmonds (contralto), Mr. Jules Jordan (tenor) and Mr. V. Cirillo (bass) as soloists, and Mr. B. J. Lang as organist, being:

Overture—"St. Paul".....Mendelssohn
Te Deum for chorus, soli and orchestra
(manuscript).....Henschel
The Ninth (Choral) symphony in D minor,
op. 125.....Beethoven

Mr. Henschel's "Te Deum" was heard for the first time on this occasion, and seemed a work worthy the high reputation of the composer. Such compositions are, however, poorly suited for the concert hall, and its effect in the church service would undoubtedly be much more pleasing than it could be without the religious surroundings which such music demands. The instrumental part is richly scored, the chorus is used with admirable taste, and there are many melodious ideas throughout the work. The presentation was not altogether satisfactory, on account of the lack of clearness in enunciation on the part of the soloists as well as of the chorus, but there was an evident enjoyment of the work on the part of many of the audience, and Mr. Henschel was made the subject of an ovation at its conclusion. In the symphony, which is most fitly chosen as the climax of the season of these concerts, Mr. Henschel's abilities as chorus master and conductor were, however, unmitigably shown, and the audience was keenly alive to the stirring performance of the grand composition. The purely instrumental movements, notably the third, were played with a rarely beautiful effect, and fully prepared the listener for the brilliant work of the soloists, chorus and orchestra in the great finale. Miss Van Arnhem was apparently not in good voice, and the telling effect of the soprano role was misused; but Miss Edmonds and Messrs. Jordan and Cirillo were heard with pleasure in the remaining solo work. The chorus showed the result of skillful training and its members sang with telling results throughout the trying measures of the composition. The overture was admirably well played, and its beauties were more fully appreciated than when it is heard as a prelude to the oratorio, with the usual confusion incidental to such performances. The conclusion of the concert was the occasion of a second ovation to Mr. Henschel, who was applauded again and again as he ended his arduous labors of the season, a more fitting tribute and one honestly earned by this devoted and able musician. The announcement was made on the evening programme that the concerts, under Mr. Henschel's direction, will be resumed on Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

CLOSE OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The audience which filled Music Hall to overflowing on Saturday evening was as large and as brilliant as it well could be. Every seat was taken and all practical standing places were occupied on the floor and in the balconies. The occasion was the twenty-sixth and final concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was certainly a musical event of sufficient importance to warrant the unusually large and critical attendance. The programme presented was as follows: Overture (St. Paul), Mendelssohn; Te Deum for chorus, solo and orchestra (MS.), Henschel; the Ninth (Choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. One of the notable things concerning the performance of this programme was the marked improvement discovered in the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's conductorship, not only over that of last year, but from the beginning of the present season. This was shown in the splendid manner in which the overture was rendered, as well as in the instrumental parts of the Te Deum. The improved work of the orchestra and conductor over last season was also very decidedly apparent in the performance of the Ninth Symphony, which was eminently satisfactory to the listeners. Mr. Henschel's

251

Te Deum, which was in MS. and heard for the first time, proved a most interesting work, and stamped its composer again as a master in the art to which he has so successfully devoted his talents. Besides the chorus the work abounds in passages for solo voices, which parts were filled by Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass. These were well rendered, and at the close Mr. Henschel was in a manner congratulated by the audience, who made such complimentary demonstrations as to bring the composer back to bow his acknowledgments. In the Ninth Symphony the work of the chorus and soloists was of excellent character, on the whole, considering the vocal difficulties of Beethoven's music, and like that of the orchestra, showed a notable advance in precision and expression over the performance of last season. The Symphony concerts will be resumed on Saturday evening, October 13, as announced on the programme.

Stage

Over at last! The long series of orchestral concerts which have enlisted in friendly rivalry the Boston Symphony and the Philharmonic organizations is ended, and the record has been creditable both to Mr. Henschel and Mr. Zerrahn. We are inclined to think that the higher honors of the season rest with the Philharmonics, but it would be foolish to deny the general excellence of the results gained by the orchestra engaged in the Saturday night concerts. Whatever criticisms were made—and justly—with regard to the work of Mr. Henschel during the first season of the Higginson concerts, and however just may have seemed the supposition that the director was selected on grounds of relationship rather than professional fitness, every one must agree that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has made very great advance during the season just closed. Banker Higginson having re-engaged Mr. Henschel for another year's work, to begin next October, the public may look for still higher attainments by the musicians who appear from week to week under his baton. And it is to be hoped that the Philharmonics also will enter the field, and with the cordial support which the public owe to so honorable and so skillfully led a body of musicians.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The close of so extraordinary a series of classical concerts as that given by the Boston symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel's direction this season, is an event well worthy to be specially emphasized by the chronicler of the musical doings of the year. An uninterrupted season of 26 weekly concerts of so high an order as these have been is perhaps unparalleled in the history of music, and few who have attended the entire series will hesitate to acknowledge the very important contribution which it has made alike to their store of pleasant memories and their stock of valuable musical experience. In reviewing the series it is gratifying to note with what almost unexceptionable wisdom and taste the programmes have been arranged, the care and liberality shown in regard to details, and the generally high order of the performances. In making up a programme it is of course impossible to suit every taste, but it may well be doubted if the average taste of the best element among our musical community could have been more happily met on the whole than by the programmes of the season just closed. They have successfully realized the golden mean between extreme profundity on the one hand, and triviality on the other; in the solvent juice of a well-considered variety the more solid features of the feast have been prepared for healthful digestion, and the dainty tidbits and sweetmeats have been all the more keenly relished from the judicious moderation with which they have been supplied. The conservative character of the programmes has been, perhaps, their most commendable feature. The bulk of the music presented has been drawn from the storehouse of what may be called standard composition, both ancient and modern, which, we venture to say, will never cease to be approved by persons of the best judgment, as the only proper basis for such programmes. Beethoven's nine symphonies, and other works written for all time, have been presented, together with works on which the slow judgment of the ages is still in process of formation, and still others representing the latest development of musical genius. In this last-named class have been included some of the most interesting novelties of the day, whose introduction into these programmes was warranted by their representative character as novelties, if for no other reason, thus imparting to the scheme that element of progressiveness without which any such series would fail to fulfil its complete mission. It is a pleasure, also, to note in this connection the very marked gain in the efficiency of the orchestra since the opening of the original series last year, a gain corresponding in a large measure to Mr. Henschel's steady improvement as a conductor. It would be an exaggeration to speak of his season's record in this field as brilliant, yet it has developed so many features of high excellence, and its failures have so steadily decreased in frequency that one may easily hope for brilliant things in the future from a conductor so highly endowed in his musical nature and so accomplished in his art.

The programme prepared for the closing concert on Saturday evening had a uniformly religious character that gave to the occasion the air of a solemn celebration. Opening with the overture to Mendelssohn's oratorio "St. Paul," and a new Te Deum by Mr. Henschel, both professedly sacred, the programme culminated in the Choral symphony of Beethoven, as truly religious in spirit as any work ever written. The soloists of the evening were as follows: Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Mr. V. Cirello, bass; Mr. E. J. Lang was the organist. The overture was admirably played, though the effect was marred not a little by the untunefulness of the great organ, which also proved an element of discord where it was introduced in the other two works. Mr. Henschel's Te Deum, the score of which is still in manuscript, is written for chorus, soli and orchestra. It proved itself to be the most immediately interesting and beautiful of Mr. Henschel's compositions thus far produced here. Its great strength lies in the simplicity and spontaneity of its musical ideas, and the corresponding free naturalness of their development up to effects of great breadth and vigor. It seems to have been conceived in a true religious spirit, and though elaborated in places to a high point of sumptuousness, particularly in its orchestral part, it is always pervaded by that serene churchly atmosphere which properly belongs to a work of its class, and one might imagine that it would prove a most impressive accompaniment to some high ecclesiastical service, with all the appropriate surroundings of pomp and ceremony. The symphony, when judged by the standard of practicability, was admirably performed. The purely instrumental movements were given with a beautiful effectiveness that reflected high credit on both the conductor and orchestra. Considering the almost insurmountable difficulties of the vocal part of the symphony, the chorus and soloists acquitted themselves with credit. The chorus, especially, was remarkably good. Its work was performed with a degree of clearness, accuracy and precision much beyond that of last year, and indeed one would be exacting, indeed, to expect a much more satisfactory performance of this almost unsingable movement. The soloists, too, did better work on the whole than those of last year, the principal shortcoming being in the case of Miss Van Arnhem, whose voice seemed to have lost a material portion of its usual power, a quality so imperatively demanded for her task on this occasion. But on the whole, the vocal part of the symphony was performed with such comparative smoothness and freedom from confusion as were quite refreshing when compared with the performance of last year. Mr. Henschel, at the close of his Te Deum, was complimented with a special round of applause, in the nature of a "recall," and again, with increased heartiness, the greeting was repeated as he was retiring from his dais at the close of the concert. In both cases he modestly bowed his acknowledgments of the compliment. The programme bill announced that the concerts would be resumed on Saturday, October 13.

from Corner New York

The programme of the 26th, and last symphony concert on March 31st, was:

Overture (St. Paul) Mendelssohn
Te Deum for Chorus, Soli and Orchestra (MS.) Henschel
The Ninth Symphony Beethoven

The soloists were: Miss Katherine Van Arnhem, soprano; Miss Gertrude Edmonds, contralto; Mr. Jules Jordan, tenor; Mr. V. Cirello, bass.

The overture was spoiled for me at least, because the organ, which was played by Mr. Lang, was considerably below the pitch of the orchestra, the effect to a musical ear being naturally bad. The "Te Deum" of Mr. Henschel is a work with many fine points in it, and I think, as a whole, the best composition of his that I have heard, if I except his "Hymne au Createur," for soprano and orchestra, which I always like very much. The "Te Deum" opens with a broad passage for orchestra in C major, which is immediately taken up by the chorus in full. The effect is good, although a modulation to F sharp major after the first few bars is unhappy. The musical idea of the passage is simple, and the sudden modulation into this far-distant key, although C major is reached again immediately, somewhat spoils its unity. I had the same feeling when this passage was repeated later in the work. A solo for soprano, and afterward tenor, in A flat major I thought was very fine, as also a solo for tenor in D major later on. The return to the first motive is happy, and a soft unison C for chorus—a sort of recitative passage, with a good counterpoint in the orchestra—makes an excellent effect. The latter half of the work, especially the close, is, I think, musically speaking, the strongest. All in all, it is a meritorious work, being melodious and well written, and its reception by the audience was good. About the Ninth Symphony I would much prefer to be silent. The rendition of the first movement was simply an outrage on the name of Beethoven. It was raced through at such a speed that, for instance, the beautiful and plaintive second theme sounded quite commonplace and trivial, and the violins vainly tried to bring out clearly their different passages in thirty-seconds. How a musician of Mr. Henschel's ability can have so vulgar a conception of such sublime music is a mystery to me. The other movements were given better although the chorus was altogether incapable of its task, giving a mere skeleton outline of the music assigned to it. The exquisite recitative passage for double-basses and celli at the opening of the choral part was quite meaningless, Mr. Henschel beating time to it like a metronome, and with corresponding effect on the musicians. The performance, however, was an improvement, at least technically, on the very bad one of last year. The concerts, according to the programme, are to be resumed on Saturday, October 13.

George Henschel and the Boston Symphony Concerts. 424 1893

To Editor of MUSIC AND DRAMA:

A recent number of your weekly paper contained the following concerning Mr. Henschel: "The Boston critics have entirely changed base in their criticisms of Mr. George Henschel. What they seriously condemned in Mr. Henschel last year they praise to the skies this season. Either Mr. Henschel has converted the critics or the critics have converted Mr. Henschel. Which is it?" Without attempting to directly answer the above inquiry, let me present your readers with the facts in the case and leave them to draw their own conclusions.

Last year, through the munificence of Mr. Higginson, it became Mr. Henschel's good fortune to be raised to the position of conductor (and also absolute musical manager) of the Boston Symphony Concerts, and he entered upon the discharge of his duties with an enthusiasm that wrought a most decided change in the manner and style of the playing that Bostonians had become accustomed to observe in the performances of their local orchestra under other leaders. At this time the Philharmonic, under Listemann, and the Harvard Musical Association concerts, under Zenahn, were either dead or dying for want of sufficient support, in the face of which fact an extraordinary interest was suddenly manifested in this new series, which could not be accounted for because of the apparent cheapness of prices, for the buyers of tickets were, by a large majority, from the wealthy classes. Hence, when the audiences, which filled the music hall to overflowing at Friday afternoon rehearsals and on Saturday evening concerts, lavished their applause upon Mr. Henschel so unanimously he could not help feeling the exhilarating effects of such popularity, and evidently cared little for the opinion of the critics, the majority of whom took strong grounds in opposition to the unqualified endorsement of the results he produced as a conductor, and who on many occasions found it necessary to so severely criticise his work as to create a doubt regarding his ability to successfully fill the position he occupied. I did not entirely agree with the opinions of this majority, and took occasion to defend Mr. Henschel by presenting his strong points, and attempted to place him in a more favorable light than he had been shown by my contemporaries.

Regarding his capabilities I argued that he was a composer of some note, had a thorough knowledge of the orchestra and its resources, showed a positive conception of the composition in hand, presented an intelligible method of using his baton, and possessed presence sufficient to impress his players with a sense of his superiority and to command their respect. To effect these good qualities was a lack of refinement and repose in his renderings. Good attack, general precision and power were there to a great degree, but sufficient contrast, the life of art itself, was wanting. The performer who does not at the proper time present the element of repose in his rendering cannot truthfully be considered an artist. The critical listener demands this accomplishment of every conductor who takes the baton to direct a body of musicians or singers. More especially is the matter of contrast a necessity in the rendering of large works. Their very construction demands it in a most liberal degree. Henschel's marked deficiency was dwelt upon, and the hope expressed that he would soon gain a better control over the orchestra and remedy it.

The criticism of his tempi did not in my estimation militate against his judgment. There were precedents to sustain him, and many good musicians agreed with his ideas. His notions in conduction, which were criticised as "grotesque," were by many regarded as an eminent quality, for they not only marked the time, but also indicated the accent in its various degrees of importance, and were expressive in the signification of the phrasing—in fact, pointed in a positive manner to the players the interpretation he wished to convey to them. Whatever may have been the conclusions concerning his tempi, or method of beating the time, it was of little moment when compared with his failure to impart a sense of refinement and a feeling of repose in its renderings. This was the index to his incapacity. I was generous enough to attribute this failing, in a great degree, to the want of a little more time in refining the efforts of the large body of players. Time did not improve matters, however, for, either his ignorance of the fact or his inability to comprehend its importance when pointed out to him, prevented him from applying a remedy that would have obviated several difficulties consequent upon this one, and would have enabled him to rise above much of the adverse criticism which had been so generally heaped upon him. Henschel never progressed beyond a point gained early in the first season, and it cannot with truth be denied that his rendering of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the final concert was devoid of delicacy or repose, and was a specimen of the most uncouth rasping and blowing that sixty-five good players could possibly be forced to impart to that composition.

Let us consider his work this, his second season, and see what results a dozen or more concerts have brought forth.

To begin with, he has modified in a degree the animation he displayed with his baton last season, and there is a consequent falling off in attack and general precision on the part of the players. Carelessness and inattention are very evident in the ranks, and there is a deal of slovenly playing done, besides not infrequent mistakes, not always flagrant ones, perhaps, like the coming in before the time, or in silent places, as occurred three or four times in the rough, slipshod performance of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven at one of the most recent concerts. His tempi remains this season the same in the repeated works of last year's concerts, and is as exaggerated sometimes, as regards variation from the metronome mark, as can well be permitted and have it remain within the bounds of a reasonable conception. An additional feature for complaint this season is the bad intonation of the wood-wind when employed conjointly. At times it is something dreadful. The difficulty seems to lay between the oboe and flutes. The clarionets are excellent, and the bassoons not objectionable. The brass-wind is excellent as regards execution and intonation, and is often administered with a commendable degree of moderation. At times, however, the conductor seems to drive them to a most violent employment of their powers, and if they were not all skilful players, the result would be unbearable. As it is the effort results only in a roughness of tone that is not characteristic of the quality belonging to the instrument when normally used. The horns sometimes sound absolutely hoarse. The wood-wind is never delicate in the concerted passages for itself, which occur frequently, but is often raw, as well as untuneful. Exception must be made in the case of individual efforts, as, for instance, the first clarinet, first trumpet and first horn, who deliver in the most artistic manner the bits of solo or obligato that occur in their part. We cannot see that the conductor is disturbed in the least by all these shortcomings for which he is indirectly responsible, and their continuance speaks strongly against his sensitiveness and want of discipline. We would not dwell upon these features, as objectionable as they are, if they did not indicate that Mr. Henschel has not only made no progress, but has failed to maintain the standard he reached early last season, and when one considers the advantages of last season's experience, added to the improved opportunity of more frequent rehearsals and performances this season, it is not at all creditable to his ambition. But to bring the matter down to what he is directly responsible for, let us consider his dominant failing of last year, and ask if he has improved in the least as regards that barrier to the establishment of his reputation as a competent conductor. If the truth is spoken one will be forced to admit that he has not only failed to improve upon his last season's efforts, but he has not even gained on any occasion this year the approximate degree of refinement that was observable upon one or two occasions last year. Take for instance the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven and the unfinished Symphony of Schubert's works that are susceptible of the most delicate treatment, and require it if justice is to be done the composer. Last year the renderings of these compositions were the best and only respectable specimens of work accomplished during the whole season. This year the listener experienced a monotone of roughness, and a total absence of repose that was exasperating if he was in the least critical in his taste and at all sensitive to the author's intention.

Comparisons are invidious, but we must strengthen the reliability of our statement as regards the latter work in remarking that the Philharmonic orchestra, under the direction of Carl Zenahn, within a week's time after Henschel's performance, gave with the same players (only a few less in the number of strings) a performance, of Schubert's above-mentioned lovely symphony that would gratify the most refined taste. The composition was the same, the orchestra materially the same, but the results were quite different, and this marked difference was not at all flattering to Mr. Henschel's conception or ability. If Mr. Henschel showed any annoyance at such roughness of execution as is the rule with his orchestra, and attempted to remedy it, some credit might reflect upon his intention, but there is not the least evidence that he is disturbed or even cognizant of its existence. Such an assault as he made with his forces upon the great C major symphony of Schubert this season, cannot possibly have ever occurred before in the annals of its history. Eager in his defence last year by claiming for him superiority in many directions as a conductor, when the pen of every critic nearly was turned against him, the writer waited and hoped for a sign of improvement in his marked deficiency. But all in vain. It soon became evident that it was not the fault of the orchestra, and one was obliged to contemplate the fact that Mr. Henschel himself was wholly responsible for the lack of refinement and repose which existed, and that undeniably his musical instincts were drawn in a rough mould. Coarseness is the quality that characterizes his renderings. It would seem as if at the beginning of his connection with the orchestra he let loose its power and encouraged the greatest development of that element. Recognizing this fact, it was the hope of those interested in his success that he would retain the attack and equal precision, the result of this freedom, but at the same time control the efforts of the players, to the end that he would gain the utmost limits of contrasts, from the most reposeful pianissimo to the most vigorous fortissimo, within the bounds of normal tone-production. Results, however, have proved to the contrary, and as we have before remarked, it must be acknowledged that he has not only failed to progress, but has lost ground.

One not favorably inclined towards him might argue that he had used the opportunity. Mr. Higginson's generosity has provided for him as a hobby upon which to ride into public favor, and having gained a certain ascendancy he has lost sight of the fact that his audience is composed of listeners as cultivated as himself, and not of North American savages, as many arrogant foreigners are inclined to imagine who come to prey upon this country. Has he forgotten the necessity for his cultivating himself, so that the attempts of the beginner will in time ripen into the refined, artistic efforts of the experienced conductor? The more one analyses Henschel's work the more he is compelled to admit that the glowing anticipations at his advent have not been realized, and all prospects for that realization have seemed to have vanished. What pleasure it would be to record a successful grasp of such a situation. How regretful it is to chronicle a failure under such extraordinarily favorable circumstances.

If Mr. Higginson, as it is generally understood, has really endowed these concerts and is alert to place them under the guidance and control of one man, for the education of the musical public and the encouragement of art upon its highest plane, he must find some more innately sensitive, more intrinsically refined, and at the same time broad and comprehensive leader than Henschel has proved himself to be.

Of available candidates for such a position, the name of Max Bruch presents itself as one of undisputed capability. Max Bruch, who arrives in this country the coming April, is a musician whose works are spontaneous and scholarly in composition, masterly in orchestral treatment; wedding poetry and painting in the musical art and combining refinement with the broad and vigorous touch of the master hand. He is in fact a peer among the shining lights of modern art. That these eminent qualities mark him as a great conductor does not necessarily follow, but he already enjoys an enviable reputation in that capacity, and will have ample chance to prove his ability in concerts to be given by him during next spring's sojourn in this country.

If the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts is still open for the man best capable of filling the position, Mr. Higginson would not be amiss in considering the merits of Max Bruch. What an advantage to Boston it would be to possess such a renowned musician! What inestimable value his influence would attach to the already high standard of that city! The conductor who would command the approbation of the audience at the Boston Symphony Concerts must, indeed, be one of rare qualities. The new broom which swept so clean when the concerts were inaugurated, has lost its effect upon the audience, which is not composed of ordinary people, in a musical sense, as Mr.

Higginson supposed it would be, but of people as capable of judging of the worth of a composition and the character of its performance as can be found, perhaps, anywhere in the world. When one considers Mr. Henschel's capacity, it appears that he does not stand in the light of an educator, and is not doing missionary work, as Theodore Thomas did ten years ago in the large cities of the country. Henschel is on trial before the public, however he may regard it himself, and his listeners do not require the repetition of the nine symphonies of Beethoven as a matter of education. Their familiarity with superior renderings of these classic works offered them the opportunity of judging of his efforts by comparison and furnish a crucible to test his inferiority.

As a programme-maker Mr. Henschel has not shown much judgment towards meeting the taste and requirements of his audience. He evidently thinks that Bostonians are in their childhood as regards symphonic music, and so he gives them copious doses of the ultra classic school in order to start them on the right basis, else why should he repeat this season in numerical order the nine symphonies of Beethoven, while Schumann, Mendelssohn, Raff, Gade, Rubinstein, Goldmack, Paine, etc., etc., offer equally meritorious and more acceptable opportunities for the gratification of the audience. The vocal selections also have been of the driest material very often; Gluck, Handel and Mozart, with only an occasional piece of dramatic importance.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON, Mass.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, SEASON 1883-'84.

It is proposed to connect with this Orchestra a chorus of mixed voices, to give in each season three Public Concerts of its own, apart from the regular series.

The Rehearsals will begin October 12th, and continue during the season on Fridays weekly, from 7.30 to 9 P. M. The Concerts will take place between Christmas and Easter, in connection with an orchestra consisting of fifty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To each of the three concerts the members of the chorus will receive two reserved seats.

Mr. Henschel will conduct the rehearsals of the chorus as well as the concerts.

The annual fee of membership will be three dollars; the entrance fee, two dollars.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of entering the chorus will kindly apply to Mr. Henschel, 6 Otis place, between the hours of 3 and 5 P. M. till April 28.

BOSTON.

APRIL 2.—The Boston Symphony Concerts have closed in a blaze of glory. The last concert, on Saturday night, partook of the nature of a solemn celebration. There was nothing light upon the programme. Mendelssohn's St. Paul overture, "A Te Deum," by Henschel, and Beethoven's 9th symphony constituted the list. The overture went grandly with the full orchestra and organ part, the latter giving especial dignity to the climax. The "Te Deum" is one of Henschel's greatest works. It has nobility of thought, and is singable music, a fact which was emphasized by its being brought in contrast with the unsingable Beethoven work. It has a decided leaning towards strong contrasts, leaping frequently from ff to pp; in fact, the closing cadence consists of just such an effect.

It has some touches of Mendelssohn's style here and there. In fact there is considerable of Mendelssohn in Mr. Henschel. May he become as good a conductor as Mendelssohn was.

The ninth symphony showed the improvement of both leader and orchestra this season. The instrumental portion was well given almost throughout. The only prominent fault was that the second theme of the wood-wind, in the Scherzo, was drowned out by the strings. One pleasant change was the placing of the contra-basses at the back of the orchestra, where they ought to be. It is safe to say, had they been in their usual positions, in front, their important recitative and the unison theme of the finale would have been spoiled. As it was, they had just the requisite mellow quality, and had their recitative been but a little slower, it would have been perfect. I cannot say a great deal for the vocal part, save that it was better than last season. It is, and ever will remain, unsingable, the skips of the bass and the screams of the sopranos in "High Among the Star Pavilions" continually reminding one of the fact that the singers were straining to their utmost. Of the soloists Mr. Jules Jordan was the best. Mr. Cirillo used his voice also like a true artist, but portions of the work seemed out of his register.

Misses von Arnheim and Edmonds seemed timid and nervous, and did not allow their voices to ring out triumphantly, as Beethoven intended. But, on the whole, I can say that the performance was a worthy one, and the reseating of some of the orchestra, and the use of a score by the conductor, instead of trusting to his memory, were points of much improvement.

The only other concert which I attended last week was that of the Euterpe Club, which occurred Wednesday evening. The Beethoven Club furnished the music, which consisted of Beethoven's quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1, and Schubert's quintet in C major, op. 163. The works were both well played, especially the Schubert quintet, which is a work altogether beautiful, and has all his sweetness of melody combined with the strong harmonic power which he displayed in his later works, and this quintet was one of the latest ones of the great composer. The coming week and month promise a variety of concerts, and, in fact, this year the season bids fair not to come to an end at all. L. C. E.

A BOSTON LETTER CAUGHT ON THE FLY.

Parker House, May 3, 1883.

Well, old boy, how goes it? No, siree, I am not yet congealed by this Boston atmosphere; in fact, the laziness that comes with the spring is the sole and only cause of my silence. It would, perhaps, sound modest for me to lay it to a profound contempt for my letter-writing ability, as contrasted with the general tone of this most tremendous town; but I can't do it, Vol,—I can't do it. As some one said of a well-known correspondent (I am not mentioning names in this paragraph), the best part of Boston is her reputation, and that's the truth. Well, but they are a funny people; I never saw the like. They know what is good in any art by the reputation it has made elsewhere, and thus properly criticise it to death; but, I notice that if a light performance does come here that is amusing, they tear it to shoe-strings in words, and give it what a clever man cares a deal more about—their dollars. Now Lotta does not get more money, more applause, more kindly greeting in any city in the world than she does in this same high-toned town that loves art,—is devoured by a penchant for it—oh, but it deceives itself into thinking that it is downright royalty. Lotta! poor deluded Boston. Now I like Lotta; but I ain't a Bostonian, and I don't attempt to do anything but enjoy her. I never said it was a shame that she could succeed where angels feared to tread,—you know I never was much on quoting,—neither do I go to see her every evening in the week for four weeks. In Boston, however, they reverse the rule. By the way, I saw the little one—that is in citizen's clothes—Saturday. I was coming up town just as the theatre was out, and in front of the Bijou I saw a group of men about a carriage, among whom was Nape Lothian, posed gracefully, with one arm on the door. Naturally I blinked my off eye, and there was Lotta herself, bigger than life, and like the rest of us, looking older than she used to be. She played here yesterday at Lothian's benefit—she and Nape are mutual admirers, you know—and Nape sacrificed that bristly little mustache of his to don the blouse and knickerbockers of William A. If he hadn't been so successful doing something else, one might wonder that he hadn't embraced comedy himself. Speaking of the veneering of art discrimination that Boston bon ton has put on, I have been much amused at the big organ business. You've heard of the big organ, of course? Well, it's a big thing, and no joking, and in any other country it would be preserved for association sake, even if it had lost its voice more hopelessly than Lotta has. But Boston is original, you know; every mother's son here is for demolishing everything that he did not originate himself. So a portion of Boston's people have become most horribly musical, under the couriership of an enormously wealthy banker, whose symphony concert work has, however, served to wake up interest, if nothing else. Of course, you know all the details from the papers; but there is a little side issue that may, perhaps, be interesting, old fellow, as, unless it miscarries, it will lead to a somewhat livelier season next year. The big organ is sold, and a ubiquitous doctor of music, who has for years run a conservatoire of music here—aiming at foreign results by a road through Yankee by-ways and ditches—desires to put it into an enormous conservatory hall, to be erected on a burying-ground,—you see how destructive they are here; even the graves of their forefathers don't count. The thing is nearly completed, when behold up rises the ghost of old times, in the descendants of those who subscribed the money for this organ, and nothing daunted, sepulchraly—in a legal injunction—cries, "Hands off that organ! Sell this thing if you dare, and we, the heirs of those who bought it, shall claim the money; or, better attempt to remove it, and, as it belongs to us, we shall take it right straight home with us." This isn't a new dodge either; they absolutely tried to sell Boston Common, a few years since, and met with the same voice from the past—in the minority, but none the less unanswerable. Is there anything more interesting than tracing a result back to its source? These same symphony concerts are a prolific subject for that sort of thing, and the result reversed is something like this: A certain lady of great refinement—a beauty of real musical feeling, a niece of a gentleman in high standing, and a social favorite—went abroad to finish her education, in the course of which she fell under the instruction of a German artist in London, who was musical instructor to Princess Louise and I don't know whom else of royal blood. German artist falls in love with American beauty; marries her; is at once transported right into the heart of Boston's culture. Result—millionaire banker interested; enthusiastically champions the cause of music; determines to ride a pet hobby; purchases the big hall of which Boston has been so proud; engages German artist to conduct an orchestra, at the phenomenal salary of $10,000. Consider on it, Volney, and realize that that sum is more to his conductorship than it even looks to you, because in der faderland they don't pay such salaries. They live in a world of art over there, such as is stifled here in no time; it positively cannot live in this land of result; where no one can enjoy doing a thing, for the haste he feels to get at the outcome (not always money). Apropos of this, some one was citing the effect that America had had on Carl Baermann. He said, that in Germany Baermann was the calmest of men. "Why," he remarked, "just to see him seat himself at the piano was sedative to my American nerves, and his playing was so restful. Now he has grown so restive that my heart aches for Germany, for his sake, whenever I hear him play." He is not the only artist whose temperament cannot seem to keep in this high-nerved temperature. Of that salary—I notice the New York Choral Society offered Max Bruch $3,000. I suppose that is a very fair offer; but the Henschel boom has made it look insultingly small by comparison. I must express, however, the greatest respect for a gentleman who can ride a hobby so regally as this Boston Banker, Higginson, has done; though it is not generally known here that he has provided for the musical interests of Boston, against the time when he cannot look after them in person, by establishing a fund of $1,000,000, at least, so a friend of his says. One thing surprises me—Mr. Higginson is thoroughly a Bostonian, and an orchestra could have been formed in this city as good as any conductor could wish to lead, from local talent. To be sure, local performers of reputation would naturally desire a little better compensation than the street-band musician; but that could not have stuck in Mr. Higginson's crop, if he considered his conductor worth $10,000. However, conductor and orchestra do not seem to love one another, and now it is pretty generally understood that one object of Henschel's visit to Europe—he sails to-day—is to hire German musicians for next season. I understand that the rival orchestra, the one whose interests have really been most injured by this new scheme—the Philharmonic—will next season try to make a boom by using the Conservatory hall, into which they hope to have the big organ fixed by that time, and engaging the musicians of Boston repute whom the Henschel orchestra scheme has either discarded or by its conditions forced to resign. I don't know how the thing will work. If Boston were a town of the local pride it was once reputed to have been, the Philharmonic boom would be assured beforehand; but, as it is in reality a clique place, and Henschel is admired personally by the most powerful circle in town, the one about which the other circles revolve, delighted apparently to be allowed to sit in the same room with them even; and as the Boston love of symphony is all bosh, it looks as if the professional prophets would have a hard time rallying the public from its present position. However, we shall see what we shall see. A man who starts in a position as independent as Henschel's and carries things with a high hand all round, sometimes goes to pieces all at once, without any warning, like the one-horse shay:

258

"—nothing first,

Just as bubbles do, when they burst."

and, "your finger on your lips," I have it from good authority that the enthusiasm between the two H.s has cooled several degrees. Can this be the beginning of the end?

You observe, dear boy, how Bostonian I am; I can already talk like a book to them of what they are interested in,—it's the greatest town for talking you ever visited. If you are a talker—they call it here a conversationalist—you can go anywhere. When you get ready to come to town, go over to the poor farm and get Aunt Nance—she of the silver tongue; she will be an open sesame for you; that is of course, incognito, Princess of Higglely-piggledy, you know.

Well, yes, I like here fairly well. Don't meet the bon ton at this hotel by any means, and do meet almost all the gentlemen about town whose occupations don't go down in the directory. You speak of it as a famous hotel, you remind me of old Kaspar and Peterkin:

"'Why that I cannot tell,' said he,
'But 'twas a famous victory.'"

I broached the subject to Wrex the other day, and he replied, with a shrug, that many years had passed since Harvey Parker, all honor to him, graduated from his restaurant—he started so, you must know—into a hotel keeper, and while he was growing old, younger men have profited by his experience and example—yet, when the time came for Parker to shift the active work from his still able shoulders, he was not fortunate in his choice of young blood. The judgment of Harvey Parker, himself, in things hotelical, is sound as ever, yet the Parker House is not what it used to be. I don't know whether lack of style and sang froid is typical of Boston or not, but it seems to be the case. Par exemple, I smile whenever I think of the confusion that arose at a certain G. A. R. post supper here a few evenings since. It was not the toniest crowd that dines here, to be sure, but that's no odds; in truth a large part of the tony people go to Young's—further down street—in our days. It happened when dinner was served for this post, they were one more at the board than was expected, and in sitting down one gentleman had the terrible misfortune to sit in front, instead of at the left of his glasses. A New Yorker would never have made such a mortifying mistake; he would know where his glasses belonged, every time. But that's not to the point, which is that being down in that position, it made room for the extra guest, and behold the result. With the perversity of fate he came between the waiter's sections. "Here are my five men," said one obstreperous waiter. "Here are mine," said the next,—consequence, man in front of glasses is knocked out entirely, and has the pleasure of hearing waiters descend to their everyday roles and swear roundly at one another. I am not exaggerating when I say that it was only by the greatest conniving that the poor fellow got any of that spread. There was a most ridiculous changing of service, calling for second helps to meet the emergency that you ever saw. I don't know but all hotel service would have been equally demoralized by such a giant as one Boston man, but I don't believe despised Chicago would annex first-class to any house in her town that was so easily upset. On this occasion the waiters were hired by the job apparently, and one was so anxious to remove the cloth from his end of the table at an early hour that he began it unaided, right over the heads of the guests, disregarding of the barber's masterpieces and much to their disadvantage, not to mention one of the officers who got his hair greased with a material never meant for that purpose. However, it was a famous hotel, all the same.

I have seen Harvard en masse—Theo, you know; but as it is three o'clock, and I am anxious to lay me to rest in the arms of Mrs. Morpheus, I send you the daily papers, very prosy, to be sure; but there's room for your imagination. I must, however, remark a word upon a scene that reminded me of the dear old days, my boy, when you and I were young, and would have been willing to live always; those halcyon days when we could forget in the embrace of the aforesaid Mme. Morpheus the day that was gone and begin over again in the morning. The bloom of the peach rubs off, however; it always does, worse luck. All this is apropos of the Harvard Pi Eta theatricals a week since, where I viewed with envy the acme of the self-possessed Harvard dress coats and standing collar; the superior high mightiness of the court it paid mademoiselle—and yet the youthfulness of it. There was one favorite,—as attractive a bit of flesh and blood, without being pretty, as I have seen for many a day; piquant, petite (a good thing in a small parcel, you know); a student on the right; a student on the left; a student behind; five students in front, and a brigade of students, charging up the aisle all the evening; dainty face in poke bonnet distributing smiles as impartially as the rain that falls alike on the just and the unjust; and a dash about the whole thing that only a student can lend. Ah, poor fools! I've been there myself, and I felt like whi-pering, "I tell you, fellows, make the most of it, for unless you turn out perfect donkeys, you will never feel so satisfied again!" The boys gave an admirable performance of Papa Perichon and a farce, but the fun of the thing was of course in seeing Fox, a Kentucky fellow, and Marshall Cushing, a scion of one of Hingham's F. S.s, parade in female toggery. Fox as Mamma was capital, and you would have enjoyed him when his bonnet fell off and he said aside in Belshaw's (Papa) ear in a tone very unfeminine, "—this —bonnet!" I shall never see fair Rosalie again without recalling Marshall Cushing rouged to death, simpering like a sixteen-year-old, and toddling round upon eggs. He looked well until he spoke, and then if his voice hadn't given him away his mouth would. Odd, isn't it? But even being descended from the settlers of Hingham doesn't make an upper lip born for a mustache look femininely kissable when shaved. Oh yes, look at that with your critical eye. I see you do it; "cela depend," you say. Well I am the judge in this matter; the little girl across the aisle would have emphasized differently without doubt, for Cushing is something of a ladies' man.

Enough of this until next time. Wish you had been here to see Theo. You would have enjoyed it more than I did. It's the Boston style to see everything, but always say you didn't enjoy it much.

Fraternally yours,

MARC BERTONI.

To Volney Thrale, Esq.

BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

Handwritten: Hald Handwritten: May 24, 83

Mr. Haldeman Discusses the
Conservatory Project,

And Blows a Blast at Henschel and Higginson.

ALDERMAN HALDEMAN ON MUSIC.

When the order referring to a joint special committee, composed of Councilmen Fisk, Whitmore and Doherty, with such as this board may join, the order transferring certain land in the South burying ground to the New England Conservatory of Music, with instructions to ascertain the value, came up in the concurrent business, Alderman Haldeman made the following address:

Mr. Chairman: I hope the board will not concur with the common council in appointing a special committee. Such a course would be unjust to that on public lands, who have had the matter in charge for three months, have made three reports, given two public hearings and are certainly quite as competent to make a suitable recommendation to the city council as any other committee. I also protest against the attempt to strand the petition by associating it with an impracticable and untimely proposition to extend Rutland street, and to have a money valuation placed upon land that has no real value to the city, when the petitioners ask for it as a gift for public use. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that there must be some cause for the peculiar opposition to this simple interesting, old fellow, as, unless it miscarries, it will lead to a somewhat livelier season next year. The big organ is sold, and a ubiquitous doctor of music, who has for years run a conservatoire of music here—aiming at foreign results by a road through Yankee by-ways and ditches—desires to put it into an enormous conservatory hall, to be erected on a burying-ground,—you see how destructive they are here; even the graves of their forefathers don't count. The thing is nearly completed, when behold up rises the ghost of old times, in the descendants of those who subscribed the money for this organ, and nothing daunted, sepulchral—in a legal injunction—cries, "Hands off that organ! Sell this thing if you dare, and we, the heirs of those who bought it, shall claim the money; or, better attempt to remove it, and, as it belongs to us, we shall take it right straight home with us." This isn't a new dodge either; they absolutely tried to sell Boston Common, a few years since, and met with the same voice from the past—in the minority, but none the less unanswerable. Is there anything more interesting than tracing a result back to its source? These same symphony concerts are a prolific subject for that sort of thing, and the result reversed is something like this: A certain lady of great refinement—a beauty of real musical feeling, a niece of a gentleman in high standing, and a social favorite—went abroad to finish her education, in the course of which she fell under the instruction of a German artist in London, who was musical instructor to Princess Louise and I don't know whom else of royal blood. German artist falls in love with American beauty; marries her; is at once transported right into the heart of Boston's culture. Result—millionaire banker interested; enthusiastically champions the cause of music; determines to ride a pet hobby; purchases the big hall of which Boston has been so proud; engages German artist to conduct an orchestra, at the phenomenal salary of $10,000. Consider on it, Volney, and realize that that sum is more to his conductorship than it even looks to you, because in der faderland they don't pay such salaries. They live in a world of art over there, such as is stifled here in no time; it positively cannot live in this land of result; where no one can enjoy doing a thing, for the haste he feels to get at the outcome (not always money). Apropos of this, some one was citing the effect that America had had on Carl Baermann. He said, that in Germany Baermann was the calmest of men. "Why," he remarked, "just to see him seat himself at the piano was sedative to my American nerves, and his playing was so restful. Now he has grown so restive that my heart aches for Germany, for his sake, whenever I hear him play." He is not the only artist whose temperament cannot seem to keep in this high-nerved temperature. Of that salary—I notice the New York Choral Society offered Max Bruch $3,000. I suppose that is a very fair offer; but the Henschel boom has made it look insultingly small by comparison. I must express, however, the greatest respect for a gentleman who can ride a hobby so regally as this Boston Banker, Higginson, has done; though it is not generally known here that he has provided for the musical interests of Boston, against the time when he cannot look after them in person, by establishing a fund of $1,000,000, at least, so a friend of his says. One thing surprises me—Mr. Higginson is thoroughly a Bostonian, and an orchestra could have been formed in this city as good as any conductor could wish to lead, from local talent. To be sure, local performers of reputation would naturally desire a little better compensation than the street-band musician; but that could not have stuck in Mr. Higginson's crop, if he considered his conductor worth $10,000. However, conductor and orchestra do not seem to love one another, and now it is pretty generally understood that one object of Henschel's visit to Europe—he sails to-day—is to hire German musicians for next season. I understand that the rival orchestra, the one whose interests have really been most injured by this new scheme—the Philharmonic—will next season try to make a boom by using the Conservatory hall, into which they hope to have the big organ fixed by that time, and engaging the musicians of Boston repute whom the Henschel orchestra scheme has either discarded or by its conditions forced to resign. I don't know how the thing will work. If Boston were a town of the local pride it was once reputed to have been, the Philharmonic boom would be assured beforehand; but, as it is in reality a cliquey place, and Henschel is admired personally by the most powerful circle in town, the one about which the other circles revolve, delighted apparently to be allowed to sit in the same room with them even; and as the Boston love of symphony is all bosh, it looks as if the professional prophets would have a hard time rallying the public from its present position. However, we shall see what we shall see. A man who starts in a position as independent as Henschel's and carries things with a high hand all round, sometimes goes to pieces all at once, without any warning, like the one-horse shay:

"—nothing first,

Just as bubbles do, when they burst,"

and, "your finger on your lips," I have it from good authority that the enthusiasm between the two H.s has cooled several degrees. Can this be the beginning of the end?

You observe, dear boy, how Bostonian I am; I can already talk like a book to them of what they are interested in,—it's the greatest town for talking you ever visited. If you are a talker—they call it here a conversationalist—you can go anywhere. When you get ready to come to town, go over to the poor farm and get Aunt Nance—she of the silver tongue; she will be an open sesame for you; that is of course, incognito, Princess of Higgedly-piggedly, you know.

Well, yes, I like here fairly well. Don't meet the bon ton at this hotel by any means, and do meet almost all the gentlemen about town whose occupations don't go down in the directory. You speak of it as a famous hotel, you remind me of old Kaspar and Peterkin:

"Why that I cannot tell," said he,
"But 'twas a famous victory."

I broached the subject to Wrex the other day, and he replied, with a shrug, that many years had passed since Harvey Parker, all honor to him, graduated from his restaurant—he started so, you must know—into a hotel keeper, and while he was growing old, younger men have profited by his experience and example—yet, when the time came for Parker to shift the active work from his still able shoulders, he was not fortunate in his choice of young blood. The judgment of Harvey Parker, himself, in things hotelical, is sound as ever, yet the Parker House is not what it used to be. I don't know whether lack of style and sang froid is typical of Boston or not, but it seems to be the case. Par exemple, I smile whenever I think of the confusion that arose at a certain G. A. R. post supper here a few evenings since. It was not the toniest crowd that dines here, to be sure, but that's no odds; in truth a large part of the tony people go to Young's—further down street—in our days. It happened when dinner was served for this post, they were one more at the board than was expected, and in sitting down one gentleman had the terrible misfortune to sit in front, instead of at the left of his glasses. A New Yorker would never have made such a mortifying mistake; he would know where his glasses belonged, every time. But that's not to the point, which is that being down in that position, it made room for the extra guest, and behold the result. With the perversity of fate he came between the waiter's sections. "Here are my five men," said one obstreperous waiter. "Here are mine," said the next,—consequence, man in front of glasses is knocked out entirely, and has the pleasure of hearing waiters descend to their everyday roles and swear roundly at one another. I am not exaggerating when I say that it was only by the greatest conniving that the poor fellow got any of that spread. There was a most ridiculous changing of service, calling for second helps to meet the emergency that you ever saw. I don't know but all hotel service would have been equally demoralized by such a giant as one Boston man, but I don't believe despised Chicago would annex first-class to any house in her town that was so easily upset. On this occasion the waiters were hired by the job apparently, and one was so anxious to remove the cloth from his end of the table at an early hour that he began it unaided, right over the heads of the guests, disregarding of the barber's masterpieces and much to their disadvantage, not to mention one of the officers who got his hair greased with a material never meant for that purpose. However, it was a famous hotel, all the same.

I have seen Harvard en masse—Theo, you know; but as it is three o'clock, and I am anxious to lay me to rest in the arms of Mrs. Morpheus, I send you the daily papers, very prosy, to be sure; but there's room for your imagination. I must, however, remark a word upon a scene that reminded me of the dear old days, my boy, when you and I were young, and would have been willing to live always; those halcyon days when we could forget in the embrace of the aforesaid Mme. Morpheus the day that was gone and begin over again in the morning. The bloom of the peach rubs off, however; it always does, worse luck. All this is apropos of the Harvard Pi Eta theatricals a week since, where I viewed with envy the acme of the self-possessed Harvard dress coats and standing collar; the superior high mightiness of the court it paid mademoiselle—and yet the youthfulness of it. There was one favorite,—as attractive a bit of flesh and blood, without being pretty, as I have seen for many a day; piquant, petite (a good thing in a small parcel, you know); a student on the right; a student on the left; a student behind; five students in front, and a brigade of students, charging up the aisle all the evening; dainty face in poke bonnet distributing smiles as impartially as the rain that falls alike on the just and the unjust; and a dash about the whole thing that only a student can lend. Ah, poor fools! I've been there myself, and I felt like whi-pering, "I tell you, fellows, make the most of it, for unless you turn out perfect donkeys, you will never feel so satisfied again!" The boys gave an admirable performance of Papa Perichon and a farce, but the fun of the thing was of course in seeing Fox, a Kentucky fellow, and Marshall Cushing, a scold of one of Hingham's F. S.s, parade in female toggery. Fox as Mamma was capital, and you would have enjoyed him when his bonnet fell off and he said aside in Belshaw's (Papa)ear in a tone very unfeminine, "—this —bonnet!" I shall never see fair Rosalie again without recalling Marshall Cushing rouged to death, simpering like a sixteen-year-old, and toddling round upon eggs. He looked well until he spoke, and then if his voice hadn't given him away his mouth would. Odd, isn't it? But even being descended from the settlers of Hingham doesn't make an upper lip born for a mustache look femininely kissable when shaved. Oh yes, look at that with your critical eye. I see you do it; "cela depend," you say. Well I am the judge in this matter; the little girl across the aisle would have emphasized differently without doubt, for Cushing is something of a ladies' man.

Enough of this until next time. Wish you had been here to see Theo. You would have enjoyed it more than I did. It's the Boston style to see everything, but always say you didn't enjoy it much.

Faternally yours,

MARC BERTONI.

To Volney Thrale, Esq.

BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

Mr. Haldeman Discusses the
Conservatory Project,

And Blows a Blast at Henschel and Higginson.

ALDERMAN HALDEMAN ON MUSIC.

When the order referring to a joint special committee, composed of Councilmen Fisk, Whitmore and Doherty, with such as this board may join, the order transferring certain land in the South burying ground to the New England Conservatory of Music, with instructions to ascertain the value, came up in the concurrent business, Alderman Haldeman made the following address:

Mr. Chairman: I hope the board will not concur with the common council in appointing a special committee. Such a course would be unjust to that on public lands, who have had the matter in charge for three months, have made three reports, given two public hearings and are certainly quite as competent to make a suitable recommendation to the city council as any other committee. I also protest against the attempt to strand the petition by associating it with an impracticable and untimely proposition to extend Rutland street, and to have a money valuation placed upon land that has no real value to the city, when the petitioners ask for it as a gift for public use. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that there must be some cause for the peculiar opposition to this simple request on the part of the common council that should be more clearly defined. Let us for a moment follow the several stages of the petition that was presented to this board Feb. 19, and referred to the committee on public lands. On the 26th, the committee reported an order that the land be granted for the purposes specified for the sum of $1—that is, free of cost, and the board passed it by a unanimous vote. When presented to the other branch it was recommended, returned to the board in a new draft, and March 1 was passed a second time. When again presented up stairs the councilman from ward 12 made an effort to have it indefinitely postponed. It laid over until the 22d, when it was recommended for a second time, with instructions to give a public hearing. The committee reported the result of two hearings April 12, and for a third time recommended that the order ought to pass. Again it was laid over until May 17, when it was transferred to the mercies of a special committee, who are expected to go over the whole ground again in connection with side issues, never contemplated by the petitioners or this board. If it is the purpose of the common council to defeat the order, I hope it will so vote, in a manly way, rather than kill it off by dilatory tactics and pettifoggish subterfuges. If the members of that branch are possessed of more wisdom or knowledge of facts than this board, I would like to hear a good reason why not this, or any other unused or abandoned, graveyard, located in the midst of a populous city, should not be assigned to the uses of the community. I hold that, wherever the heirs and descendants of those whose bones lie mouldering beneath weeds and rubbish have so little reverence for their memory and who care so little for public opinion that they allow the grounds to become

AN OBNOXIOUS NUISANCE,

it is about time that they are given over to the occupancy of brick and mortar and added to our tax list. Is there any cogent reason why the unsavory graveyard under our very windows should not be covered by an extension of City Hall to Tremont street? Sentimentality might be satisfied by facing the front wall with the quaint old tombstones and slabs, where they would be securely preserved and at the same time easily seen and inspected by the antiquarian or the curious. Such a course would be infinitely more appropriate than planting them in floral rows like so many cabbages, as they now are, without any reference whatsoever to the graves they are supposed to indicate. The same may be said of the Granary burying ground, which would be equally unsightly and uncanny were it not for the industry of John Beardon to keep up a show of seasonable flowers at the expense of the city. Not a sod, not a plant, not a cent of money is contributed by the wealthy descendants of the honored dead to make the place decent and harmonious with the surroundings of a great city. Graveyards, like men and obsolete structures, should pass away when they have served the purpose of their creation. The bones of the dead have no business to be in constant association with the flesh and blood of the living. The South burying ground is no longer used, it is uncared for by any one, and as an inevitable result it is unkempt, unwholesome, and were it not for its high wall would be an absolute eyesore and nuisance to the denizens of our city at large as it is to those in the immediate vicinity. The board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music have purchased the St. James Hotel property, and, after one year's experience, find that a large hall is necessary for educational and public purposes; so they come to the city of Boston and ask the fee to enough land, after having secured the rights of the tombs covering the same. What this corporation asks for is no more unreasonable than for the city to petition the state to provide land for a Public Library or the general government for Castle Island for park purposes, or for the School of Technology to seek similar assistance, nor is there any impropriety in all the several requests being granted. The New England Conservatory of Music has been one of our most popular educational institutions for fully 10 years, without having asked or received a dollar in the way of assistance from the city, and during that period upward of 30,000 pupils have passed through its various courses of instruction. The last year some 2000 have been in attendance, representing 38 states, 6 provinces, 2 territories and 4 countries. These people expend fully $500,000 per annum in our city in various ways. As some

MALICIOUSLY ADVERSE STORIES

have been industriously circulated among members of the city government by interested parties, it may be well to give the figures upon which the estimate is based:

Of the 1300 students now in attendance, there are about 600 living in the permanent home whose board will average $9 per week for 42 weeks..... $151,000
1300 average tuition, $50 per term, 4 terms... 260,000
Rent of 300 pianos at $15 per quarter..... 18,000
Books, music, concerts, lectures, clothing and incidental expenses, say, $80 per annum.... 78,000

Total.....$507,000

This will show pretty conclusively what this institution has accomplished in the way of financial prosperity, by industry and intelligent perseverance on the part of the management; and, as the facts have been fully stated to the city council, we may well wonder why there should be so much hostility to granting such a reasonable request. I have a theory that is plausible, if not strictly correct, as to the true inwardness of this carefully organized opposition to increasing the importance and stability of the Conservatory of Music. To be properly understood, I must burden you with a hurried retrospection of our musical situation. New England has inherited a musical taste and a musical education from its Puritan ancestors. At first it was of a psalm-singing character. Not only were singing schools about the only recreation the rural population were allowed to indulge in, but the Yankee singing master permeated the land to the South and West. Gradually Boston became the source of various choral societies of the highest standard, but instrumental and orchestral work grew very slowly. In the year 1848 two dozen young musicians left Berlin and came to America as the Germania orchestra. After continued tribulations in various cities, they abandoned their organization and each other, to scatter and establish themselves where best they could. In 1854 a few of them settled permanently in Boston, and became the nucleus of our local Germania, that furnished the means for thorough symphony work. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the original "first flute," soon drifted into a superior chorus leader and an orchestra conductor, and holds the front rank in each at the present time. The next step forward was the purchase of the "big organ," the only element yet necessary to produce the greatest works of the greatest masters beyond anything of the kind in America. Then it was that the city of Boston justly claimed her proud position as the musical centre of the new world. For 25 years or more the Germania orchestra managed to hold a close monopoly of their peculiar line of business. It was only upon great or special occasions, when an unusually large number of musicians was required, that any one but a German was allowed to enter their jealously guarded province. One of the best violinists in Boston was kept out of the symphony concerts for years for the reason that he happened to be an Englishman, and then only admitted because his service

COULD NOT BE DISPENSED WITH.

So with musicians of Irish descent, but to a more exaggerated extent. The only field open to native Americans, or descendants of other nationalities than the German States, were military bands, theatre orchestras, dances and miscellaneous jobs. The Germania orchestra, during these years of supremacy, changed considerably. Many of the old members retired and new importations succeeded them and their prejudices against interlopers until a general indication of decay and lack of prosperity was apparent. This deterioration and disintegration were hastened by a radical change in the popular taste or fashion that introduced musical features into the long-established lecture courses, which cheapened the value of them to such an extent that a legitimate concert of the highest grade would not draw an audience of sufficient size to warrant the cost unless some famous soloist was announced in connection with some popular attraction. In fact it became common to send to New York for Theodore Thomas and his orchestra to give our people symphony concerts. About five years ago Mr. A. P. Peck, with some of the more enterprising members of the Germania, got up a little enthusiasm, and organized the Philharmonic Society, on a cooperative basis, with Mr. Bernard Listemann as conductor, so as to keep enough competent musicians together to supply demands for work of a standard character without having to send to New York or elsewhere for talent. This was the situation three years ago, when a musical and social sensation was created by the formal announcement that a new organization, to be called the Boston Symphony orchestra, would be established and financially supported by a wealthy banker, with a German concert singer by the name of Henschel as his conductor. The story has already been told by one of our society papers, as follows:

"A certain lady of great refinement—a beauty of real musical feeling, a niece of a gentleman in high standing, and a social favorite—went abroad to finish her education, in the course of which she fell under the instruction of a German artist in London, who was musical instructor to Princess Louise, and I don't know whom else of royal blood. German artist falls in love with American beauty, marries her; is at once transported right into the heart of Boston's culture. Result—millionaire banker interested; enthusiastically champions the cause of music; determines to ride a pet hobby; purchases the big hall of which Boston has been so proud; engages German artist to conduct an orchestra, at the phenomenal salary of $10,000. Consider on it, and realize that the sum is more to his conductorship than it even looks to you, because in der faderland they don't pay such salaries. They live in a world of art over there, such as is stilled here in no time; it positively cannot live in this land of result." * * * Of that salary—I notice the New York Choral Society offered Max Bruch $3000. I suppose that is a very fair offer; but the Henschel boom has made it look insultingly small by comparison. I must express, however, the greatest respect for a gentleman who can ride a hobby so regally as this Boston banker, Higginson, has done; though it is not generally known here that he has provided for the musical interests of Boston, against the time when he cannot look after them in person, by establishing a fund of $1,000,000, at least, so a friend of his says."

ONE OF THE FIRST ACTS OF HENSCHTEL

was to take Mr. Listemann away from the Philharmonic to lead his violin, and to issue an order that no member of the Symphony orchestra could play under the baton of any other conductor. The majority of the musicians, however, being members of the Germania, refused to abandon the Philharmonic, Harvard, Handel and Haydn, and other societies whose work they had monopolized for so many years, and as a sufficient number of trained musicians could not be had at a short notice and at the prices offered, the autocrat had to submit to reason and common sense. He retaliated, however, by introducing a number of young Americans into the orchestra, some of whom were better performers than many of the "old stagers." His financial patron gave out that his orchestra was intended to develop native talent and to encourage the study of music as a profession as well as an art. The success of Mr. Higginson's venture was immediate in popular favor and in establishing a solid foundation for the speedy control of all orchestral work in the city of Boston and its vicinity. The Harvard society was forced to give up the ghost in despair the very first season. The Philharmonic was charitably permitted to languish because its new conductor, being only a pianist, was no better than the singer, and equally subject to personal and professional ridicule, criticism and censure, so that there was no great fear or jealousy necessary or apparent. The second season, when the veteran Zerrahn was chosen conductor of the Philharmonic, Henschel became more seriously alarmed. He did not dare to allow the majority of his orchestra play under his direction one night and under that of Zerrahn the next; the difference in conductor would be too marked, and he refused to be the subject of invidious comparison. His protection was in discharging as many of the Germania men as he was able to replace with new importations. The coming season will almost, if not quite, complete the plans as originally designed. The dilettante conductor has been sent to Europe to pick up enough impetuous German musicians to take the places of those who remained loyal to rival organizations as well as of the young Americans who were to be so carefully fostered and educated by our so-called musical benefactor, although they are superior to many of the favorites and lackettles who have been reengaged. In other words, Mr. Henschel will soon have a German band absolutely under his personal control, no member of which will be suffered to play for any other organization or under any other conductor, whether he be good, bad or indifferent. When we consider that Music Hall is now under the control of Mr. Higginson, and good nights are never given to rival attractions, we can readily understand that he has determined to get rid of the great organ, so as to enlarge the seating capacity, and obtain more money for the space occupied, without much reference to the veneration and sentiment attached to its history and the equity of those who contributed thousands of dollars to purchase it for the glory of their city. It looks very much as though Mr. Higginson has really gone into

A MUSICAL SPECULATION

rather than a philanthropic contribution, and unless there should be a radical change in public opinion, he will eventually not only control the entire musical interests of Boston, but effectually impair the livelihood of hundreds of our resident musicians by the importation of great numbers of mercenaries. With a view to counteract the danger of such a monopoly, it behooves us to protect our own citizens against any combination of capital and personal vanity that may be wielded to their injury. The New England Conservatory of Music is one means, and at the present time is perhaps the most available. If we grant enough land a new public hall will be built immediately; the "big organ" that Mr. Higginson thinks has had its day and served its purpose will be provided for and cherished by friendly hands and be kept in the city of Boston, in accordance with popular sentiment. As the Conservatory is a local institution, and necessarily supported by a native population, it cannot but be American in its instincts and in its teachings as against money bags, snobbery and sham magnanimity. My own ideas are better expressed by the society paper already quoted from, as follows:

"And now it is pretty generally understood that one object of Henschel's visit to Europe is to hire German musicians for next season. I understand that the rival orchestra, the one whose interests have really been most injured by this new scheme—the Philharmonic—will next season try to make a boom by using the Conservatory hall, into which they hope to have the big organ fixed by that time, and engaging the musicians of Boston repute whom the Henschel orchestra scheme has either discarded or by its conditions forced to resign. I don't know how the thing will work. If Boston were a town of the local pride it was once reputed to have been, the Philharmonic boom would be assured beforehand; but, as it is in reality a clique place, and Henschel is admired personally by the most powerful circle in town, the one about which the other circles revolve, delighted, apparently to be allowed to sit in the same room with them even, and, as the Boston love of symphony is all bosh, it looks as if the professional prophets would have a hard time rallying the public from its present position. However, we shall see what we shall see. A man who starts in a position as independent as Henschel's, and carries things with a high hand all round, sometimes goes to pieces all at once, without any warning, like the one-horse shay:

—nothing first,

Just as bubbles do, when they burst."

On account of the absence of several members of the board, it was decided to postpone further consideration of this matter for one week.

THE MUSICAL QUESTION AGAIN.

It is not often that the city fathers are called upon to quit discussions of homely, practical questions and listen to one who pleads the cause of Polyhymnia. Yesterday afternoon, the question before the Aldermen being the order from the Council to refer to a joint special committee an order transferring to the New England Conservatory of Music certain land in the South Burying Ground for a concert hall, with instructions to ascertain its value, a motion to postpone further consideration of the matter for one week was made, and thereupon Alderman Haldeman spoke in advocacy of the cause of the petitioners, with a presentation of the motive of the opposition. His claim was that the objections came from a clique who desired to control the musical interests of the city, and to sustain this point he made his extraordinary speech—which is not, however, more extraordinary than the circumstance that Mr. Haldeman is an alderman at all. What we have to complain of is that Mr. Haldeman having enough of a good theme for a good speech should have disfigured it with the irrelevant personalities and petty and malignant gossip and tittle-tattle from "society papers" which he introduced. If Mr. Haldeman is no more accurate as a request on the part of the common council that should be more clearly defined. Let us for a moment follow the several stages of the petition that was presented to this board Feb. 19, and referred to the committee on public lands. On the 26th, the committee reported an order that the land be granted for the purposes specified for the sum of $1—that is, free of cost, and the board passed it by a unanimous vote. When presented to the other branch it was recommitted, returned to the board in a new draft, and March 1 was passed a second time. When again presented up stairs the councilman from ward 12 made an effort to have it indefinitely postponed. It laid over until the 22d, when it was recommitted for a second time, with instructions to give a public hearing. The committee reported the result of two hearings April 12, and for a third time recommended that the order ought to pass. Again it was laid over until May 17, when it was transferred to the mercies of a special committee, who are expected to go over the whole ground again in connection with side issues, never contemplated by the petitioners or this board. If it is the purpose of the common council to defeat the order, I hope it will so vote, in a manly way, rather than kill it off by dilatory tactics and pettifoggish subterfuges. If the members of that branch are possessed of more wisdom or knowledge of facts than this board, I would like to hear a good reason why not this, or any other unused or abandoned, graveyard, located in the midst of a populous city, should not be assigned to the uses of the community. I hold that, wherever the heirs and descendants of those whose bones lie mouldering beneath weeds and rubbish have so little reverence for their memory and who care so little for public opinion that they allow the grounds to become

AN OBNOXIOUS NUISANCE,

it is about time that they are given over to the occupancy of brick and mortar and added to our tax list. Is there any cogent reason why the unsavory graveyard under our very windows should not be covered by an extension of City Hall to Tremont street? Sentimentality might be satisfied by facing the front wall with the quaint old tombstones and slabs, where they would be securely preserved and at the same time easily seen and inspected by the antiquarian or the curious. Such a course would be infinitely more appropriate than planting them in floral rows like so many cabbages, as they now are, without any reference whatsoever to the graves they are supposed to indicate. The same may be said of the Granary burying ground, which would be equally unsightly and uncanny were it not for the industry of John Reardon to keep up a show of seasonable flowers at the expense of the city. Not a son, not a plant, not a cent of money is contributed by the wealthy descendants of the honored dead to make the place decent and harmonious with the surroundings of a great city. Graveyards, like men and obsolete structures, should pass away when they have served the purpose of their creation. The bones of the dead have no business to be in constant association with the flesh and blood of the living. The South burying ground is no longer used, it is uncared for by any one, and as an inevitable result it is unkempt, unwholesome, and were it not for its high wall would be an absolute eyesore and nuisance to the denizens of our city at large as it is to those in the immediate vicinity. The board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music have purchased the St. James Hotel property, and, after one year's experience, find that a large hall is necessary for educational and public purposes; so they come to the city of Boston and ask the fee to enough land, after having secured the rights of the tombs covering the same. What this corporation asks for is no more unreasonable than for the city to petition the state to provide land for a Public Library or the general government for Castle Island for park purposes, or for the School of Technology to seek similar assistance, nor is there any impropriety in all the several requests being granted. The New England Conservatory of Music has been one of our most popular educational institutions for fully 19 years, without having asked or received a dollar in the way of assistance from the city, and during that period upward of 30,000 pupils have passed through its various courses of instruction. The last year some 2000 have been in attendance, representing 38 states, 6 provinces, 2 territories and 4 countries. These people expend fully $500,000 per annum in our city in various ways. As some

MALICIOUSLY ADVERSE STORIES

have been industriously circulated among members of the city government by interested parties, it may be well to give the figures upon which the estimate is based:

Of the 1300 students now in attendance, there are about 600 living in the permanent home whose board will average $30 per week for 42 weeks.....$151,000
1300 average tuition, $50 per term, 4 terms... 260,000
Rent of 300 pianos at $15 per quarter..... 18,000
Books, music, concerts, lectures, clothing and incidental expenses, say, $60 per annum.... 78,000

Total.....$507,000

This will show pretty conclusively what this institution has accomplished in the way of financial prosperity, by industry and intelligent perseverance on the part of the management; and, as the facts have been fully stated to the city council, we may well wonder why there should be so much hostility to granting such a reasonable request. I have a theory that is plausible, if not strictly correct, as to the true inwardness of this carefully organized opposition to increasing the importance and stability of the Conservatory of Music. To be properly understood, I must burden you with a hurried retrospection of our musical situation. New England has inherited a musical taste and a musical education from its Puritan ancestors. At first it was of a psalm-singing character. Not only were singing schools about the only recreation the rural population were allowed to indulge in, but the Yankee singing master permeated the land to the South and West. Gradually Boston became the source of various choral societies of the highest standard, but instrumental and orchestral work grew very slowly. In the year 1848 two dozen young musicians left Berlin and came to America as the Germania orchestra. After continued tribulations in various cities, they abandoned their organization and each other, to scatter and establish themselves where best they could. In 1854 a few of them settled permanently in Boston, and became the nucleus of our local Germania, that furnished the means for thorough symphony work. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the original "first flute," soon drifted into a superior chorus leader and an orchestra conductor, and holds the front rank in each at the present time. The next step forward was the purchase of the "big organ," the only element yet necessary to produce the greatest works of the greatest masters beyond anything of the kind in America. Then it was that the city of Boston justly claimed her proud position as the musical centre of the new world. For 25 years or more the Germania orchestra managed to hold a close monopoly of their peculiar line of business. It was only upon great or special occasions, when an unusually large number of musicians was required, that any one but a German was allowed to enter their jealously guarded province. One of the best violinists in Boston was kept out of the symphony concerts for years for the reason that he happened to be an Englishman, and then only admitted because his service

COULD NOT BE DISPENSED WITH.

So with musicians of Irish descent, but to a more exaggerated extent. The only field open to native Americans, or descendants of other nationalities than the German States, were military bands, theatre orchestras, dances and miscellaneous jobs. The Germania orchestra, during these years of supremacy, changed considerably. Many of the old members retired and new importations succeeded them and their prejudices against interlopers until a general indication of decay and lack of prosperity was apparent. This deterioration and disintegration were hastened by a radical change in the popular taste or fashion that introduced musical features into the long-established lecture courses, which cheapened the value of them to such an extent that a legitimate concert of the highest grade would not draw an audience of sufficient size to warrant the cost unless some famous soloist was announced in connection with some popular attraction. In fact it became common to send to New York for Theodore Thomas and his orchestra to give our people symphony concerts. About five years ago Mr. A. P. Peck, with some of the more enterprising members of the Germania, got up a little enthusiasm, and organized the Philharmonic Society, on a cooperative basis, with Mr. Bernard Listemann as conductor, so as to keep enough competent musicians together to supply demands for work of a standard character without having to send to New York or elsewhere for talent. This was the situation three years ago, when a musical and social sensation was created by the formal announcement that a new organization, to be called the Boston Symphony orchestra, would be established and financially supported by a wealthy banker, with a German concert singer by the name of Henschel as his conductor. The story has already been told by one of our society papers, as follows:

"A certain lady of great refinement—a beauty of real musical feeling, a niece of a gentleman in high standing, and a social favorite—went abroad to finish her education, in the course of which she fell under the instruction of a German artist in London, who was musical instructor to Princess Louise, and I don't know whom else of royal blood. German artist falls in love with American beauty; marries her; is at once transported right into the heart of Boston's culture. Result—millionaire banker interested; enthusiastically champions the cause of music; determines to ride a pet hobby; purchases the big hall of which Boston has been so proud; engages German artist to conduct an orchestra, at the phenomenal salary of $10,000. Consider on it, and realize that the sum is more to his conductorship than it even looks to you, because in der faderland they don't pay such salaries. They live in a world of art over there, such as is stilted here in no time; it positively cannot live in this land of result." * * * "Of that salary—I notice the New York Choral Society offered Max Bruch $3000. I suppose that is a very fair offer; but the Henschel boom has made it look insultingly small by comparison. I must express, however, the greatest respect for a gentleman who can ride a hobby so regally as this Boston banker, Higginson, has done; though it is not generally known here that he has provided for the musical interests of Boston, against the time when he cannot look after them in person, by establishing a fund of $1,000,000, at least, so a friend of his says."

ONE OF THE FIRST ACTS OF HENSCHEL.

was to take Mr. Listemann away from the Philharmonic to lead his violin, and to issue an order that no member of the Symphony orchestra could play under the baton of any other conductor. The majority of the musicians, however, being members of the Germania, refused to abandon the Philharmonic, Harvard, Handel and Haydn, and other societies whose work they had monopolized for so many years, and as a sufficient number of trapezoid musicians could not be had at a short notice and at the prices offered, the autocrat had to submit to reason and common sense. He retaliated, however, by introducing a number of young Americans into the orchestra, some of whom were better performers than many of the "old stagers." His financial patron gave out that his orchestra was intended to develop native talent and to encourage the study of music as a profession as well as an art. The success of Mr. Higginson's venture was immediate in popular favor and in establishing a solid foundation for the speedy control of all orchestral work in the city of Boston and its vicinity. The Harvard society was forced to give up the ghost in despair the very first season. The Philharmonic was charitably permitted to languish because its new conductor, being only a pianist, was no better than the singer, and equally subject to personal and professional ridicule, criticism and censure, so that there was no great fear or jealousy necessary or apparent. The second season, when the veteran Zerrahn was chosen conductor of the Philharmonic, Henschel became more seriously alarmed. He did not dare to allow the majority of his orchestra play under his direction one night and under that of Zerrahn the next; the difference in conductor would be too marked, and he refused to be the subject of invidious comparison. His protection was in discharging as many of the Germania men as he was able to replace with new importations. The coming season will almost, if not quite, complete the plans as originally designed. The dilettante conductor has been sent to Europe to pick up enough impetuous German musicians to take the places of those who remained loyal to rival organizations as well as of the young Americans who were to be so carefully fostered and educated by our so-called musical benefactor, although they are superior to many of the favorites and lackspittles who have been reëngaged. In other words, Mr. Henschel will soon have a German band absolutely under his personal control, no member of which will be suffered to play for any other organization or under any other conductor, whether he be good, bad or indifferent. When we consider that Music Hall is now under the control of Mr. Higginson, and good nights are never given to rival attractions, we can readily understand that he has determined to get rid of the great organ, so as to enlarge the seating capacity, and obtain more money for the space occupied, without much reference to the veneration and sentiment attached to its history and the equity of those who contributed thousands of dollars to purchase it for the glory of their city. It looks very much as though Mr. Higginson has really gone into

A MUSICAL SPECULATION

rather than a philanthropic contribution, and unless there should be a radical change in public opinion, he will eventually not only control the entire musical interests of Boston, but effectually impair the livelihood of hundreds of our resident musicians by the importation of great numbers of mercenaries. With a view to counteract the danger of such a monopoly, it behooves us to protect our own citizens against any combination of capital and personal vanity that may be wielded to their injury. The New England Conservatory of Music is one means, and at the present time is perhaps the most available. If we grant enough land a new public hall will be built immediately; the "big organ" that Mr. Higginson thinks has had its day and served its purpose will be provided for and cherished by friendly hands and be kept in the city of Boston, in accordance with popular sentiment. As the Conservatory is a local institution, and necessarily supported by a native population, it cannot but be American in its instincts and in its teachings as against money bags, snobbery and sham magnanimity. My own ideas are better expressed by the society paper already quoted from, as follows:

"And now it is pretty generally understood that one object of Henschel's visit to Europe is to hire German musicians for next season. I understand that the rival orchestra, the one whose interests have really been most injured by this new scheme—the Philharmonic—will next season try to make a boom by using the Conservatory hall, into which they hope to have the big organ fixed by that time, and engaging the musicians of Boston repute whom the Henschel orchestra scheme has either discarded or by its conditions forced to resign. I don't know how the thing will work. If Boston were a town of the local pride it was once reputed to have been, the Philharmonic boom would be assured beforehand; but, as it is in reality a clique place, and Henschel is admired personally by the most powerful circle in town, the one about which the other circles revolve, delighted, apparently, to be allowed to sit in the same room with them even, and, as the Boston love of symphony is all bosh, it looks as if the professional prophets would have a hard time rallying the public from its present position. However, we shall see what we shall see. A man who starts in a position as independent as Henschel's, and carries things with a high hand all round, sometimes goes to pieces all at once, without any warning, like the one-horse shay:

"—nothing first,

Just as bubbles do, when they burst."

On account of the absence of several members of the board, it was decided to postpone further consideration of this matter for one week.

THE MUSICAL QUESTION AGAIN.

It is not often that the city fathers are called upon to quit discussions of homely, practical questions and listen to one who pleads the cause of Polyhymnia. Yesterday afternoon, the question before the Aldermen being the order from the Council to refer to a joint special committee an order transferring to the New England Conservatory of Music certain land in the South Burying Ground for a concert hall, with instructions to ascertain its value, a motion to postpone further consideration of the matter for one week was made, and thereupon Alderman Haldeman spoke in advocacy of the cause of the petitioners, with a presentation of the motive of the opposition. His claim was that the objections came from a clique who desired to control the musical interests of the city, and to sustain this point he made his extraordinary speech—which is not, however, more extraordinary than the circumstance that Mr. Haldeman is an alderman at all. What we have to complain of is that Mr. Haldeman having enough of a good theme for a good speech should have disfigured it with the irrelevant personalities and petty and malignant gossip and tittle-tattle from "society papers" which he introduced. If Mr. Haldeman is no more accurate as a request on the part of the common council that should be more clearly defined. Let us for a moment follow the several stages of the petition that was presented to this board Feb. 19, and referred to the committee on public lands. On the 26th, the committee reported an order that the land be granted for the purposes specified for the sum of $1—that is, free of cost, and the board passed it by a unanimous vote. When presented to the other branch it was recommitted, returned to the board in a new draft, and March 1 was passed a second time. When again presented up stairs the councilman from ward 12 made an effort to have it indefinitely postponed. It laid over until the 22d, when it was recommitted for a second time, with instructions to give a public hearing. The committee reported the result of two hearings April 12, and for a third time recommended that the order ought to pass. Again it was laid over until May 17, when it was transferred to the merces of a special committee, who are expected to go over the whole ground again in connection with side issues, never contemplated by the petitioners or this board. If it is the purpose of the common council to defeat the order, I hope it will so vote, in a manly way, rather than kill it off by dilatory tactics and pettifoggish subterfuges. If the members of that branch are possessed of more wisdom or knowledge of facts than this board, I would like to hear a good reason why not this, or any other unused or abandoned graveyard, located in the midst of a populous city, should not be assigned to the uses of the community. I hold that, wherever the heirs and descendants of those whose bones lie mouldering beneath weeds and rubbish have so little reverence for their memory and who care so little for public opinion that they allow the grounds to become

AN OBNOXIOUS NUISANCE.

It is about time that they are given over to the occupancy of brick and mortar and added to our tax list. Is there any cogent reason why the unsavory graveyard under our very windows should not be covered by an extension of City Hall to Tremont street? Sentimentality might be satisfied by facing the front wall with the quaint old tombstones and slabs, where they would be securely preserved and at the same time easily seen and inspected by the antiquarian or the curious. Such a course would be infinitely more appropriate than planting them in floral rows like so many cabbages, as they now are, without any reference whatever to the graves they are supposed to indicate. The same may be said of the Granary burying ground, which would be equally unsightly and uncanny were it not for the industry of John Reardon to keep up a show of seasonable flowers at the expense of the city. Not a sod, not a plant, not a cent of money is contributed by the wealthy descendants of the honored dead to make the place decent and harmonious with the surroundings of a great city. Graveyards, like men and obsolete structures, should pass away when they have served the purpose of their creation. The bones of the dead have no business to be in constant association with the flesh and blood of the living. The South burying ground is no longer used, it is uncared for by any one, and as an inevitable result it is unkempt, unwholesome, and were it not for its high wall would be an absolute eyesore and nuisance to the denizens of our city at large as it is to those in the immediate vicinity. The board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music have purchased the St. James Hotel property, and, after one year's experience, find that a large hall is necessary for educational and public purposes; so they come to the city of Boston and ask the fee to enough land, after having secured the rights of the tombs covering the same. What this corporation asks for is no more unreasonable than for the city to petition the state to provide land for a Public Library or the general government for Castle Island for park purposes, or for the School of Technology to seek similar assistance, nor is there any impropriety in all the several requests being granted. The New England Conservatory of Music has been one of our most popular educational institutions for fully 18 years, without having asked or received a dollar in the way of assistance from the city, and during that period upward of 30,000 pupils have passed through its various courses of instruction. The last year some 2000 have been in attendance, representing 38 states, 6 provinces, 2 territories and 4 countries. These people expend fully $500,000 per annum in our city in various ways. As some

MALICIOUSLY ADVERSE STORIES

have been industriously circulated among members of the city government by interested parties, it may be well to give the figures upon which the estimate is based:

Of the 1300 students now in attendance, there are about 600 living in the permanent homes whose board will average $8 per week for 42 weeks..... $151,000
1300 average tuition, $50 per term, 4 terms... 260,000
Rent of 300 pianos at $15 per quarter..... 18,000
Books, music, concerts, lectures, clothing and incidental expenses, say, $40 per annum.... 78,000

Total.....$507,000

This will show pretty conclusively what this institution has accomplished in the way of financial prosperity, by industry and intelligent perseverance on the part of the management; and, as the facts have been fully stated to the city council, we may well wonder why there should be so much hostility to granting such a reasonable request. I have a theory that is plausible, if not strictly correct, as to the true inwardness of this carefully organized opposition to increasing the importance and stability of the Conservatory of Music. To be properly understood, I must burden you with a hurried retrospection of our musical situation. New England has inherited a musical taste and a musical education from its Puritan ancestors. At first it was of a psalm-singing character. Not only were singing schools about the only recreation the rural population were allowed to indulge in, but the Yankee singing master permeated the land to the South and West. Gradually Boston became the source of various choral societies of the highest standard, but instrumental and orchestral work grew very slowly. In the year 1848 two dozen young musicians left Berlin and came to America as the Germania orchestra. After continued tribulations in various cities, they abandoned their organization and each other, to scatter and establish themselves where best they could. In 1854 a few of them settled permanently in Boston, and became the nucleus of our local Germania, that furnished the means for thorough symphony work. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the original "first flute," soon drifted into a superior chorus leader and an orchestra conductor, and holds the front rank in each at the present time. The next step forward was the purchase of the "big organ," the only element yet necessary to produce the greatest works of the greatest masters beyond anything of the kind in America. Then it was that the city of Boston justly claimed her proud position as the musical centre of the new world. For 25 years or more the Germania orchestra managed to hold a close monopoly of their peculiar line of business. It was only upon great or special occasions, when an unusually large number of musicians was required, that any one but a German was allowed to enter their jealously guarded province. One of the best violinists in Boston was kept out of the symphony concerts for years for the reason that he happened to be an Englishman, and then only admitted because his services

COULD NOT BE DISPENSED WITH.

So with musicians of Irish descent, but to a more exaggerated extent. The only field open to native Americans, or descendants of other nationalities than the German States, were military bands, theatre orchestras, dances and miscellaneous jobs. The Germania orchestra, during these years of supremacy, changed considerably. Many of the old members retired and new importations succeeded them and their prejudices against interlopers until a general indication of decay and lack of prosperity was apparent. This deterioration and disintegration were hastened by a radical change in the popular taste or fashion that introduced musical features into the long-established lecture courses, which cheapened the value of them to such an extent that a legitimate concert of the highest grade would not draw an audience of sufficient size to warrant the cost unless some famous soloist was announced in connection with some popular attraction. In fact it became common to send to New York for Theodore Thomas and his orchestra to give our people symphony concerts. About five years ago Mr. A. P. Peck, with some of the more enterprising members of the Germania, got up a little enthusiasm, and organized the Philharmonic Society, on a co-operative basis, with Mr. Bernard Listemann as conductor, so as to keep enough competent musicians together to supply demands for work of a standard character without having to send to New York or elsewhere for talent. This was the situation three years ago, when a musical and social sensation was created by the formal announcement that a new organization, to be called the Boston Symphony orchestra, would be established and financially supported by a wealthy banker, with a German concert singer by the name of Henschel as his conductor. The story has already been told by one of our society papers, as follows:

"A certain lady of great refinement—a beauty of real musical feeling, a mere of a gentleman in high standing, and a social favorite—went abroad to finish her education, in the course of which she fell under the instruction of a German artist in London, who was musical instructor to Princess Louise, and I don't know whom else of royal blood. German artist falls in love with American beauty; marries her; is at once transported right into the heart of Boston's culture. Result—millionaire banker interested; enthusiastically champions the cause of music; determines to ride a pet hobby; purchases the big hall of which Boston has been so proud; engages German artist to conduct an orchestra, at the phenomenal salary of $10,000. Consider on it, and realize that the sum is more to his conductorship than it even looks to you, because in der faterland they don't pay such salaries. They live in a world of art over there, such as is stilled here in no time; it positively cannot live in this land of result." * * * "Of that salary—notice the New York Choral Society offered Max Bruch $3000. I suppose that is a very fair offer; but the Henschel boom has made it look insultingly small by comparison. I must express, however, the greatest respect for a gentleman who can ride a hobby so regally as this Boston banker, Higginson, has done; though it is not generally known here that he has provided for the musical interests of Boston, against the time when he cannot look after them in person, by establishing a fund of $1,000,000, at least, so a friend of his says."

ONE OF THE FIRST ACTS OF HENSCHEL

was to take Mr. Listemann away from the Philharmonic to lead his violin, and to issue an order that no member of the Symphony orchestra could play under the baton of any other conductor. The majority of the musicians, however, being members of the Germania, refused to abandon the Philharmonic, Harvard, Handel and Haydn, and other societies whose work they had monopolized for so many years, and as a sufficient number of trained musicians could not be had at a short notice and at the prices offered, the autocrat had to submit to reason and common sense. He retaliated, however, by introducing a number of young Americans into the orchestra, some of whom were better performers than many of the "old stagers." His financial patron gave out that his orchestra was intended to develop native talent and to encourage the study of music as a profession as well as an art. The success of Mr. Higginson's venture was immediate in popular favor and in establishing a solid foundation for the speedy control of all orchestral work in the city of Boston and its vicinity. The Harvard society was forced to give up the ghost in despair the very first season. The Philharmonic was charitably permitted to languish because its new conductor, being only a pianist, was no better than the singer, and equally subject to personal and professional ridicule, criticism and censure, so that there was no great fear of jealousy necessary or apparent. The second season, when the veteran Zerrahn was chosen conductor of the Philharmonic, Henschel became more seriously alarmed. He did not dare to allow the majority of his orchestra play under his direction one night and under that of Zerrahn the next; the difference in conductor would be too marked, and he refused to be the subject of invidious comparison. His protection was in discharging as many of the Germania men as he was able to replace with new importations. The coming season will almost, if not quite, complete the plans as originally designed. The dilettante conductor has been sent to Europe to pick up enough impetuous German musicians to take the places of those who remained loyal to rival organizations as well as of the young Americans who were to be so carefully fostered and educated by our so-called musical benefactor, although they are superior to many of the favorites and lickspittles who have been reëngaged. In other words, Mr. Henschel will soon have a German band absolutely under his personal control, no member of which will be suffered to play for any other organization or under any other conductor, whether he be good, bad or indifferent. When we consider that Music Hall is now under the control of Mr. Higginson, and good nights are never given to rival attractions, we can readily understand that he has determined to get rid of the great organ, so as to enlarge the seating capacity, and obtain more money for the space occupied, without much reference to the veneration and sentiment attached to its history and the equity of those who contributed thousands of dollars to purchase it for the glory of their city. It looks very much as though Mr. Higginson has really gone into

A MUSICAL SPECULATION

rather than a philanthropic contribution, and unless there should be a radical change in public opinion, he will eventually not only control the entire musical interests of Boston, but effectually impair the livelihood of hundreds of our resident musicians by the importation of great numbers of mercenaries. With a view to counteract the danger of such a monopoly, it behooves us to protect our own citizens against any combination of capital and personal vanity that may be wielded to their injury. The New England Conservatory of Music is one means, and at the present time is perhaps the most available. If we grant enough land a new public hall will be built immediately; the "big organ" that Mr. Higginson thinks has had its day and served its purpose will be provided for and cherished by friendly hands and be kept in the city of Boston, in accordance with popular sentiment. As the Conservatory is a local institution, and necessarily supported by a native population, it cannot but be American in its instincts and in its teachings as against money bags, snobbery and sham magnanimity. My own ideas are better expressed by the society paper already quoted from, as follows:

"And now it is pretty generally understood that one object of Henschel's visit to Europe is to hire German musicians for next season. I understand that the rival orchestra, the one whose interests have really been most injured by this new scheme—the Philharmonic—will next season try to make a boom by using the Conservatory hall, into which they hope to have the big organ fixed by that time, and engaging the musicians of Boston repute whom the Henschel orchestra scheme has either discarded or by its conditions forced to resign. I don't know how the thing will work. If Boston were a town of the local pride it was once reputed to have been, the Philharmonic boom would be assured beforehand; but, as it is in reality a clique place, and Henschel is admired personally by the most powerful circle in town, the one about which the other circles revolve, delighted, apparently, to be allowed to sit in the same room with them even, and, as the Boston love of symphony is all bosh, it looks as if the professional prophets would have a hard time rallying the public from its present position. However, we shall see what we shall see. A man who starts in a position as independent as Henschel's, and carries things with a high hand all round, sometimes goes to pieces all at once, without any warning, like the one-horse shay:

—nothing first,
Just as bubbles do, when they burst."

On account of the absence of several members of the board, it was decided to postpone further consideration of this matter for one week.

THE MUSICAL QUESTION AGAIN.

It is not often that the city fathers are called upon to quit discussions of homely, practical questions and listen to one who pleads the cause of Polyhymnia. Yesterday afternoon, the question before the Aldermen being the order from the Council to refer to a joint special committee an order transferring to the New England Conservatory of Music certain land in the South Burying Ground for a concert hall, with instructions to ascertain its value, a motion to postpone further consideration of the matter for one week was made, and thereupon Alderman Haldeman spoke in advocacy of the cause of the petitioners, with a presentation of the motive of the opposition. His claim was that the objections came from a clique who desired to control the musical interests of the city, and to sustain this point he made his extraordinary speech—which is not, however, more extraordinary than the circumstance that Mr. Haldeman is an alderman at all. What we have to complain of is that Mr. Haldeman having enough of a good theme for a good speech should have disfigured it with the irrelevant personalities and petty and malignant gossip and tittle-tattle from "society papers" which he introduced. If Mr. Haldeman is no more accurate as a request on the part of the common council that should be more clearly defined. Let us for a moment follow the several stages of the petition that was presented to this board Feb. 10, and referred to the committee on public lands. On the 26th, the committee reported an order that the land be granted for the purposes specified for the sum of $1—that is, free of cost, and the board passed it by a unanimous vote. When presented to the other branch it was recommitted, returned to the board in a new draft, and March 1 was passed a second time. When again presented up stairs the councilman from ward 12 made an effort to have it indefinitely postponed. It laid over until the 22d, when it was recommitted for a second time, with instructions to give a public hearing. The committee reported the result of two hearings April 12, and for a third time recommended that the order ought to pass. Again it was laid over until May 17, when it was transferred to the mercies of a special committee, who are expected to go over the whole ground again in connection with side issues, never contemplated by the petitioners or this board. If it is the purpose of the common council to defeat the order, I hope it will so vote, in a manly way, rather than kill it off by dilatory tactics and pettifoggish subterfuges. If the members of that branch are possessed of more wisdom or knowledge of facts than this board, I would like to hear a good reason why not this, or any other unused or abandoned, graveyard, located in the midst of a populous city, should not be assigned to the uses of the community. I hold that, wherever the heirs and descendants of those whose bones lie mouldering beneath weeds and rubbish have so little reverence for their memory and who care so little for public opinion that they allow the grounds to become

AN OBNOXIOUS NUISANCE,

It is about time that they are given over to the occupancy of brick and mortar and added to our tax list. Is there any cogent reason why the unsavory graveyard under our very windows should not be covered by an extension of City Hall to Tremont street? Sentimentality might be satisfied by facing the front wall with the quaint old tombstones and slabs, where they would be securely preserved and at the same time easily seen and inspected by the antiquarian or the curious. Such a course would be infinitely more appropriate than planting them in floral rows like so many cabbages, as they now are, without any reference whatever to the graves they are supposed to indicate. The same may be said of the Granary burying ground, which would be equally unsightly and uncanny were it not for the industry of John Reardon to keep up a show of seasonable flowers at the expense of the city. Not a son, not a plant, not a cent of money is contributed by the wealthy descendants of the honored dead to make the place decent and harmonious with the surroundings of a great city. Graveyards, like men and obsolete structures, should pass away when they have served the purpose of their creation. The bones of the dead have no business to be in constant association with the flesh and blood of the living. The South burying ground is no longer used, it is uncared for by any one, and as an inevitable result it is unkempt, unwholesome, and were it not for its high wall would be an absolute eyesore and nuisance to the denizens of our city at large as it is to those in the immediate vicinity. The board of trustees of the New England Conservatory of Music have purchased the St. James Hotel property, and, after one year's experience, find that a large hall is necessary for educational and public purposes; so they come to the city of Boston and ask the fee to enough land, after having secured the rights of the tombs covering the same. What this corporation asks for is no more unreasonable than for the city to petition the state to provide land for a Public Library or the general government for Castle Island for park purposes, or for the School of Technology to seek similar assistance, nor is there any impropriety in all the several requests being granted. The New England Conservatory of Music has been one of our most popular educational institutions for fully 18 years, without having asked or received a dollar in the way of assistance from the city, and during that period upward of 30,000 pupils have passed through its various courses of instruction. The last year some 2000 have been in attendance, representing 38 states, 6 provinces, 2 territories and 4 countries. These people expend fully $300,000 per annum in our city in various ways. As some

MALICIOUSLY ADVERSE STORIES

have been industriously circulated among members of the city government by interested parties, it may be well to give the figures upon which the estimate is based:

Of the 1300 students now in attendance, there are about 600 living in the permanent home whose board will average $3 per week for 42 weeks.....$151,000
1300 average tuition, $50 per term, 4 terms... 260,000
Rent of 300 pianos at $15 per quarter..... 18,000
Books, music, concerts, lectures, clothing and incidental expenses, say, $60 per annum.... 78,000
Total.....$507,000

This will show pretty conclusively what this institution has accomplished in the way of financial prosperity, by industry and intelligent perseverance on the part of the management; and, as the facts have been fully stated to the city council, we may well wonder why there should be so much hostility to granting such a reasonable request. I have a theory that is plausible, if not strictly correct, as to the true inwardness of this carefully organized opposition to increasing the importance and stability of the Conservatory of Music. To be properly understood, I must burden you with a hurried retrospect of our musical situation. New England has inherited a musical taste and a musical education from its Puritan ancestors. At first it was of a psalm-singing character. Not only were singing schools about the only recreation the rural population were allowed to indulge in, but the Yankee singing master permeated the land to the South and West. Gradually Boston became the source of various choral societies of the highest standard, but instrumental and orchestral work grew very slowly. In the year 1848 two dozen young musicians left Berlin and came to America as the Germania orchestra. After continued tribulations in various cities, they abandoned their organization and each other, to scatter and establish themselves where best they could. In 1854 a few of them settled permanently in Boston, and became the nucleus of our local Germania, that furnished the means for thorough symphony work. Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the original "first flute," soon drifted into a superior chorus leader and an orchestra conductor, and holds the front rank in each at the present time. The next step forward was the purchase of the "big organ," the only element yet necessary to produce the greatest works of the greatest masters beyond anything of the kind in America. Then it was that the city of Boston justly claimed her proud position as the musical centre of the new world. For 25 years or more the Germania orchestra managed to hold a close monopoly of their peculiar line of business. It was only upon great or special occasions, when an unusually large number of musicians was required, that any one but a German was allowed to enter their jealously guarded province. One of the best violinists in Boston was kept out of the symphony concerts for years for the reason that he happened to be an Englishman, and then only admitted because his service

COULD NOT BE DISPENSED WITH.

So with musicians of Irish descent, but to a more exaggerated extent. The only field open to native Americans, or descendants of other nationalities than the German States, were military bands, theatre orchestras, dances and miscellaneous jobs. The Germania orchestra, during these years of supremacy, changed considerably. Many of the old members retired and new importations succeeded them and their prejudices against interlopers until a general indication of decay and lack of prosperity was apparent. This deterioration and disintegration were hastened by a radical change in the popular taste or fashion that introduced musical features into the long-established lecture courses, which cheapened the value of them to such an extent that a legitimate concert of the highest grade would not draw an audience of sufficient size to warrant the cost unless some famous soloist was announced in connection with some popular attraction. In fact it became common to send to New York for Theodore Thomas and his orchestra to give our people symphony concerts. About five years ago Mr. A. P. Peck, with some of the more enterprising members of the Germania, got up a little enthusiasm, and organized the Philharmonic Society, on a cooperative basis, with Mr. Bernard Listemann as conductor, so as to keep enough competent musicians together to supply demands for work of a standard character without having to send to New York or elsewhere for talent. This was the situation three years ago, when a musical and social sensation was created by the formal announcement that a new organization, to be called the Boston Symphony orchestra, would be established and financially supported by a wealthy banker, with a German concert singer by the name of Henschel as his conductor. The story has already been told by one of our society papers, as follows:

"A certain lady of great refinement—a beauty of real musical feeling, a niece of a gentleman in high standing, and a social favorite—went abroad to finish her education, in the course of which she fell under the instruction of a German artist in London, who was musical instructor to Princess Louise, and I don't know whom else of royal blood. German artist falls in love with American beauty; marries her; is at once transported right into the heart of Boston's culture. Result—millionaire banker interested; enthusiastically champions the cause of music; determines to ride a pet hobby; purchases the big hall of which Boston has been so proud; engages German artist to conduct an orchestra, at the phenomenal salary of $10,000. Consider on it, and realize that the sum is more to his conductorship than it even looks to you, because in der faderland they don't pay such salaries. They live in a world of art over there, such as is stilled here in no time; it positively cannot live in this land of result." * * * "Of that salary—notice the New York Choral Society offered Max Bruch $3000. I suppose that is a very fair offer; but the Henschel boom has made it look insultingly small by comparison. I must express, however, the greatest respect for a gentleman who can ride a hobby so regally as this Boston banker, Higginson, has done; though it is not generally known here that he has provided for the musical interests of Boston, against the time when he cannot look after them in person, by establishing a fund of $1,000,000, at least, so a friend of his says."

ONE OF THE FIRST ACTS OF HENSCHTEL

was to take Mr. Listemann away from the Philharmonic to lead his violins, and to issue an order that no member of the Symphony orchestra could play under the baton of any other conductor. The majority of the musicians, however, being members of the Germania, refused to abandon the Philharmonic, Harvard, Handel and Haydn, and other societies whose work they had monopolized for so many years, and as a sufficient number of trained musicians could not be had at a short notice and at the prices offered, the autocrat had to submit to reason and common sense. He retaliated, however, by introducing a number of young Americans into the orchestra, some of whom were better performers than many of the "old stagers." His financial patron gave out that his orchestra was intended to develop native talent and to encourage the study of music as a profession as well as an art. The success of Mr. Higginson's venture was immediate in popular favor and in establishing a solid foundation for the speedy control of all orchestral work in the city of Boston and its vicinity. The Harvard society was forced to give up the ghost in despair the very first season. The Philharmonic was charitably permitted to languish because its new conductor, being only a pianist, was no better than the singer, and equally subject to personal and professional ridicule, criticism and censure, so that there was no great fear or jealousy necessary or apparent. The second season, when the veteran Zerrahn was chosen conductor of the Philharmonic, Henschel became more seriously alarmed. He did not dare to allow the majority of his orchestra play under his direction one night and under that of Zerrahn the next; the difference in conductor would be too marked, and he refused to be the subject of invidious comparison. His protection was in discharging as many of the Germania men as he was able to replace with new importations. The coming season will almost, if not quite, complete the plans as originally designed. The dilettante conductor has been sent to Europe to pick up enough impecunious German musicians to take the places of those who remained loyal to rival organizations as well as of the young Americans who were to be so carefully fostered and educated by our so-called musical benefactor, although they are superior to many of the favorites and lickspittles who have been reengaged. In other words, Mr. Henschel will soon have a German band absolutely under his personal control, no member of which will be suffered to play for any other organization or under any other conductor, whether he be good, bad or indifferent. When we consider that Music Hall is now under the control of Mr. Higginson, and good nights are never given to rival attractions, we can readily understand that he has determined to get rid of the great organ, so as to enlarge the seating capacity, and obtain more money for the space occupied, without much reference to the veneration and sentiment attached to its history and the equity of those who contributed thousands of dollars to purchase it for the glory of their city. It looks very much as though Mr. Higginson has really gone into

A MUSICAL SPECULATION

rather than a philanthropic contribution, and unless there should be a radical change in public opinion, he will eventually not only control the entire musical interests of Boston, but effectually impair the livelihood of hundreds of our resident musicians by the importation of great numbers of mercenaries. With a view to counteract the danger of such a monopoly, it behooves us to protect our own citizens against any combination of capital and personal vanity that may be wielded to their injury. The New England Conservatory of Music is one means, and at the present time is perhaps the most available. If we grant enough land a new public hall will be built immediately; the "big organ" that Mr. Higginson thinks has had its day and served its purpose will be provided for and cherished by friendly hands and be kept in the city of Boston, in accordance with popular sentiment. As the Conservatory is a local institution, and necessarily supported by a native population, it cannot but be American in its instincts and in its teachings as against money bags, snobbery and sham magnanimity. My own ideas are better expressed by the society paper already quoted from, as follows:

"And now it is pretty generally understood that one object of Henschel's visit to Europe is to hire German musicians for next season. I understand that the rival orchestra, the one whose interests have really been most injured by this new scheme—the Philharmonic—will next season try to make a boom by using the Conservatory hall, into which they hope to have the big organ fixed by that time, and engaging the musicians of Boston repute whom the Henschel orchestra scheme has either discarded or by its conditions forced to resign. I don't know how the thing will work. If Boston were a town of the local pride it was once reputed to have been, the Philharmonic boom would be assured beforehand; but, as it is in reality a cliquey place, and Henschel is admired personally by the most powerful circle in town, the one about which the other circles revolve, delighted, apparently, to be allowed to sit in the same room with them even, and, as the Boston love of symphony is all bosh, it looks as if the professional prophets would have a hard time rallying the public from its present position. However, we shall see what we shall see. A man who starts in a position as independent as Henschel's, and carries things with a high hand all round, sometimes goes to pieces all at once, without any warning, like the one-horse shay:

"—nothing first,
Just as bubbles do, when they burst."

On account of the absence of several members of the board, it was decided to postpone further consideration of this matter for one week.

THE MUSICAL QUESTION AGAIN.

It is not often that the city fathers are called upon to quit discussions of homely, practical questions and listen to one who pleads the cause of Polyhymnia. Yesterday afternoon, the question before the Aldermen being the order from the Council to refer to a joint special committee an order transferring to the New England Conservatory of Music certain land in the South Burying Ground for a concert hall, with instructions to ascertain its value, a motion to postpone further consideration of the matter for one week was made, and thereupon Alderman Haldeman spoke in advocacy of the cause of the petitioners, with a presentation of the motive of the opposition. His claim was that the objections came from a clique who desired to control the musical interests of the city, and to sustain this point he made his extraordinary speech—which is not, however, more extraordinary than the circumstance that Mr. Haldeman is an alderman at all. What we have to complain of is that Mr. Haldeman having enough of a good theme for a good speech should have disfigured it with the irrelevant personalities and petty and malignant gossip and tittle-tattle from "society papers" which he introduced. If Mr. Haldeman is no more accurate as a prophet than he is as an historian, then none of the dreadful things he denounces as purposed by Mr. Higginson and Mr. Henschel will come to pass.

The burden of Mr. Haldeman's rattling diatribe is that the interests of local musical art are threatened with the control of a money-making monopoly. This is hardly worthy of notice, but it is evident to whoever has studied the progress of affairs that a revolution is indeed under way in Boston musical matters. The old traditional system of management by committee is being pushed hard by the plan of management by a single head. Mr. Higginson avows with a characteristic frankness and straightforwardness that a main purpose with him is to be rid of squabbling music committees. Anybody who has had any experience in the old system knows well enough what pains and perils there are to be encountered by every large musical enterprise in the domestic quarrels of its managers. But most of the workers in our existing musical organizations sincerely dread that with the supplanting of the time-honored volunteer and public-spirited committee work by purely business and individual enterprise will come musical stagnation, indifference and decline in a few years. It is not in the nature of things, the alarmists argue, that one man, or even a pair of men, can exercise a truly catholic control of art affairs. It is pointed out that the development and sound growth of musical taste in Boston has been due to the labors in a common field of many men of many minds. And these labors, it should never be forgotten, have been ungrudgingly rendered without pay and with no other motive than to advance the cause of music. In fact, had the services of many gentlemen who have been conspicuous in our musical history for the past half-century or more been recompensed with money, concerts at the prices which have been current here would have been impossible.

There is and ought to be a generous admiration for the promoter of a scheme which provides good concerts of a high order of music at a low price. But, as that price is known to be unremunerative, the praisers of the old way may be pardoned for looking even this splendid gift horse in the mouth with rueful imaginings as to the future. It is not in the forecasting Yankee nature to be content simply with present enjoyment. If it be comfortable for the brilliant audiences that attend Mr. Higginson's symphony concert to accept the luxurious seats at the sumptuous musical feast for fifty cents, when they know that he is to be enormously out of pocket at the end of the season, it should not be comfortable to reflect what would be the consequences were Mr. Higginson to cease making this sacrifice after the Philharmonic and perhaps the Handel and Haydn have followed the Harvard Musical Association into retirement. But before that evil day, if it be true that Mr. Higginson has really set aside $500,000, as reported, for a fund the income of which he is prepared to sink for a noble end of art cherished from his youth, he will probably have satisfied himself from the experiment now in progress whether to drop the grand project or to dedicate the proposed fund to the public, and let the public be aware and assured of it. This, at all events, would silence the cavil that the future is made insecure by this undertaking. Transcript

The breaking out of the musical war in the board of aldermen was one of the funny features of the city hall proceedings of the week. The mixing of music with politics was the last thing to be expected from the present set in the city hall. Alderman Haldeman who took up the cudgels against the Higginson-Henschel movement, in the interest of the conservatory of music which wants to get a piece of the old South-end burial ground from the city to build its music hall which is to receive the big organ from the present down-town Music hall,—is the democratic alderman who sometime ago let himself out against Mayor Palmer for the latter's action on the junketing business. The warring musical cliques, much as they love war, do not appear to welcome the aid of the politicians, but seem most disposed to fight out their battles among themselves. There are several opinions about the progress of the Higginson-Henschel enterprise. Some, who do not take any special interest in the contests between the cliques, view it with uneasiness when they see the effect it has on the Harvard musical and other old organizations. It is hoped by them that it may succeed in establishing a permanent orchestra without crushing out the other organizations. The next season Henschel will have his orchestra more firmly in his control than in past seasons, through the importation of musicians from abroad; and the scheme will be enlarged by the introduction of concerts with a chorus of mixed voices. These concerts are to be given in addition to the regular orchestral season concerts.—The late festival of the Handel and Haydn society was pecuniarily unsuccessful. The deficit was $5000 and the subscribers of the guaranty fund are assessed 10 per cent. The previous triennial showed a gain of $1200. The conductors of the enterprise are disappointed over this feature of the festival, though they regard it as artistically satisfactory.

MR. HALDEMAN'S STATEMENTS.

Upon being asked if he had anything to say in relation to the statements contained in the speech of Alderman Haldeman before the board on Monday evening, Mr. Henry L. Higginson said that he saw no occasion to make any reply. Mr. Georg Henschel is in Europe.

Close upon the end of the season though it be, the vigorous attack made by Alderman Haldeman the other day upon the Higginson monopoly of music party has caused a great stir. While a good many people think the alderman was somewhat too sweeping in his censure, it is maintained on the other and that he told a good many solid truths which needed to be impressed on the public. There is a great deal of cant and humbug in much of the professions, as well as the practice of those who seek to be considered as in a special sense the patrons of musical culture in the modern Athens. For those who oppose the removal of the great organ from Music Hall on the ground that this is in violation of the implied agreement at the time when the instrument was purchased, only respect can be felt. But gentlemen who in the very strongest exemplification of the "dog-in-the-manger" policy seek to prevent a worthy institution from entering the musical field must expect to be criticized, and very sharply too. Major Haldeman's expose of a scheme, largely due to absurd jealousies, will no doubt do much to "clear the atmosphere," and it is to be hoped that the New England Conservatory may receive permission from the city to take the land it needs, in order to provide for the famous organ a hall worthy its occupancy, where it will be cared for as so famous and valuable an instrument should be.

BOSTON.

APRIL 2.—The Boston Symphony Concerts have closed in a blaze of glory. The last concert, on Saturday night, partook of the nature of a solemn celebration. There was nothing light upon the programme. Mendelssohn's St. Paul overture, "A Te Deum," by Henschel, and Beethoven's 9th symphony constituted the list. The overture went grandly with the full orchestra and organ part, the latter giving especial dignity to the climax. The "Te Deum" is one of Henschel's greatest works. It has nobility of thought, and is singable music, a fact which was emphasized by its being brought in contrast with the unsingable Beethoven work. It has a decided leaning towards strong contrasts, leaping frequently from f to pp; in fact, the closing cadence consists of just such an effect.

It has some touches of Mendelssohn's style here and there. In fact there is considerable of Mendelssohn in Mr. Henschel. May he become as good a conductor as Mendelssohn was.

The ninth symphony showed the improvement of both leader and orchestra this season. The instrumental portion was well given almost throughout. The only prominent fault was that the second theme of the wood-wind, in the Scherzo, was drowned out by the strings. One pleasant change was the placing of the contra-basses at the back of the orchestra, where they ought to be. It is safe to say, had they been in their usual positions, in front, their important recitative and the unison theme of the finale would have been spoiled. As it was, they had just the requisite mellow quality, and had their recitative been but a little slower, it would have been perfect. I cannot say a great deal for the vocal part, save that it was better than last season. It is, and ever will remain, unsingable, the skips of the bass and the screams of the sopranos in "High Among the Star Pavilions" continually reminding one of the fact that the singers were straining to their utmost. Of the soloists Mr. Jules Jordan was the best. Mr. Cirillo used his voice also like a true artist, but portions of the work seemed out of his register.

Misses von Arnheim and Edmonds seemed timid and nervous, and did not allow their voices to ring out triumphantly, as Beethoven intended. But, on the whole, I can say that the performance was a worthy one, and the reseating of some of the orchestra, and the use of a score by the conductor, instead of trusting to his memory, were points of much improvement.

The London World thus discourses of Mr. Georg Henschel: His voice, which always was strong and rough, has not lost all its coarseness. But he knows how to sing. He knows, in fact, too many things. He played the piano in concert, he led in Boston an orchestra, as on one occasion he did here, and he sings. This forms a kind of universal genius who rarely do good. That Mr. Henschel knows how to conduct, and that he does play the piano well, cannot be a reproach to him; but his anxiety to show all the silk linings of his sleeves reminds one of those country girls who, when they come to London, can never wear brooches, pins and bracelets enough, and are quite capable of putting on a jacket or shawl, though the weather be very warm, only to exhibit all their property. June 1883 prophet than he is as an historian, then none of the dreadful things he denounces as purposed by Mr. Higginson and Mr. Henschel will come to pass.

262

The burden of Mr. Haldeman's rattling diatribe is that the interests of local musical art are threatened with the control of a money-making monopoly. This is hardly worthy of notice, but it is evident to whoever has studied the progress of affairs that a revolution is indeed under way in Boston musical matters. The old traditional system of management by committee is being pushed hard by the plan of management by a single head. Mr. Higginson avows with a characteristic frankness and straightforwardness that a main purpose with him is to be rid of squabbling music committees. Anybody who has had any experience in the old system knows well enough what pains and perils there are to be encountered by every large musical enterprise in the domestic quarrels of its managers. But most of the workers in our existing musical organizations sincerely dread that with the supplanting of the time-honored volunteer and public-spirited committee work by purely business and individual enterprise will come musical stagnation, indifference and decline in a few years. It is not in the nature of things, the alarmists argue, that one man, or even a pair of men, can exercise a truly catholic control of art affairs. It is pointed out that the development and sound growth of musical taste in Boston has been due to the labors in a common field of many men of many minds. And these labors, it should never be forgotten, have been ungrudgingly rendered without pay and with no other motive than to advance the cause of music. In fact, had the services of many gentlemen who have been conspicuous in our musical history for the past half-century or more been recompensed with money, concerts at the prices which have been current here would have been impossible.

There is and ought to be a generous admiration for the promoter of a scheme which provides good concerts of a high order of music at a low price. But, as that price is known to be unremunerative, the praisers of the old way may be pardoned for looking even this splendid gift horse in the mouth with rueful imaginings as to the future. It is not in the forecasting Yankee nature to be content simply with present enjoyment. If it be comfortable for the brilliant audiences that attend Mr. Higginson's symphony concert to accept the luxurious seats at the sumptuous musical feast for fifty cents, when they know that he is to be enormously out of pocket at the end of the season, it should not be comfortable to reflect what would be the consequences were Mr. Higginson to cease making this sacrifice after the Philharmonic and perhaps the Handel and Haydn have followed the Harvard Musical Association into retirement. But before that evil day, if it be true that Mr. Higginson has really set aside $500,000, as reported, for a fund the income of which he is prepared to sink for a noble end of art cherished from his youth, he will probably have satisfied himself from the experiment now in progress whether to drop the grand project or to dedicate the proposed fund to the public, and let the public be aware and assured of it. This, at all events, would silence the cavil that the future is made insecure by this undertaking. Transcript

The breaking out of the musical war in the board of aldermen was one of the funny features of the city hall proceedings of the week. The mixing of music with politics was the last thing to be expected from the present set in the city hall. Alderman Haldeman who took up the cudgels against the Higginson-Henschel movement, in the interest of the conservatory of music which wants to get a piece of the old South-end burial ground from the city to build its music hall which is to receive the big organ from the present down-town Music hall,—is the democratic alderman who sometime ago let himself out against Mayor Palmer for the latter's action on the junketing business. The warring musical cliques, much as they love war, do not appear to welcome the aid of the politicians, but seem most disposed to fight out their battles among themselves. There are several opinions about the progress of the Higginson-Henschel enterprise. Some, who do not take any special interest in the contests between the cliques, view it with uneasiness when they see the effect it has on the Harvard musical and other old organizations. It is hoped by them that it may succeed in establishing a permanent orchestra without crushing out the other organizations. The next season Henschel will have his orchestra more firmly in his control than in past seasons, through the importation of musicians from abroad; and the scheme will be enlarged by the introduction of concerts with a chorus of mixed voices. These concerts are to be given in addition to the regular orchestral season concerts.—The late festival of the Handel and Haydn society was pecuniarily unsuccessful. The deficit was $5000 and the subscribers of the guaranty fund are assessed 10 per cent. The previous triennial showed a gain of $1200. The conductors of the enterprise are disappointed over this feature of the festival, though they regard it as artistically satisfactory.

MR. HALDEMAN'S STATEMENTS.

Upon being asked if he had anything to say in relation to the statements contained in the speech of Alderman Haldeman before the board on Monday evening, Mr. Henry L. Higginson said that he saw no occasion to make any reply. Mr. George Henschel is in Europe.

Subj May 17, 93
Close upon the end of the season though it be, the vigorous attack made by Alderman Haldeman the other day upon the Higginson monopoly of music party has caused a great stir. While a good many people think the alderman was somewhat too sweeping in his censure, it is maintained on the other and that he told a good many solid truths which needed to be impressed on the public. There is a great deal of cant and humbug in much of the professions, as well as the practice of those who seek to be considered as in a special sense the patrons of musical culture in the modern Athens. For those who oppose the removal of the great organ from Music Hall on the ground that this is in violation of the implied agreement at the time when the instrument was purchased, only respect can be felt. But gentlemen who in the very strongest exemplification of the "dog-in-the-manger" policy seek to prevent a worthy institution from entering the musical field must expect to be criticised, and very sharply too. Major Haldeman's expose of a scheme, largely due to absurd jealousies, will no doubt do much to "clear the atmosphere," and it is to be hoped that the New England Conservatory may receive permission from the city to take the land it needs, in order to provide for the famous organ a hall worthy its occupancy, where it will be cared for as so famous and valuable an instrument should be.

BOSTON.

APRIL 2.—The Boston Symphony Concerts have closed in a blaze of glory. The last concert, on Saturday night, partook of the nature of a solemn celebration. There was nothing light upon the programme. Mendelssohn's St. Paul overture, "A Te Deum," by Henschel, and Beethoven's 9th symphony constituted the list. The overture went grandly with the full orchestra and organ part, the latter giving especial dignity to the climax. The "Te Deum" is one of Henschel's greatest works. It has nobility of thought, and is singable music, a fact which was emphasized by its being brought in contrast with the unsingable Beethoven work. It has a decided leaning towards strong contrasts, leaping frequently from ff to pp; in fact, the closing cadence consists of just such an effect.

It has some touches of Mendelssohn's style here and there. In fact there is considerable of Mendelssohn in Mr. Henschel. May he become as good a conductor as Mendelssohn was.

The ninth symphony showed the improvement of both leader and orchestra this season. The instrumental portion was well given almost throughout. The only prominent fault was that the second theme of the wood-wind, in the Scherzo, was drowned out by the strings. One pleasant change was the placing of the contra-basses at the back of the orchestra, where they ought to be. It is safe to say, had they been in their usual positions, in front, their important recitative and the unison theme of the finale would have been spoiled. As it was, they had just the requisite mellow quality, and had their recitative been but a little slower, it would have been perfect. I cannot say a great deal for the vocal part, save that it was better than last season. It is, and ever will remain, unsingable, the skips of the bass and the screams of the sopranos in "High Among the Star Pavilions" continually reminding one of the fact that the singers were straining to their utmost. Of the soloists Mr. Jules Jordan was the best. Mr. Cirillo used his voice also like a true artist, but portions of the work seemed out of his register.

Misses von Arnheim and Edmonds seemed timid and nervous, and did not allow their voices to ring out triumphantly, as Beethoven intended. But, on the whole, I can say that the performance was a worthy one, and the reseating of some of the orchestra, and the use of a score by the conductor, instead of trusting to his memory, were points of much improvement.

The London World thus discourses of Mr. George Henschel: His voice, which always was strong and rough, has not lost all its coarseness. But he knows how to sing. He knows, in fact, too many things. He played the piano in concert, he led in Boston an orchestra, as on one occasion he did here, and he sings. This forms a kind of universal genius who rarely do good. That Mr. Henschel knows how to conduct, and that he does play the piano well, cannot be a reproach to him; but his anxiety to show all the silk linings of his sleeves reminds one of those country girls who, when they come to London, can never wear brooches, pins and bracelets enough, and are quite capable of putting on a jacket or shawl, though the weather be very warm, only to exhibit all their property. June 1893

264

It will be remembered that a suit was instituted a few months ago in the supreme court, by Dr. J. Baxter Upham and others interested in the Music Hall organ, to restrain Mr. Henry L. Higginson and his associates from removing what has been familiarly called the "big organ" from the Music Hall. The basis of the suit was stated in full at the time, the claim being made that the Music Hall corporation had assumed a trust in allowing the organ to be set up in the hall under the circumstances and conditions attending that action. Since the suit was instituted many consultations have been had, in a friendly way, between the parties in interest, and a compromise has finally been effected, so that all legal proceedings have been stopped. The organ was purchased some months ago by Mr. William O. Grover of this city, with an intention of placing it in a hall which it is contemplated to build in the rear of the New England Conservatory of Music. Many unexpected delays have occurred in the completion of the scheme for this new hall, and this delay has been one of the factors both in instituting the suit as well as in bringing about its settlement. Those who acted in the matter of seeking to enjoin the removal were willing to permit a transfer of the instrument to a new auditorium, but were not willing to allow the organ to be taken down before its future location should be decided. It is now hoped that another year will see a new auditorium ready for the accommodation of the "big organ," and consequently an agreement has been reached between the two parties in interest. This agreement stipulates that Mr. Grover shall begin the removal of the organ on the 15th day of May, 1884, and have the instrument out of the main auditorium by or before the 1st day of July following, the Music Hall corporation agreeing, however, to furnish necessary storage for the pipes, etc., upon its premises during the summer months of next year. This arrangement delays the contemplated changes in the main auditorium until next season, but it affords an amicable settlement of what promised to be a family suit at law, in which the two parties in the issue would be made up from life-long friends and active workers in the cause of music in this city. The "big organ" will therefore continue to be one of the musical wonders of the city, and, as it will undoubtedly be largely improved in its mechanism, and be put in a hall constructed especially with a view to its accommodation, the result of the controversy promises to be advantageous in many ways.

Those Orchestra Contracts.

The issue between the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra and its members relative to the renewal of the contracts for their services for next season has been very generally discussed during the last few days, and, naturally enough, some misunderstandings have arisen in regard to the merits of the case. Briefly stated, the issue is this: For 20 weeks the members of the orchestra have received $6 each for 26 concerts, and $3 each for from three to five rehearsals (of three hours each) a week, their time being their own when not thus engaged. For next season the management, with a view of securing better results, demands the entire time of the musicians on Wednesday (day and evening), Thursday (day and evening), Friday (day) and Saturday (forenoon and evening), offering (from Oct. 1, 1882, to April 1, 1883) from $21 to $35 per week for such service. In making the offer for next season, the management has departed from the custom of former years, and rated the several musicians according to their relative value as members of the orchestra, instead of offering a uniform sum for each and every man. In doing this the management appears to have but recognized the universal law of supply and demand, which will not stop short in its operations merely because it affects the interests of the musicians engaged in this orchestra. A mistaken idea has been given in regard to the position taken by the orchestra in this matter. It has not decided, as a body, to decline the offer made, but on the contrary quite a number of its members have signified their willingness to continue their services at the prices offered, and still others admit that it is high time that a discrimination should be made between the value of the several classes of musicians in an orchestra. Naturally some of the members of the organization complain of the discrimination made, but, if certain instrumental players are more in demand than others, there appear to be no good reason why some discrimination should not be made. It appears to be the desire of the management to contract directly with every member of the orchestra for his individual services, and the only business basis upon which such a contract can be made is the value of the services of each individual to the orchestra. There is nothing compulsory about the contracts. The musicians have a perfect right to hold their services for a higher bid if they so elect, and, on the other side, the management has a perfect right to secure the orchestra for next season at prices which are fair, just and equitable for the services demanded. The way in which the concerts of this orchestra have been maintained thus far should prevent any fair-minded person from imputing other than liberal, public-spirited intentions to its management; and would be difficult to find another scheme of concerts the world over with the reliable financial backing possessed by those of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The following letter presents a different view of this issue:

To the Editor of the Herald: I think there is a side to this matter concerning the players forming the Boston Symphony orchestra, which ought to be made public in justice to the musicians themselves, and in explanation of the position in which other concert-giving organizations would have been placed if the players had accepted the proposition made them. It is a matter of vital importance to the musicians, as well as to the societies which have employed them in the past, whether the movements of the former are to be so restricted that they cannot pursue their profession with profit to themselves, and continue their connection with the latter, as before the advent of Mr. Henschel, or whether they must submit to the ultimatum of the manager of the symphony concerts in order to prevent the possible importation of musicians to fill their places if they do not accept his proposition. From the conditions imposed it will be seen that the contracts are skillfully drawn, and that all the time of the players for the four days named is virtually absorbed. Mr. Higginson has the right to make this proposition, and there is no doubt but that, if its provisions could be carried out, the orchestra might be brought to a higher state of discipline and better results obtained. But, under the circumstances, it would be an arbitrary hold upon our local orchestra, that for several reasons should be deprecated by all interested in enterprises employing the services of an orchestra in this city.

The terms offered the players range from $21 to $35 per week, according to the conductor's idea of the value of their services to him. That is, he regards the second violin, viola, cello and bass players, if we understand rightly, as of less value in an orchestra than the first violins. The musicians feel this rating of their worth very keenly, for the players have always been accustomed to receive an equal sum for their services upon all occasions since the beginning of the efforts of the oldest member of the orchestra.

Then, again, the prices offered are much below the sums realized by the players during the six months named in the contract. Many of them are teachers, who can earn more than the above amounts in the four days absorbed by their orchestral duties, beside having their nights at their own disposal, enabling them to play for parties or in a theatre orchestra. The latter would net them $21 per week, with the privilege of accepting better engagements occasionally by sending a suitable substitute to the theatre. These would be reasons enough for them to refuse the terms proposed for next season. To their credit, however, they dwell more upon the fact that they will be deprived of the opportunity of playing for the various societies which have for so many years employed them at their concerts. The musicians regard this scheme, if carried out, as a sort of monopoly, which would tend to crush all other enterprises requiring an orchestra, or compel them to go to Mr. Henschel for assistance, who would become dictator as regards orchestral performances if they signed away their liberty to play under any one else than him.

They feel it their duty to stand by their former employers, who would be unable otherwise to carry on their established plans if they could engage players for rehearsals and concerts upon two days only in each week. It looks too much like their assisting Mr. Henschel to say, if you want a conductor and orchestra, you can have one by hiring me.

This, the musicians say, weighed as heavily in their minds as an argument against accepting the proposals made them as did the matter of their being obliged to be satisfied with a much less sum than they could easily realize independent of the Boston symphony concerts.

They feel that the manager of those concerts stands before the musical public in the light of a philanthropist, and they ought not to be expected to contribute toward the support of the concerts through binding themselves to play for less money than they can earn otherwise if not compelled to conform to the restrictions of the proposed contract.

The public must not think the musicians ungrateful if they do not accept an offer by which they would in most cases sacrifice one-half their income and leave their old employers, the Philharmonic Society, Harvard Musical Association, Apollo, Cecelia and Boylston

Sunday Herald
March 5, 1882 (?)
See Henschel's program

clubs out in the cold, allowing only the time-honored Handel and Haydn Society to exist through the permission of an orchestral autocrat, for such would Mr. Henschel be if the musicians had accepted the proposition offered them.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

264

It will be remembered that a suit was instituted a few months ago in the supreme court, by Dr. J. Baxter Upham and others interested in the Music Hall organ, to restrain Mr. Henry L. Higginson and his associates from removing what has been familiarly called the "big organ" from the Music Hall. The basis of the suit was stated in full at the time, the claim being made that the Music Hall corporation had assumed a trust in allowing the organ to be set up in the hall under the circumstances and conditions attending that action. Since the suit was instituted many consultations have been had, in a friendly way, between the parties in interest, and a compromise has finally been effected, so that all legal proceedings have been stopped. The organ was purchased some months ago by Mr. William O. Grover of this city, with an intention of placing it in a hall which it is contemplated to build in the rear of the New England Conservatory of Music. Many unexpected delays have occurred in the completion of the scheme for this new hall, and this delay has been one of the factors both in instituting the suit as well as in bringing about its settlement. Those who acted in the matter of seeking to enjoin the removal were willing to permit a transfer of the instrument to a new auditorium, but were not willing to allow the organ to be taken down before its future location should be decided. It is now hoped that another year will see a new auditorium ready for the accommodation of the "big organ," and consequently an agreement has been reached between the two parties in interest. This agreement stipulates that Mr. Grover shall begin the removal of the organ on the 15th day of May, 1884, and have the instrument out of the main auditorium by or before the 1st day of July following, the Music Hall corporation agreeing, however, to furnish necessary storage for the pipes, etc., upon its premises during the summer months of next year. This arrangement delays the contemplated changes in the main auditorium until next season, but it affords an amicable settlement of what promised to be a family suit at law, in which the two parties in the issue would be made up from life-long friends and active workers in the cause of music in this city. The "big organ" will therefore continue to be one of the musical wonders of the city, and, as it will undoubtedly be largely improved in its mechanism, and be put in a hall constructed especially with a view to its accommodation, the result of the controversy promises to be advantageous in many ways.

Those Orchestra Contracts.

The issue between the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra and its members relative to the renewal of the contracts for their services for next season has been very generally discussed during the last few days, and, naturally enough, some misunderstandings have arisen in regard to the merits of the case. Briefly stated, the issue is this: For 20 weeks the members of the orchestra have received $6 each for 26 concerts, and $3 each for from three to five rehearsals (of three hours each) a week, their time being their own when not thus engaged. For next season the management, with a view of securing better results, demands the entire time of the musicians on Wednesday (day and evening), Thursday (day and evening), Friday (day) and Saturday (forenoon and evening), offering (from Oct. 1, 1882, to April 1, 1883) from $21 to $35 per week for such service. In making the offer for next season, the management has departed from the custom of former years, and rated the several musicians according to their relative value as members of the orchestra, instead of offering a uniform sum for each and every man. In doing this the management appears to have but recognized the universal law of supply and demand, which will not stop short in its operations merely because it affects the interests of the musicians engaged in this orchestra. A mistaken idea has been given in regard to the position taken by the orchestra in this matter. It has not decided, as a body, to decline the offer made, but on the contrary quite a number of its members have signified their willingness to continue their services at the prices offered, and still others admit that it is high time that a discrimination should be made between the value of the several classes of musicians in an orchestra. Naturally some of the members of the organization complain of the discrimination made, but, if certain instrumental players are more in demand than others, there appear to be no good reason why some discrimination should not be made. It appears to be the desire of the management to contract directly with every member of the orchestra for his individual services, and the only business basis upon which such a contract can be made is the value of the services of each individual to the orchestra. There is nothing compulsory about the contracts. The musicians have a perfect right to hold their services for a higher bid if they so elect, and, on the other side, the management has a perfect right to secure the orchestra for next season at prices which are fair, just and equitable for the services demanded. The way in which the concerts of this orchestra have been maintained thus far should prevent any fair-minded person from imputing other than liberal, public-spirited intentions to its management; and it would be difficult to find another scheme of concerts the world over with the reliable financial backing possessed by those of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The following letter presents a different view of this issue:

To the Editor of the Herald: I think there is a side to this matter concerning the players forming the Boston Symphony orchestra, which ought to be made public in justice to the musicians themselves, and in explanation of the position in which other concert-giving organizations would have been placed if the players had accepted the proposition made them. It is a matter of vital importance to the musicians, as well as to the societies which have employed them in the past, whether the movements of the former are to be so restricted that they cannot pursue their profession with profit to themselves, and continue their connection with the latter, as before the advent of Mr. Henschel, or whether they must submit to the ultimatum of the manager of the symphony concerts in order to prevent the possible importation of musicians to fill their places if they do not accept his proposition. From the conditions imposed it will be seen that the contracts are skilfully drawn, and that all the time of the players for the four days named is virtually absorbed. Mr. Higginson has the right to make this proposition, and there is no doubt but that, if its provisions could be carried out, the orchestra might be brought to a higher state of discipline and better results obtained. But, under the circumstances, it would be an arbitrary hold upon our local orchestra, that for several reasons should be deprecated by all interested in enterprises employing the services of an orchestra in this city.

The terms offered the players range from $21 to $35 per week, according to the conductor's idea of the value of their services to him. That is, he regards the second violin, viola, cello and bass players, if we understand rightly, as of less value in an orchestra than the first violins. The musicians feel this rating of their worth very keenly, for the players have always been accustomed to receive an equal sum for their services upon all occasions since the beginning of the efforts of the oldest member of the orchestra.

Then, again, the prices offered are much below the sums realized by the players during the six months named in the contract. Many of them are teachers, who can earn more than the above amounts in the four days absorbed by their orchestral duties, beside having their nights at their own disposal, enabling them to play for parties or in a theatre orchestra. The latter would net them $21 per week, with the privilege of accepting better engagements occasionally by sending a suitable substitute to the theatre. These would be reasons enough for them to refuse the terms proposed for next season. To their credit, however, they dwell more upon the fact that they will be deprived of the opportunity of playing for the various societies which have for so many years employed them at their concerts. The musicians regard this scheme, if carried out, as a sort of monopoly, which would tend to crush all other enterprises requiring an orchestra, or compel them to go to Mr. Henschel for assistance, who would become dictator as regards orchestral performances if they signed away their liberty to play under any one else than him.

They feel it their duty to stand by their former employers, who would be unable otherwise to carry on their established plans if they could engage players for rehearsals and concerts upon two days only in each week. It looks too much like their assisting Mr. Henschel to say, if you want a conductor and orchestra, you can have one by hiring me.

This, the musicians say, weighed as heavily in their minds as an argument against accepting the proposals made them as did the matter of their being obliged to be satisfied with a much less sum than they could easily realize independent of the Boston symphony concerts.

They feel that the manager of those concerts stands before the musical public in the light of a philanthropist, and they ought not to be expected to contribute toward the support of the concerts through binding themselves to play for less money than they can earn otherwise if not compelled to conform to the restrictions of the proposed contract.

The public must not think the musicians ungrateful if they do not accept an offer by which they would in most cases sacrifice one-half their income and leave their old employers, the Philharmonic Society, Harvard Musical Association, Apollo, Cecilia and Boylston

Sunday Herald
March 5 1882 (?)
See Henschel's programms

clubs out in the cold, allowing only the time-honored Handel and Haydn Society to exist through the permission of an orchestral autocrat. For such would Mr. Henschel be if the musicians had accepted the proposition offered them.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

VOLUME 3

1883-1884

☆☆ M 125-5

Vol III

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION

GEORG HENSCHEL, AFTER PORTRAIT BY L. ALMA TADEMA.—[SEE PAGE 655.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1883 - 1884 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Johnson.

GEORG HENSCHEL, AFTER PORTRAIT BY L. ALMA TADEMA.—[SEE PAGE 655.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1883 - 1884 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. J. 1883-1884

*W. 125, 5. Vol 3
1881-1893
Allen A Brown
Aug 14 1894

12 Y.

Index

Composer	Title of work	Concert	Date	Soloists
Bach C. Ph. Em.	Rec. & Aria "Children of Israel in the Desert"	XX	Mich 1.84	Geo. Henschel
Bach J. S.	Savotte in B minor (Piano)	V	Nov 10.83	Arthur Foote
	Prelude in C major	"	"	"
	"My heart ever faithful"	VI	Nov 17.83	Miss Hattie Louise Simms
Bergquist W.	Overture to "Prometheus"	#	Oct 20.83
Bethoven	Symphonies Nos. 4, 24	II	Oct 20.83
	" 2 " 36	VI	Nov 17. "
	" 3 " 58	VIII	Dec 1. "
	" 4 " 60	X	" 15 "
	" 5 " 67	XIV	Jan 12.84
	" 6 " 68	XVIII	Feb 2 "
	" 7 " 92	XXII	Mich 8 "
	" 8 " 93	XXIII	" 15 "
	" 9 " 125 choral	XXIV	" 24 "	Mr Geo. Henschel Miss Louise Rollesagen Mr J. J. Toedt Mr Max Heinrich
	Turkish March from "The Ruin of Athens"	XII	Dec 29.83
	Concerto for Violin & Orch. op 61	XIII	Jan 5.84	Mr Louis Schindler Jr
	15 Variations in E flat op 35 (Piano)	XX	Feb 23.84	Carl Baermann
Bernetti W. S.	Concerto for Piano & Orch. in F minor op 4.	XVI	Jan 26.84	Ernst Perabo
	Song "To Chloe" with Piano	VIII	Dec 1.83	Miss Gertrude Franklin

Berlioz H. "Harold in Italy" op. 16	XIX	Feb 19. 83
"Le Bal" from Symp. Fantastique	XII	Dec 29. 83
Overture to "King Lear"	XIV	Jan 12. 84
Bizet Geo. "Roma" Suite No. 3	XVIII	Feb 9. 84
Boieldieu Ouv. "Le Calife de Bagdad"	VIII	Dec 1. 83
Brakms J. Symphonie No. 1. in C minor op 68	XII	Dec 29. 83
Tragic Overture op 81	X	Dec 15. 83
Concerto for Piano & Orchestra No 2 in B flat op 83	XIII	Feb 15. 84	B. J. Lang
Bruch, Max Prelude to "Loreley"	VI	Nov 17. 83
Scene from "Odyssey" Penelope Weaving	XIV	Jan 12. 84	Miss Louise Rottwagau
Chadwick G. W. Scherzo in F for orch.	XXII	Feb 8. 84
Cherubini Overture to "Medea"	III	Oct 27. 83
" " "Water Carrier"	XX	Feb 23. 84
Chopin F. Concerto Piano & orch No 2 in F minor	VII	Nov 24. 83	Miss Madeline Schiller
Rondo for two Pianos op 43	II	Oct 20. 83	Miss Mary E. O'Brien " Olga v. Radetzke
Polonaise in A flat for Piano	IX	Dec 8. 83	Miss Helen Hope Kirk
Ballade in F minor op 52 No 4	XI	" 22. "	Mr Geo. Magrath
" " in G minor: op 23	XVIII	Feb 9. 84	Mr Carl Faelken
Nocturne op 9 No. 2 arr for cello	XVII	Feb 2. 84	Mr Fritz Giese
Delibes Cortège de Bacchus from "Sylvia"	III	Oct 27. 83
Dupont A. Toccata de Concert	VII	Nov 24. 83

Drorak Ant. Symphonie in D op 60	III	Oct 27. 83
" " " "	IX	Dec 8. "
Ouv. "The Peasant a Rogue"	XXII	Feb 8. 84
Slavonic Dance No. 8	XX	Feb 23. "
Glinka M. J. "Kamarinskaja" for orch.	VI	Nov 17. 83
Gluck Ouv. "Iphigenia in Aulis"	XIII	Jan 5. 84
Garotte in a arr. for Piano by Brakms }	XVI	Jan 26. 84	Ernst Pernbo
Godard B. "Dance des Bohemiens" from "Le Passé"	XVII	Feb 2. 84
"Concert Romantique" for Violin & Orch. op 35	VI	Nov 17. 83	Mr M. Loeffler
Gounod Ch. "Entracte" "La Colombe"	I	Oct 13. 83
Ballet music from "La Reine de Saba"	IX	Dec 8. "
"Dance des Bacchantes" Philomena et Baccus	XXI	Feb 1. 84
Caravina from "La Reine de Saba"	XXII	" 8. "	Mr Humphrey Allen
Grieg Song "Forest Wanderings"	VIII	Dec 1. 83	Miss Gertrude Franklin
Grimm J. O. "Symphonie" in D minor: op 18	XX	Feb 23. 84
Haendel G. F. Horn Pipe in B flat	XXI	Feb 1. 84
Rec + Aria from "Xerxes"	I	Oct 13. 83	Miss Hope Glenn
Rec. + aria from "Judas Maccabeus"	X	Dec 15. "	Miss Marguerite Hall
Haydn Symphony in E (military)	IV	Nov 3. 83
Heuschel Geo. Serenade for strings op 23	XV	Jan 19. 83
Ballad for Violin & orch. 7 sharp minor:	XXI	Feb 1. 84	Bern. Listemann
"Adieu de l'hôte de l'Arabe" for voice and Piano	XII	Dec 29. 83	Mr Geo. Heuschel
Hiller F. Concerto Piano & orch. op 69 7* minor:	V	Nov 10. 83	Mr Arthur Forke

TIGHT BINDING

Hummel Concerto for Piano orch. op 89 in B minor XI Dec 22.83 Mr Geo. Magrath

Larson Ed. Song "When thy blue eyes are beaming" XXII Feb 8.84 Mrs Humphrey Allen

Leozt F. Piano Concerto no 2 in A XX Feb 23.84 Mr Carl Baermann
"Hungarian Rhapsodie" no 2 orch. XVI Jan 26. "
Etude in D flat major Piano V Nov 10.83 Arthur Focke
"Ricordanza" " VII " 24 " Miss Madeline Schiller Polonaise in E " XVIII Feb 9.84 Carl Faelten
Song "Du bist wie eine Blume" XIX Feb 16.84 Theo. J. Foedt

Luther, Martin "Chorale" Ein Feste Burg V Nov 10.83

Massenet "Entracte + Finale" Les Erinnyes XXII Feb 8.84

Mendelssohn - Symphony No 5 (Reformation) op 107 V Nov 10.83
Overture to "Athalia" VIII Dec 1. "
" in C op 101 XVII Feb 2.84
Nocturne from "Midsummer night Dream" III Oct 27.83

Mozart Symphony in E flat no 3 Br. etc. XVI Jan 26.84
Overture to "Titus" XI Dec 22.83
Concerto for 2 Pianos + orch. } II Oct 22. " Miss Mary O'Brien Kochel 365 " Olga von Radetzke
Concerto for Flute Harp + orch. } XVI Jan 12.84 E. M. Heindl Flute in C " A. Freygang Harp
Aria from "Le Flauto Magico" IV Nov 3.83 Miss Lillian Norton
Cavatina from "Le Nozze Figari" XII Dec 29.83 Mrs Georg Henschel

Müller-Berghaus. Romance for Cello VIII Dec 1.83 Herr Wilhelm Müller

Paine J.K. Symphony No 2. op 34 in A XXI Feb 1.84
Conducted by the Composer

Pergolesi Song "Nina" XIX Feb 16.84 Theo. J. Foedt

Ponchielli Romanza from "La Gioconda" XV Jan 19.84 Miss Emily Wimsatt

Popper D. Papillon for Cello XVII Feb 2.84 Fritz Giese

Raff J. Symphony No 11. op 214 "Winter" XV Jan 19.84
Adagio from Suite op 101 IV Nov 3.83
Concerto for Piano + Orch. op 185 XVIII Feb 9.84 Carl Faelten

Reinecke C. Song "Greeting to the Woods" XXII Feb 8.84 Mrs Humphrey Allen
" " " " " " " "
" " " " " " " "
Vidui ob. Mr B. Listemann

Rheinberger J. Idyll in F op 6 for Piano XVI Jan 26.84 Ernst Perabo

Rietz Jul. Concert Overture in A op 7. IV Nov 3.83

Rossini Aria "Barber of Seville" IV Nov 3.83 Miss Lillian Norton

Rubinstein Symphony No 2 op 42. Ocean I Oct 13.83
Song "The Lark" XIX Feb 16.84 Theo. J. Foedt

Saint-Saens "La Jeunesse d'Hercule" orch. II Oct 20.83
Ballet Music "Henry VIII" " I Dec 22. "
" " " " " " " "
Concerto Piano + Orch no 2. op 22 XIX Dec 8.83 Miss Helen Hopewell
Intro. + Rondo for Violin + orch. } op 28 X Dec 15.83 Alfred de Sève
Rec. + air "Samson et Dalila" XV Jan 19.84 Miss Emily Wimsatt

Schubert Symphony in B minor XVIII Feb 9.84
Andante from the "Tragic Symphony" XXIII Feb 15. "
Overture in the Italian Style XII Dec 29.83
Song "Liebesbotschaft" III Oct 27.83 Max Heinrich
" " " " " " " "

TIGHT BINDING

8

Song 'The Young Nun'	X	Dec 10. 83	Miss Marguerite Hall
" 'Der Tod und das Mädchen'	XIV	Jan 12. 84	" Louise Rollwagen
Schubert-Liszt. March in B minor orch.	I	Oct 13. 83
"Bacchante" Auf den Wassern Pianos	XVI	Jan 26. 84	Ernest Perabo
Schumann - Symphony in E flat no 3. op 97	VII	Nov 24. 83
Musical to "Mangled" complete op 115	XXIV	Feb 2. 84	Miss Geo Heuschel
Howard M. Pickens, Reader			Miss Louise Rollwagen
			Theo. J. Toedt
			Max Heinrich
"Warum" for Pianos	IX	Dec 8. 83	Miss Helen Hope Kirk
"Grillen"	"	"	"
"Romance" "a Vision" "Aria"	XXIII	Feb 5. 84	B. J. Lang
"Ländler" The Elf	"	"	"
Song "Aus alten Märschen" with Pianos	XIV	Jan 12. 84	Miss Louise Rollwagen
Spohr L. Overture to "Jessonda"	VII	Nov 24. 83
Rec. + aria from "Faust"	III	Oct 27. "	Max Heinrich
Scene + Aria op 71	VIII	Dec 1. "	Miss Gertrude Franklin
Spontini Overture to "Olympia"	XXI	Jan 26. 84
Sullivan A.S. Rec. + aria from "The Martyr of Antioch"	I	Oct 13. 83	Miss Hope Glenn
Three Songs from "The Willows"	VI	Nov 17. "	Miss Hattie Louise Simms
Svensson J.S. Symphony in B flat no. 2 op 15	XIII	Jan 5. 84
Toldmann Symphony No 2 in B flat op 53	XI	Dec 22. 83
Concerts for 'Cello with orch. op 33	XVII	Feb 2. 84	Fritz Giese
Wagner R. 'Kaiser marsch' orch.	V	Nov 10. 83
"Song of the Rhine Daughter" Götterdämmerung orch.	VII	" 27 "
Overture "Meistersinger"	I	Dec 15. "
Prelude } Parsifal	XXIX	Feb 16. 84
Good Friday's Spell }
March from "Tannhäuser" orch.	XV	Jan 19. 84

"Crade Song" with Pianos	VIII	Dec 1. 83	Miss Gertrude Franklin
Walters Preis-Lied 'Meistersinger'	XXIX	Feb 16. 84	Theo. J. Toedt
'Hans Sachs Monologue'	XXI	Feb 1. "	Georg Heuschel

Hebrew C. M. v. Concertino in E flat for Clarinet } op 26. } XXVII Jan 5. 84 E. Strasser

Composers with number of works given

Bach C. Ph. Em.	1
Bach J. S.	3
Baquir W.	1
Beethoven	12
Bennett W. S.	2
Berlioz H.	3
Bizet Geo.	1
Boieldieu	1
Brahms J.	3
Brech, Max	2
Chadwick J. W.	1
Cherubini	2
Chopin F.	6
Delibes L.	1
Dupont A.	1
Dvorak Ant.	3
Glinka M. J.	1
Gluck	2
Godard B.	2
Gounod C.	4
Grieg Ed.	1
Grimm J. O.	1
Haendel	3
Haydn	1
Heuschel Geo.	3
Hillev F.	1
Hummel	1
Larsen Ed.	1

Liszt F.	6
Luther, Martin	1
Marsenet J.	1
Mendelssohn	4
Mozart	6
Müller - Berghaus	1
Pamie J. K.	1
Pergolèse	1
Ponchielli	1
Poppes D.	1
Raff J.	3
Reinecke C.	2
Rheinberger J.	1
Rietz Jul.	1
Rossini	1
Rubinstein A.	2
Saint-Saens	5
Schubert F.	7
Schubert - Liszt	2
Schumann R.	6
Spohr L.	3
Spontini	1
Sullivan A. S.	2
Svensden J. S.	1
Tollmann R.	2
Wagner R.	8
Weber C. M. W.	1

Soloists : With dates of Appearances

Piano

Baermann, Carl	Feb. 23. 84
Faeltew, Carl	" 9. 84
Fooke, Arthur	Nov 10. 83
Hope Kirk, Mad. Helen	Dec 8. 83
Lang B. J.	Feb 10. 84
Magrath, George	Dec 22. 83

O'Brien, Miss Mary E.	Oct 20. 83
Radecke, " Olga von	" "
Perabo, Ernst	Jan 26. 84
Schiller Mad. Madeline	Nov 24. 83

Violin

Listmann, Bernhard	Feb 1. 84
Loeffler Mr M.	Nov 17. 83
Schmidt Mr Louis jr	Jan 5. 84
Sève, Alfred de	Dec 15. 83

' Cello

Giese, Mr Fritz	Feb 2. 84
Müller, Herr Wilhelm	Dec 1. 83

Clarinet

Strasson Mr E.	Jan 5. 84
----------------	-----------

Flute

Heindl E. W.	Jan 12. 84
--------------	------------

Harp

Freygang Mr A.	Jan 12. 84
----------------	------------

Singers

Allen, Mrs Humphrey	Feb 8. 84
Franklin, Miss Gertrude	Dec 1. 83
Gleason, Miss Hope	Oct 13. 83
Hall, Miss Marguerite	Dec 15. 83
Heinrich, Mr Max	Feb 24. 84 Oct 27. 83
Henschel, Mr Georg	" " Dec 29. 83
Henschel, Mr Georg	Feb 1. 84
Horton, Miss Lillian	Nov 3. 83
Rollwagen, Miss Louise	Feb 24. 84 Jan 12. 84
Simms, Miss Hattie Louise	Nov 17. 83
Trodt, Theo. J.	Feb 16. 84 Feb 24. 84
Wenaut, Miss Emily	Jan 19. 84

Assisted by a Full Chorus
Feb 24. 1884

Georg Henschel
Conductor

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

THIRD SEASON.

24 Saturday Evening Concerts,

Beginning October 13.

Season tickets (with reserved seats), $6 and $12, according to location, now on sale at Music Hall.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor,

Will give a series of Twenty-four Public Rehearsals in Music Hall, on consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 12 to March 21, inclusive.

Season tickets, with reserved seats to the Floor and First Balcony, will be on sale at the Box Office at 9 o'clock A. M., Friday, Sept. 28, and Saturday, Sept. 29, at $9, and on and after Monday, Oct. 1, at $7.

No more than four seats will be sold to one person.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1883-'84.

It is proposed to connect with this Orchestra a chorus of mixed voices, to give in each season three Public Concerts of its own, apart from the regular series.

The Rehearsals will begin October 12, and continue during the season on Fridays, weekly, from 7.30 to 9 P. M.

The Concerts will take place between Christmas and Easter, in connection with an orchestra consisting of 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To each of the three concerts the members of the Chorus will receive two reserved seats.

Mr. Henschel will conduct the rehearsals of the chorus as well as the concerts.

The annual fee of membership will be three dollars; the entrance fee two dollars.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of entering the chorus will kindly send their names and addresses to Mr. J. P. Lyman, 66 State street, who will notify them of Mr. Henschel's return in the autumn.

The Boston Symphony concerts for the next season are to be twenty-four in number, with three additional concerts on the evenings of Wednesday, January 9th, February 6th and March 5th, in which the programmes will be contributed by the Symphony concert chorus, assisted by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction. The cantata "St. Ursula," by Frederick H. Cowen, will be one of the works presented. The regular concerts will commence on Saturday evening, October 13th, and are to be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, with a public rehearsal on the Friday afternoon preceding, as in the past.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 13, and will be continued at weekly intervals until March 23—twenty-four in all. A portion of the house will be sold by auction next Monday morning, and particulars concerning the sale and some explanation of the reasons which have led to the adoption of this method are furnished by Mr. Higginson below:

To the Editor of the Transcript: The arrangements adopted for the past two years for the sale of tickets to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have not, apparently, satisfied the public and have certainly somewhat disappointed the managers. I have wished to distribute the tickets with the least inconvenience to buyers and to keep the prices at the fixed rates, but the demand for tickets being large, it has not been possible at the usual office sale to prevent a long line of buyers, or to prevent the reselling of some tickets at an advanced price. It is doubtful whether any plan can be devised which will remedy both of these difficulties so long as the present demand for tickets continues, but it has been decided to make trial of another method in the hope that the public may be better accommodated.

The prices of seats will remain as before, but a portion of the seats on the floor of the hall and in the first balcony will be disposed of, for this season, at auction. A large diagram of the seats will be put before the bidders, who will thus see each seat marked off as sold. The seats will be offered in regular succession according to their place on the plan, and not in order of superiority, nor will the right to select be offered. From one to four seats, as desired, may be bought on one bid. Bids must be made in person or by an agent.

No effort will be made to stimulate prices, but on the contrary it is hoped that this open sale of seats in regular order and the use of the plan, which will constantly show how large the supply really is, may have the effect of quieting competition. A small number of seats will be reserved for the directors, the press, and for my own use, and these will be plainly marked upon the plan. The seats not disposed of at auction, and also all the seats at twenty-five cents and all the rehearsal tickets, will be sold as usual at the ticket office. If this plan does not work satisfactorily some other will be tried next year.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Banker Higginson is going to sell the best seats for his Saturday night symphony concerts the coming season at auction—that is, those which he doesn't pre-empt for his friends. The thrifty Beacon Hill folk are already laying plans to gobble-up what they can for "our set, you know." The hoi poller, for whom Mr. Higginson has been ostentatiously posed as a patron, will have to put up with the leavings—a few back seats. In a sort of semi-official announcement Higginson expresses the hope that there will be no competition. Pshaw! The banker wants to get back the money he puts into the course. Why should he attempt to conceal the fact, or advocate an auction sale of this sort as a great popular boon? Mr. Higginson's concerts are excellent in their way, and Director George Henschel will present an admirable series of works. So far so good. Let the enterprise be presented in a business point of view and nobody will complain. But Mr. Higginson's manners and methods are not philanthropic, and all efforts to make him appear as a model of unselfish zeal for music only exact derision among those who know the man. Chicago Sept. 16, 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

THIRD SEASON.

24 Saturday Evening Concerts,

Beginning October 13.

Season tickets (with reserved seats), $8 and $12, according to location, now on sale at Music Hall.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor,

Will give a series of Twenty-four Public Rehearsals in Music Hall, on consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 12 to March 21, inclusive.

Season tickets, with reserved seats to the Floor and First Balcony, will be on sale at the Box Office at 9 o'clock A. M., Friday, Sept. 28, and Saturday, Sept. 29, at $9, and on and after Monday, Oct. 1, at $7.

No more than four seats will be sold to one person.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1883-'84.

It is proposed to connect with this Orchestra a chorus of mixed voices, to give in each season three Public Concerts of its own, apart from the regular series.

The Rehearsals will begin October 12, and continue during the season on Fridays, weekly, from 7.30 to 9 P.M.

The Concerts will take place between Christmas and Easter, in connection with an orchestra consisting of 50 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To each of the three concerts the members of the Chorus will receive two reserved seats.

Mr. Henschel will conduct the rehearsals of the chorus as well as the concerts.

The annual fee of membership will be three dollars; the entrance fee two dollars.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of entering the chorus will kindly send their names and addresses to Mr. J. P. Lyman, 66 State street, who will notify them of Mr. Henschel's return in the autumn.

The Boston Symphony concerts for the next season are to be twenty-four in number, with three additional concerts on the evenings of Wednesday, January 9th, February 6th and March 5th, in which the programmes will be contributed by the Symphony concert chorus, assisted by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction. The cantata "St. Ursula," by Frederick H. Cowen, will be one of the works presented. The regular concerts will commence on Saturday evening, October 13th, and are to be given on consecutive Saturday evenings, with a public rehearsal on the Friday afternoon preceding, as in the past.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 13, and will be continued at weekly intervals until March 22—twenty-four in all. A portion of the house will be sold by auction next Monday morning, and particulars concerning the sale and some explanation of the reasons which have led to the adoption of this method are furnished by Mr. Higginson below:

To the Editor of the Transcript: The arrangements adopted for the past two years for the sale of tickets to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have not, apparently, satisfied the public and have certainly somewhat disappointed the managers. I have wished to distribute the tickets with the least inconvenience to buyers and to keep the prices at the fixed rates, but the demand for tickets being large, it has not been possible at the usual office sale to prevent a long line of buyers, or to prevent the reselling of some tickets at an advanced price. It is doubtful whether any plan can be devised which will remedy both of these difficulties so long as the present demand for tickets continues, but it has been decided to make trial of another method in the hope that the public may be better accommodated.

The prices of seats will remain as before, but a portion of the seats on the floor of the hall and in the first balcony will be disposed of, for this season, at auction. A large diagram of the seats will be put before the bidders, who will thus see each seat marked off as sold. The seats will be offered in regular succession according to their place on the plan, and not in order of superiority, nor will the right to select be offered. From one to four seats, as desired, may be bought on one bid. Bids must be made in person or by an agent.

No effort will be made to stimulate prices, but on the contrary it is hoped that this open sale of seats in regular order and the use of the plan, which will constantly show how large the supply really is, may have the effect of quieting competition. A small number of seats will be reserved for the directors, the press, and for my own use, and these will be plainly marked upon the plan. The seats not disposed of at auction, and also all the seats at twenty-five cents and all the rehearsal tickets, will be sold as usual at the ticket office. If this plan does not work satisfactorily some other will be tried next year.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

Banker Higginson is going to sell the best seats for his Saturday night symphony concerts the coming season at auction—that is, those which he doesn't pre-empt for his friends. The thrifty Beacon Hill folk are already laying plans to gobble-up what they can for "our set, you know." The hoi poller, for whom Mr. Higginson has been ostentatiously posed as a patron, will have to put up with the leavings—a few back seats. In a sort of semi-official announcement Higginson expresses the hope that there will be no competition. Pshaw! The banker wants to get back the money he puts into the course. Why should he attempt to conceal the fact, or advocate an auction sale of this sort as a great popular boon? Mr. Higginson's concerts are excellent in their way, and Director George Henschel will present an admirable series of works. So far so good. Let the enterprise be presented in a business point of view and nobody will complain. But Mr. Higginson's manners and methods are not philanthropic, and all efforts to make him appear as a model of unselfish zeal for music only exact derision among those who know the man. Chicago Sept. 16. 83

Personals. 1883

INTERESTING TO MR. HENSCHEL.—At Herr Richter's concert in London, on the last Monday in May, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appeared. Mrs. Henschel was highly successful in her rendering of a piece by Graun, but Mr. Henschel, although well received, is said to have exhibited the same want of finish, both in his voice and style, as when he was heard in London last. This does not look very encouraging to Mr. Henschel.

Mr. Henschel, whose recent vocal recitals with Mrs. Henschel, have in London given as much pleasure and were found a wholly charming course, as in Boston, has caused various announcements to be made of a proposed organization for vocal performance under the patronage of the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." He invites a working force to pay five dollars each for the privilege of entering and a yearly assessment in addition. I do not hear of a hurrying to be examined! The societies now organized have progressive committees and cover satisfactorily the wide field from part song to oratorio. Mr. Henschel will not draw from these and where the material, combined with the necessary wealth, will be obtained to realize this newest evidence of centralization on the part of Mr. Henschel, is a matter of conjecture. Among the works the new society propose giving, is Fredrick Cowen's "St. Ursula," to be conducted by the composer.

Mrs. Henschel July 21. 83

The Sunday Herald informed its readers some weeks since that Mr. Georg Henschel withdrew his concerto from the repertory of the Richter concerts, on account of its having been insufficiently rehearsed. According to The Lute, a well-known London musical journal, Herr Richter "did not think the concerto worth performing, and if it were Herr Henschel could not perform it." Other reliable sources of information are equally at variance with the Herald report.

The Higginson Concerts.

All the six-dollar tickets for the third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and some of the twelve-dollar tickets, were offered for sale at the box office in Music Hall at eight o'clock this morning. A few persons formed in line at the close of the Republican State convention yesterday afternoon, and at ten o'clock last evening there were eighty-six in line, most of them being messenger boys or other representatives of prospective buyers. When the sale began there were about three hundred in line, and the sale continued uninterruptedly until noon, although after eleven o'clock there were not more than three or four at the box office at once. At noon the seats remaining unsold were some on the floor under the front balcony, some good seats in the first balcony, and a few in the second balcony, near the organ. Mr. Peck said, however, that he expected every ticket would be sold before night.

Transcript Sept 10. 83 A NOBLE USE OF WEALTH.

Mr. Higginson's explanation of his motive in deciding to dispose of a portion of the seats at the Boston symphony concerts by auction, is printed on the first page. It is not within the range of human power to prevent abuses of one's generosity, but it is clear, from the plan laid out, that the projector of these concerts hopes, by the execution of this scheme, to place the tickets in the hands of those only who shall use them. The equity of the method of sale adopted for this season, considered as a whole or in detail, cannot be disputed.

That to Mr. Higginson's generous provision the musical public of Boston has been indebted for two long series of high-class orchestral concerts, at prices that have failed to meet the cost within thousands of dollars, has been as well known as if the projector had widely proclaimed his liberality; but the note printed today is the first public acknowledgment which Mr. Higginson has made of his responsibility for the entire enterprise. The history of music contains no record of a benefaction of equal magnitude, so far as a public enjoyment of its advantages is concerned. Princes have patronized musicians with lavish hands. Had not encouragement been offered in various ways by persons of high degree, Haydn, Beethoven and other masters, even Richard Wagner, might have passed without leaving the deep impress of their works on the art life of the century. But when the Prince Esterhazy maintained in his palace and chapel an orchestra and chorus, the Church services, the secular concerts and the operas which they prepared and presented under Haydn's direction were for the edification of a very select company and not for the public. The ruling king of Bavaria poses as a munificent patron of music. But what is there done for art by one who, when he visits the opera, allows no person to share his enjoyment of the performance? Mr. Higginson's motive is solely to furnish the people with orchestral music of the first order, so performed that such music shall be in a complete sense popular, and that it shall be enjoyed for its own sake only; and to these ends he supplies from his own means whatever may be necessary to make good the inevitable deficit. Furthermore, in order that the project may acquire the dignity of an institution, he has set aside a sum of money, the income from which will be sufficient to make up whatever deficits may appear under ordinary circumstances and contingencies. Such recognition of the projector's unexampled liberality as is made in this article—it must be needless to say without his knowledge—is entirely becoming, for other than personal reasons. For is it not a public matter of congratulation to know that now and then a man lives having the means to gratify a taste who takes pains to give to as many as possible of his fellow citizens having the same taste opportunities for its gratification? (Jenks)

IMPROVEMENTS AT MUSIC HALL.

The changes begun a year ago in the exits of Music Hall will be completed within a few weeks, the additional conveniences decided upon during the last year being now in process of construction. The balcony windows opening on the left hand side of the hall, facing the stage, will open on to an iron stairway, supported upon beams of railroad iron five feet wide, and with convenient landings and guards, running directly down, outside the building, to the exit opening upon Bromfield street, thus giving an ample escape for all who can possibly be seated in the balconies on this side of the hall. On the Tremont street side of the hall an additional stairway is being constructed, which allows of an exit from the end of each balcony, near the organ, directly into Hamilton place, thus giving an outlet at each end of both the first and second balconies. Fireproof partitions have been put in wherever openings have been cut into the adjoining building, and it seems needless to provide further outlets from the building after the completion of the work now in progress.

It has been decided that no change shall be made in the regular price of the tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season. Tickets for the 24 concerts announced will be sold at $6 and $12 each, according to the location of seats, and the rehearsal tickets will be sold as they were last season, the price remaining at 25 cents. It is probable that some plan will be arranged so that would-be patrons of these concerts having a strong preference for any particular location, may have a chance to buy what he or she considers the best seats in the house at the real value of such seats, this value to be fixed by the demand of others for the same seats. Mr. Henschel is to be away from the city until the 1st of October, and the consignments of music received from him indicate that his mind is largely occupied with plans for adding to the interest of the coming season's concerts in every way.

The results of the concerts given by the Boston symphony orchestra outside this city during the last season have been of the most gratifying character. Last year these concerts, given mainly in the New England cities, were largely conducted by Mr. Higginson's agents and at his financial risk. So great an interest was aroused by the concerts, however, that nearly all of the 26 concerts to be given outside of Boston during the coming season have been contracted for by local managers, in the various places visited last year, and at prices which will aid somewhat in reducing the heavy expense attending the maintenance of the orchestra.

All doubt as to the continuance of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra for another season after this is set at rest. The concerts will be continued, Mr. Henry L. Higginson being authority for this statement.

Personals. 1883

INTERESTING TO MR. HENSCHEL.—At Herr Richter's concert in London, on the last Monday in May, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appeared. Mrs. Henschel was highly successful in her rendering of a piece by Graun, but Mr. Henschel, although well received, is said to have exhibited the same want of finish, both in his voice and style, as when he was heard in London last. This does not look very encouraging to Mr. Henschel.

Mr. Henschel, whose recent vocal recitals with Mrs. Henschel, have in London given as much pleasure and were found a wholly charming course, as in Boston, has caused various announcements to be made of a proposed organization for vocal performance under the patronage of the "Boston Symphony Orchestra." He invites a working force to pay five dollars each for the privilege of entering and a yearly assessment in addition. I do not hear of a hurrying to be examined! The societies now organized have progressive committees and cover satisfactorily the wide field from part song to oratorio. Mr. Henschel will not draw from these and where the material, combined with the necessary wealth, will be obtained to realize this newest evidence of centralization on the part of Mr. Henschel, is a matter of conjecture. Among the works the new society propose giving, is Fredrick Cowen's "St. Ursula," to be conducted by the composer.

Miss Adams July 21. 83

The Sunday Herald informed its readers some weeks since that Mr. Georg Henschel withdrew his concerto from the repertory of the Richter concerts, on account of its having been insufficiently rehearsed. According to The Late, a well-known London musical journal, Herr Richter "did not think the concerto worth performing, and if it were Herr Henschel could not perform it." Other reliable sources of information are equally at variance with the Herald report.

The Higginson Concerts.

All the six-dollar tickets for the third series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and some of the twelve-dollar tickets, were offered for sale at the box office in Music Hall at eight o'clock this morning. A few persons formed in line at the close of the Republican State convention yesterday afternoon, and at ten o'clock last evening there were eighty-six in line, most of them being messenger boys or other representatives of prospective buyers. When the sale began there were about three hundred in line, and the sale continued uninterruptedly until noon, although after eleven o'clock there were not more than three or four at the box office at once. At noon the seats remaining unsold were some on the floor under the front balcony, some good seats in the first balcony, and a few in the second balcony, near the organ. Mr. Peck said, however, that he expected every ticket would be sold before night.

Transcript Sept 10. 83 A NOBLE USE OF WEALTH.

Mr. Higginson's explanation of his motive in deciding to dispose of a portion of the seats at the Boston symphony concerts by auction, is printed on the first page. It is not within the range of human power to prevent abuses of one's generosity, but it is clear, from the plan laid out, that the projector of these concerts hopes, by the execution of this scheme, to place the tickets in the hands of those only who shall use them. The equity of the method of sale adopted for this season, considered as a whole or in detail, cannot be disputed.

That to Mr. Higginson's generous provision the musical public of Boston has been indebted for two long series of high-class orchestral concerts, at prices that have failed to meet the cost within thousands of dollars, has been as well known as if the projector had widely proclaimed his liberality; but the note printed today is the first public acknowledgment which Mr. Higginson has made of his responsibility for the entire enterprise. The history of music contains no record of a benefaction of equal magnitude, so far as a public enjoyment of its advantages is concerned. Princes have patronized musicians with lavish hands. Had not encouragement been offered in various ways by persons of high degree, Haydn, Beethoven and other masters, even Richard Wagner, might have passed without leaving the deep impress of their works on the art life of the century. But when the Prince Esterhazy maintained in his palace and chapel an orchestra and chorus, the Church services, the secular concerts and the operas which they prepared and presented under Haydn's direction were for the edification of a very select company and not for the public. The ruling king of Bavaria poses as a munificent patron of music. But what is there done for art by one who, when he visits the opera, allows no person to share his enjoyment of the performance? Mr. Higginson's motive is solely to furnish the people with orchestral music of the first order, so performed that such music shall be in a complete sense popular, and that it shall be enjoyed for its own sake only; and to these ends he supplies from his own means whatever may be necessary to make good the inevitable deficit. Furthermore, in order that the project may acquire the dignity of an institution, he has set aside a sum of money, the income from which will be sufficient to make up whatever deficits may appear under ordinary circumstances and contingencies. Such recognition of the projector's unexampled liberality as is made in this article—it must be needless to say without his knowledge—is entirely becoming, for other than personal reasons. For is it not a public matter of congratulation to know that now and then a man lives having the means to gratify a taste who takes pains to give to as many as possible of his fellow citizens having the same taste opportunities for its gratification?

IMPROVEMENTS AT MUSIC HALL.

The changes begun a year ago in the exits of Music Hall will be completed within a few weeks, the additional conveniences decided upon during the last year being now in process of construction. The balcony windows opening on the left hand side of the hall, facing the stage, will open on to an iron stairway, supported upon beams of railroad iron five feet wide, and with convenient landings and guards, running directly down, outside the building, to the exit opening upon Bromfield street, thus giving an ample escape for all who can possibly be seated in the balconies on this side of the hall. On the Tremont street side of the hall an additional stairway is being constructed, which allows of an exit from the end of each balcony, near the organ, directly into Hamilton place, thus giving an outlet at each end of both the first and second balconies. Fireproof partitions have been put in wherever openings have been cut into the adjoining building, and it seems needless to provide further outlets from the building after the completion of the work now in progress.

It has been decided that no change shall be made in the regular price of the tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season. Tickets for the 24 concerts announced will be sold at $6 and $12 each, according to the location of seats, and the rehearsal tickets will be sold as they were last season, the price remaining at 25 cents. It is probable that some plan will be arranged so that would-be patrons of these concerts having a strong preference for any particular location, may have a chance to buy what he or she considers the best seats in the house at the real value of such seats, this value to be fixed by the demand of others for the same seats. Mr. Henschel is to be away from the city until the 1st of October, and the consignments of music received from him indicate that his mind is largely occupied with plans for adding to the interest of the coming season's concerts in every way.

The results of the concerts given by the Boston symphony orchestra outside this city during the last season have been of the most gratifying character. Last year these concerts, given mainly in the New England cities, were largely conducted by Mr. Higginson's agents and at his financial risk. So great an interest was aroused by the concerts, however, that nearly all of the 26 concerts to be given outside of Boston during the coming season have been contracted for by local managers, in the various places visited last year, and at prices which will aid somewhat in reducing the heavy expense attending the maintenance of the orchestra.

All doubt as to the continuance of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra for another season after this is set at rest. The concerts will be continued, Mr. Henry L. Higginson being authority for this statement.

16

There are indications that the concerts of the coming season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, will be even more interesting than in former years, and this is all the more pleasing because of the withdrawal of the Philharmonic Society from the field in which it has labored for the last two years. The absence of Mr. Henschel from the city makes it impossible to state his plans for the winter in detail, but a hint of his intentions, gained from the shipments of new music from abroad by his orders, justifies the most agreeable anticipations for all lovers of orchestral music. Much music of a lighter character than that played at these concerts the last two seasons has been already received, and the invoices received include the most recent publications in this class of publications suited to such an orchestra. Some notable choral works have already arrived, and others are included in a shipment which has not yet been received. There is abundant evidence that a most catholic taste has been shown in the selections made by Mr. Henschel, and there appears to be little probability but that all classes of the best orchestral compositions will find a place in the season's repertoire. Much interest has been shown in the plans for the sale of tickets tomorrow at auction in Music Hall, and the result of the sale will be the only way to judge how far Mr. Higginson has been successful in satisfying the public in the arrangements for this year's distribution of these concert tickets. In addition to the statements made as to the terms of this sale, it should be understood that only a portion of the seats will be sold at auction in any event, those remaining unsold at the close of the auction being offered at the box office on Thursday morning, each buyer being limited to four seats at each purchase, both at the auction and at the box office sale.

George Henschel.—J. S. SARGENT.

Musical.

When any enterprising business firm advertises the sale of a particular kind of stock at far less than its par value, no one for a moment believes, nor is it pretended, that there is any philanthropic motive at the basis of such an enterprise. The dealer is simply willing to suffer a temporary loss in order to secure an ultimate financial success. The trade of rival firms is more or less jeopardized thereby; and the regular purchaser is elsewhere benefitted. On the other hand the principal characteristic of a speculation is noticeable in the risk incurred for a mercenary object to be attained. Speculation, however, is rarely so pronounced and objectionable as when a corner is created in any article of merchandize. The motive at the basis of such a system is invariably judged or defined from the effect created, and, as the effect is generally ruinous to all concerned except to the successful speculator, the victims of the ruin, alike the general public, are not apt to be exceedingly complimentary in their judgment of the speculator.

If such a system, then, is generally considered as foreign to the legitimate methods of doing business, it becomes a serious question how it should be regarded when it intrudes itself upon the domain of art. Who, we ask, of two men should be the more severely judged, or is capable of doing the greatest amount of harm,—the monopolist who creates a corner in trade, with no hypocritical pretensions as to motive, or the one who commits a similar impropriety in art,—who does so ostensibly as a philanthropist, while so arranging his methods as to eventually defeat the object for which so much is claimed, thereby to enhance certain personal or pecuniary interests of his own?

The point we have to make is, that within the past two or three years a corner has been created in art in Boston. Three years ago it was pretended by a well known business man in this city that in behalf of the poorer classes solely, and at a great personal risk, he would inaugurate a system of symphony concerts in Boston at far less than cost. This gentleman was a member of the Harvard Musical Association. He first considered it to be his duty to ignore the interests of that association, and to effectually destroy its utility as a concert organization. In this he was generally commended out of deference to his supposed motive, and all his wealthy friends, as well as the public at large who might never before have heard of him, were loud and unanimous in proclaiming him a philanthropist. At a comparatively slight tax upon his financial resources, he suddenly became famous. It will be seen, however, that his so-called philanthropy, like charity covering a multitude of sins, actually resulted in no philanthropy at all. In the very first year of its existence, the time-honored, the most faithful and worthy servants of the Boston concert going public, were made to feel that their legitimate enterprises, conducted at cost and with no pretention, but really in behalf of the public, must inevitably encounter disaster. A great philanthropy, so-called, like charity covering a multitude of sins, resulted in the very first year of its existence in naught but financial disaster to the very organization of which its chief apostle was a member, and in the attainment of a reputation on his part which was no doubt all the more prized on account of the pecuniary loss, inevitably incurred in the purchase of it. Having successfully advertised his enterprise, he opened the second year of it, by securing, in advance, and contrary to the spirit of an announcement he made in the newspapers, the very best seats in Music Hall for himself and friends; for the elite of Boston as well as for the many who had an abundance of the filthy lucre and were not the elite. There was no advance made upon the price of the tickets, but the scheme of the sale was so peculiarly arranged that his so-called poor people's or popular concerts could only be attended by the most fashionable series of audiences that ever assembled in Boston Music Hall. It was just at this point that the real victims of this corner on concerts began to grumble, though the organs of the enterprise, probably to the tune of more or less dollars and cents, were representing a perfectly lovely condition of affairs. In the meantime, local talent, if we except the prominent representatives of a well-known Boston clique, was ignored just so far as was possible at the concerts. There are a goodly number of very excellent bass and tenor soloists—artists—in this city; but the invariable opportunity afforded them to participate in the concerts was as auditors to the singing of the only gentleman who had it in his power to make a respectable display of professional courtesy, yet who invariably declined to display it.

This year the corner on symphony concerts has progressed so successfully, that another most excellent concert organization, the Philharmonic Society, has been obliged to suspend its concerts. Tuesday morning, at the opening of the third year of the enterprise, there was a grand auction sale of tickets at Music Hall. The average premium on each ticket for nearly the entire body of the house was six dollars and twenty-two cents, and it is at least reasonable to infer that none but very rich people could afford to buy tickets for poor people's concerts at any such premiums. Mr. Higginson most successfully thwarted the schemes of speculators in general, by securing to himself a monopoly of the speculation. And now the time has come when the great philanthropic scheme of the nineteenth century must be viewed in its true colors, and the philanthropic poser stripped of his draperies, to stand forth as a clever, scheming monopolist, who defeats his rivals by trickery and only takes off his mask when he has the field to himself. The dear poor people of Boston must do without symphony concerts; they can neither pay a premium, nor can they pay down at one slap the cash for twenty-four concerts, that capital may have the use for three months of labor's hard earnings.

They may go to the rehearsals? They may, but they cannot, for apart from the great favor of paying twenty-five cents for the rehearsal,—a dinner before it is cooked,—these dear poor people work for their living,—work in the day time,—they cannot spare half a day, if they could have it, and lose half a day's pay; it would be more expensive to the poor man who so brief a time since dreamed he was the petted darling of this philanthropic capitalist than taking his whole family to a good concert in the days before the monopoly. It is only the old struggle between labor and capital, and capital having tricked his opponents out of the struggle, labor is left without his concerts,—he takes a back seat in several ways.

Home Journal JUSTICE. Oct 13. 1883

One of our leading papers has been favored with the official announcement that conductor Georg Henschel will resign at the close of the present season; also, that he will make a professional tour. We believe this news to be strictly true, inasmuch as it was published in the BOSTON HOME JOURNAL six months ago, and is therefore very old news to the better portion of the Boston musical profession. Before long the city will be agog with curiosity to know who will be Mr. Henschel's successor. It is of course a question that Mr. H. L. Higginson must decide. Any outside suggestion will be regarded in the light of interference, and as more or less officious. Mr. Higginson is not invited to pay any attention to the following remarks, which are so far from being officious as to solely concern ourselves and many of the musical public who are our readers.

As a matter of news we are at liberty to state that Mr. Neuendorf is a prominent candidate, and is favorably regarded for the position to be made vacant by Mr. Henschel. In this connection, Mr. Neuendorf's aspirations are not ill-founded. His record as a conductor is excellent. Another gentleman mentioned for the place is Mr. Carl Zerrahn. Mr. Higginson has perhaps learned by this time that Mr. Zerrahn has the affection and esteem of the Boston public, and even the American public, to an extraordinary degree. This fact is of present importance only as it is founded upon his actual ability as a conductor of orchestral music. It will be taken for granted by all who know him that he is not a candidate for the position in the sense of seeking it. Even Mr. Higginson may be aware of this. He may also conclude that it is not absolutely essential to the interests of Mr. Zerrahn's reputation that he be engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Very well. Even at this late day it were more than ever creditable to the wisdom of the one gentleman and to the musical ability of the other, if such a popular selection were now made.

Let us review past events, the study of which is always more or less profitable. When Mr. Higginson selected Mr. Georg Henschel for the position he now occupies, he was undoubtedly aware, and temporarily to the disadvantage of Mr. Zerrahn, that the orchestral playing at the Harvard concerts was popularly regarded as of very unsatisfactory character. This at least was the unanimous and not wholly erroneous opinion among a sapient yet influential class of

"stay-at-homes." The more the Harvard Orchestra, however—to use a convenient term—improved, the more unfashionable became the opinions of it; the more modern the programmes, and the more Mr. John S. Dwight did to cater to the whims and caprices of a fashionable public, the less patronage and support did the concerts receive. These are the facts in the case, and we challenge a critical scrutiny and comparison of the programmes that have since been given in Boston, as a crowning substantiation of these facts. The performance of the programmes was rarely up to the highest standard of artistic merit. Why? Not because the interpretations were inadequate, but owing to such faults as could only be ascribed with justice to an incompleteness in the orchestra and likewise to insufficiency of rehearsals. Whether for good and sufficient reasons or not, the public did not enable an organization—the H. M. A.—giving concerts at a par value, to so flourish that it could afford the conductor, whose hands were tied, anything like so many rehearsals nor such a complete orchestra, nor so many costly and unique advantages generally speaking, as are now regarded as absolutely necessary for an attractive success under a less competent conductor's lead. Mr. Higginson's munificent patronage of Mr. Henschel did not, logically speaking, show a lack of appreciation of the many disadvantages under which Mr. Zerrahn had for many years labored, and without a murmur or a word of defence from his lips at the senseless abuse he was receiving. Mr. Higginson simply exercised a businessman's right in his choice of Mr. Henschel, not in the interests of fair play to any one in particular, but for the success of his enterprise. Any sensible Bostonian would be pleased to see him exercise even more tact in his selection of Mr. Henschel's successor. He will at least have a noteworthy precedent upon which to act in the somewhat remarkable choice of a conductor that the Philharmonic Society made last year. This society acted even more in a spirit of rivalry to the H. M. A. than did Mr. Higginson. After unsuccessfully trying two efficient conductors, the society at last surprised the public by engaging Mr. Zerrahn. The stone which the builders rejected, the same became the head of the corner. Mr. Zerrahn's lead at the Philharmonic concerts last year resulted in his triumph. Such as knew anything about music in Boston, and many who did not, were unanimously enthusiastic in his praise. For our own part, we shall never forget Mr. Zerrahn's masterly, his unimpeachable reading of the Schubert unfinished symphony last year; and we are just wicked enough to recall an equally remarkable reading to the other extreme of this same work in a contemporaneous series of symphony concerts. Bear this in mind; that the only adequate chance Mr. Zerrahn ever had in Boston as orchestral conductor was afforded him by the Philharmonic Society, and he improved it.

It had been so very easy to raise the cry of old fogey against a gentleman of so many years of musical experience; but our esteemed fellow citizen never appeared so masterly as a conductor, as when he silenced this cry to the hush, by some of the most artistic, the most effective interpretations of symphonic music that have ever been heard in Boston. Such was Mr. Zerrahn's lead at the Philharmonic concerts last year. The fault, then, with the Harvard Association was not that it so constantly sustained Mr. Zerrahn, but, as the Philharmonic Society has since substantiated, that it did not so adequately sustain him as to make apparent the misapplication of such criticism. A few weeks since it was stated in this paper, and upon excellent authority, that a serious difference of opinion, which amounted to coldness, existed between the conductor and manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The truth of this statement, which, though it may be denied, cannot be refuted, for it is the truth, now takes its official form, in Mr. Henschel's statement to the Herald interviewer, that he would inevitably resign at the close of the present season. In the meantime the public pulse will beat in favor of the gentleman who best deserves to be placed at the head of the organization bearing the name of Boston Symphony Orchestra. It would be in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, and extremely gratifying were thirty-five years of musicianship, exercising an invaluable influence in the rise and progress of our musical public, to be appreciated by Mr. Higginson in the exceedingly handsome manner that he has it in his power to appreciate it.

THE CHEAP CONCERT PROBLEM.

From: — Oct. 7, 1883

When Mr. Henry L. Higginson first conceived the idea of the notable scheme of orchestral concerts, which he has since carried out, even his inexperience in such matters cannot quite have blinded him to the outlook that, arrange the concerts on whatever plan he might devise, he would unavoidably get more criticism than thanks for his pains. Indeed, the public is nothing if not critical, especially if any one have the indiscreetness to do it a favor. It has probably occurred to but few of the many persons who have found fault with Mr. Higginson's manner of carrying out his scheme that it was just within the bounds of possibility that they were trying to meddle in matters that were simply and solely Mr. Higginson's business, and by no means theirs. For instance, it seems as if the growling that has been heard at the rich element in our public crowding out the poorer element, for the benefit of which the price of tickets was put at an unprecedentedly low figure, were, for the most part, vastly out of place. If it was part of Mr. Higginson's plan that poor music-lovers should have exactly as good a chance of enjoying the concerts as rich ones, and if it be assumed that he has partially failed in gaining his object, no one has the right to make a personal grievance out of this (assumed) failure. It may be regrettable, but until the poorer music-lovers find themselves less favorably placed in regard to concert-going than they were before the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they have no right to grumble at Mr. Higginson. And surely no one will attempt to deny that, although Mr. Higginson's skill as a manager may not have succeeded in putting the poor man upon an absolutely equal footing with the rich one, the opportunities of hearing good music which the former now enjoys are distinctly greater than they were before the present cheap concerts existed. As for the unmannerly sneers that have curled the lips of some wretched sore-heads from time to time, because it was suspected that Mr. Higginson might not be losing quite so much money by the concerts as was deemed right and proper, what can be said of them, save that they are the natural ornament of such lips? Whoever finds anything but congratulations for Mr. Higginson for every dollar that he does not lose in his enterprise must read his code of social ethics backwards. Upon the whole, does it not seem perfectly fair that Mr. Higginson should be allowed to please himself in this matter of concert-giving, so long as he places nobody in a less favorable position in regard to concert-going than before? It is evident that a man wholly inexperienced in such matters, undertaking a scheme at once so novel and important as the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, must inevitably be brought face to face with not a few problems which he did not foresee in the beginning. Between the first generous and munificent idea and the practical realization of it there is a considerable interval; no little allowance should be made for friction, for more or less unsuccessful experimenting on various details, until the adequate means of securing the greatest good of the greatest number shall have been discovered. The problems which inevitably present themselves to a man in Mr. Higginson's position may, in the main, be reduced to two: how to make the concerts do the most good; and how to keep them from doing serious harm. After the unquestionable earnest of sincere well-wishing to the cause of good music in Boston that Mr. Higginson has given, it is ungracious, to say the very least, to give vent to impatient fault-finding because he may not yet have quite succeeded in solving the former of these two problems to universal admiration. When a man does as well as he has done, one can be content to wait for him to do still better.

As for the second question, however, the problem of how to prevent the symphony concerts from doing serious harm, here we come to a point on which the public should have a voice. In so far as Mr. Higginson's course is viewed in the light of the harm it has done, or may do, outside criticism is manifestly in place. Let us examine this a little.

Permanently assured concerts with a large orchestra, and often expensive solo talent, the tickets to which are sold at fifty and twenty-five cents apiece, have naturally a great power of quashing competition. Societies and associations, giving concerts on a self-supporting basis, that is to say, concerts to which tickets are sold at a price which will cover expenses, cannot hope to compete with an enterprise like this of Mr. Higginson, who sells tickets at prices decidedly below their normal market value. The inevitable result has been that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have quashed competition. In so far as symphony concerts are concerned, there has, probably, been no harm done. That the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association ceased just one year after the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its course, was, upon the whole, little more than a coincidence. It had been foreseen for some time that, so soon as the Harvard Musical Association had run through the money it had laid up in prosperous years, its symphony concerts would stop of themselves. The Harvard concerts may be said, truly enough, to have died a natural death; they were not killed by Mr. Higginson, nor by anybody else. On the other hand, the symphony concerts of the Philharmonic Society have been knocked on the head by those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet even here little or no harm has been done; for when we have twenty-four or twenty-six symphony concerts, and as many afternoon rehearsals, in a season, we have quite enough. Boston can perfectly well spare the Philharmonic concerts, excellent as they were. Any one is free to hang as many wreaths as he pleases on the tombstones of the Harvard Musical and the Philharmonic courses, but to shed tears over them would be foolish. So long as Mr. Higginson gives our musical public a respectable quid pro quo, he may swamp as many other courses of orchestral concerts as he pleases, without doing the cause of music any serious harm. But so soon as the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra begin to endanger the prosperity of musical societies, or of individuals working in a different field, then they do begin to do harm.

It is surely no mere coincidence that the triennial festival of the Handel and Haydn Society last May was less well attended, and ended by drawing far more largely upon the guarantee fund than any festival the society has ever given. Some persons have tried to account for this lack of material success on the ground of the list of solo singers containing too few names of commanding celebrity. Yet, comparing the list of singers at the last festival with the lists of previous years, this explanation seems inadequate. One cannot but think that the long course of concerts at low prices given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and completed before the festival began, had far more to do with the marked numerical falling off in the Handel and Haydn audiences than any supposed or actual shortcoming in the list of festival solo singers. The fact is that the symphony concerts, as was inevitable, "beared" the concert market in general by their low price of admission, and glutted the market by their great number—fifty-two performances in all, counting public rehearsals. To be sure, it has been suggested that the Handel and Haydn Society might have stood up against the "bearing" influence of the symphony concerts by giving its festival at a low price of admission in Mechanics' Building, instead of in the Music Hall at the ordinary festival prices. But, had the Handel and Haydn Society done this, it would simply have been charging a lower price for an inferior article; for oratorio performances in the vast Mechanics' Building are, beyond all question, unspeakably inferior in musical effect to the same performances in the Music Hall. But, even apart from purely musical considerations, we think the Mechanics' Hall suggestion utterly foolish; for any one who knows the Boston public must lean to the opinion that the symphony concerts really took the wind out of the festival's sails far more directly by glutting the concert market than they did by "bearing" it.

Now, if the Boston Symphony Concerts can react untowardly upon the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society, as they unquestionably did last year—for, after hearing good, solid music once or twice a week all winter, one's appetite for that sort of enjoyment is pretty well satiated—there is no reason why they should not, in time, react in the same way upon the concerts of the Cecilia, and of the Boylston and Apollo clubs, as well as upon all chamber concerts. Indeed, this unfortunate result is by no means improbable. That the symphony concerts do not, and cannot, replace the concerts of our choral societies and the various chamber concerts that are usually given in Boston, is evident enough. It is equally evident that any cause which tends to lessen the support which our musical public is inclined to give to choral and chamber concerts is much to be deprecated. The harm which it is in the power of the symphony concerts to do in this direction can in no wise be counterbalanced by the good they do in another way. How to prevent this harm is the problem to the solution of which, it seems to us, Mr. Higginson should direct his best endeavors.

22

We take it for granted that Mr. Higginson's only object in giving the symphony concerts is to advance the cause of good music in Boston. He must see clearly by this time that no one giving concerts on a normal basis, that is, selling tickets either at, or slightly above, cost, can hope to compete with him; that neither our choral societies nor our givers of chamber concerts can afford to sell tickets below cost; and finally, that a long course of orchestral concerts like his, which attract the largest patronage both by their cheapness and their excellent quality, are in imminent danger of so satiating the public musical appetite that it becomes doubly hard for all other musical enterprises to get their natural support. As for any suggestions as to how this problem is to be solved, they are wholly foreign to the purpose of the present article. Indeed, the problem seems to us a peculiarly tough one; but solved it must be, or Mr. Higginson will find himself in the unwished-for position of having deprived Boston of as much music as he has given it.

--There has been some talk among an enterprising company of business men of setting up telephones in various parts of the city, which should connect with Music Hall and other buildings in which concerts are to be given during the winter, and giving subscribers who are either too infirm or lazy to attend an opportunity to hear in their own residences the performances of orchestras, etc. It is learned, however, that the enterprise has now been abandoned, on account of an unexpected "kick" which one of the prominent musical conductors of Boston made against it. He said that it would be impossible to give satisfaction both to subscribers to the telephone scheme and the people who came to the hall. "You all know how the telephone works," said this authority to the committee which waited upon him in the interest of the above-mentioned syndicate. "Let us suppose a case. I am, let us say, conducting a symphony with a row of telephones back of my head. Suddenly I hear a subscriber on Beacon street yelling 'Hullo!' in what is evidently an angry voice. I rap for the orchestra to stop, and call back, 'Hullo! What is it?' Then I learn that in the half-dozen bars just played the machine sputtered so that he couldn't hear anything but the brass and wants the passage repeated, and as he has paid a premium for his method of hearing the concert, I feel that it is no more than just to accede to his wish. And then, perhaps, pretty soon, another subscriber, having heard indistinctly, wants to know why the deuce the violins didn't play in that passage as they ought to have done if his score is right. If I get out of the hall without being mobbed by the actual attendants on the concert I should be lucky. None of your telephone racket for me." And so the committee, being men open to conviction, agreed that the matter had better drop.

The Symphony Concerts of Next Season.

Comic Opera Attractions at the Theatres.

Improvements at Music Hall--News and Gossip.

Although the scheme of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season of concerts during the coming winter is not completely outlined as yet, some details have been decided which indicate that the interest in this series of musical entertainments will be fully maintained during the third year of this organization. The concerts will be 24 in number, and will be given at Music Hall on consecutive Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13, the public rehearsals preceding each concert on Friday afternoon, as in former seasons. The selection of the programmes and soloists will be in the hands of Mr. Georg Henschel, who assumes the conduct of these concerts for the third season, and the character of the compositions presented will not vary essentially from those making up the scheme of former seasons. Mr. Henschel has already forwarded a large amount of new music from Europe in anticipation of his season's work, and his opportunities abroad will give him many advantages in the choice of novelties. Many very absurd rumors have gained circulation concerning the membership of the orchestra, and it has been intimated that Boston musicians would hesitate about again signing contracts holding them to such severe discipline as was maintained by Mr. Henschel last season. The facts that nearly all the required contracts have been accepted already, and that with only a few exceptions the orchestral players are to be the same as last year, indicate that there is little real dissatisfaction with the service of the Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel. Some changes have been made in the string players, the second violins having been recruited from the first violins of last year, and it is quite possible that a few good first violin players may be added from the membership of orchestras across the water. The accession of new men will, however, hardly number a single dozen musicians all told, and it is quite possible that many of these will be brought from other cities in this country. The contracts stipulate for the services of the musicians just about one-half each week, the men giving their time for rehearsals or concerts as may be demanded. In addition to the 24 concerts named, there will be given three concerts on

22

We take it for granted that Mr. Higginson's only object in giving the symphony concerts is to advance the cause of good music in Boston. He must see clearly by this time that no one giving concerts on a normal basis, that is, selling tickets either at, or slightly above, cost, can hope to compete with him; that neither our choral societies nor our givers of chamber concerts can afford to sell tickets below cost; and finally, that a long course of orchestral concerts like his, which attract the largest patronage both by their cheapness and their excellent quality, are in imminent danger of so satiating the public musical appetite that it becomes doubly hard for all other musical enterprises to get their natural support. As for any suggestions as to how this problem is to be solved, they are wholly foreign to the purpose of the present article. Indeed, the problem seems to us a peculiarly tough one; but solved it must be, or Mr. Higginson will find himself in the unwished-for position of having deprived Boston of as much music as he has given it.

--There has been some talk among an enterprising company of business men of setting up telephones in various parts of the city, which should connect with Music Hall and other buildings in which concerts are to be given during the winter, and giving subscribers who are either too infirm or lazy to attend an opportunity to hear in their own residences the performances of orchestras, etc. It is learned, however, that the enterprise has now been abandoned, on account of an unexpected "kick" which one of the prominent musical conductors of Boston made against it. He said that it would be impossible to give satisfaction both to subscribers to the telephone scheme and the people who came to the hall. "You all know how the telephone works," said this authority to the committee which waited upon him in the interest of the above-mentioned syndicate. "Let us suppose a case. I am, let us say, conducting a symphony with a row of telephones back of my head. Suddenly I hear a subscriber on Beacon street yelling 'Hullo!' in what is evidently an angry voice. I rap for the orchestra to stop, and call back, 'Hullo! What is it?' Then I learn that in the half-dozen bars just played the machine sputtered so that he couldn't hear anything but the brass and wants the passage repeated, and as he has paid a premium for his method of hearing the concert, I feel that it is no more than just to accede to his wish. And then, perhaps, pretty soon, another subscriber, having heard indistinctly, wants to know why the deuce the violins didn't play in that passage as they ought to have done if his score is right. If I get out of the hall without being mobbed by the actual attendants on the concert I should be lucky. None of your telephone racket for me." And so the committee, being men open to conviction, agreed that the matter had better drop.

The Symphony Concerts of Next Season.

Comic Opera Attractions at the Theatres.

Improvements at Music Hall--News and Gossip.

Although the scheme of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season of concerts during the coming winter is not completely outlined as yet, some details have been decided which indicate that the interest in this series of musical entertainments will be fully maintained during the third year of this organization. The concerts will be 24 in number, and will be given at Music Hall on consecutive Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 13, the public rehearsals preceding each concert on Friday afternoon, as in former seasons. The selection of the programmes and soloists will be in the hands of Mr. Georg Henschel, who assumes the conduct of these concerts for the third season, and the character of the compositions presented will not vary essentially from those making up the scheme of former seasons. Mr. Henschel has already forwarded a large amount of new music from Europe in anticipation of his season's work, and his opportunities abroad will give him many advantages in the choice of novelties. Many very absurd rumors have gained circulation concerning the membership of the orchestra, and it has been intimated that Boston musicians would hesitate about again signing contracts holding them to such severe discipline as was maintained by Mr. Henschel last season. The facts that nearly all the required contracts have been accepted already, and that with only a few exceptions the orchestral players are to be the same as last year, indicate that there is little real dissatisfaction with the service of the Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel. Some changes have been made in the string players, the second violins having been recruited from the first violins of last year, and it is quite possible that a few good first violin players may be added from the membership of orchestras across the water. The accession of new men will, however, hardly number a single dozen musicians all told, and it is quite possible that many of these will be brought from other cities in this country. The contracts stipulate for the services of the musicians just about one-half each week, the men giving their time for rehearsals or concerts as may be demanded. In addition to the 24 concerts named, there will be given three concerts on the following dates: Wednesday evening, Jan. 9, Wednesday evening, Feb. 6, and Wednesday evening, March 5, in which the programmes will be contributed by the Symphony concert chorus, assisted by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction. The cantata "St. Ursula," by Frederick H. Cowen, will be one of the works presented, and Mr. Henschel has selected other works for the remaining concerts, which will be duly announced. As regards the price of tickets, and the method to be followed in disposing of them, there is no positive information to be had. Of course, somebody will be displeased, whatever plan is adopted, and the only question appears to be how is the greatest good of the greatest number to be secured. It is perfectly evident that some seats are more desirable than others; that is, each person has a particular seat or section, which to him or her is the only good seat in the house. Now, it seems reasonable that the person who holds the location of his or her seat to be the one important thing about these concerts should pay for the privilege of having that particular location during the season, provided that others agree in his or her opinion as to the desirability of the location. An acquaintance with the demands at the box office proves that there are few locations which are not "the best in the house" to some patron or class of patrons. One person never wants to hear an orchestral concert unless he can sit in the front row of the upper balcony, facing the stage. Another insists that directly over the first violins, in the second balcony, is the only proper place. A third will assure you most positively that the full effect can only be gained in the centre of the floor seats, and he who undertakes to convince either one of these theorists that there is a possibility of his or her opinion being incorrect simply underestimates the strength of the convictions of the average inhabitant of musical Boston. In the western cities the auction sale has been very generally adopted as the most desirable means of settling all the vexed questions attending the disposition of seats for such occasions, and it must be confessed that the plan has many advantages. If the public do not care enough about a choice of the seats to compete for them, then they can be put on sale in the ordinary way. As Mr. Higginson, the gentleman whose liberality and public spirit has sustained these concerts, will be out of the country during the coming year, there will be no occasion to accuse him of any favoritism or interference in connection with the sale, whatever plan may be decided upon in regard to its conduct.

Our Musical Boon.

Ever since they were first inaugurated, the Boston Symphony concerts have been a fruitful source of controversy; and now on the eve of their third season they are discussed pro and con with as much ardor as ever. The argument turns primarily upon the point whether or no Mr. Higginson's manner of carrying out his scheme is the best that can be brought into play, and secondarily whether his professed intention to make those concerts of benefit to the cause of music in Boston has been realized. It is but repeating an old story to state that the prevailing belief, when the Symphony concerts were first mooted, was that they were to be given mainly to enable those who could not afford to pay the prices charged for musical entertainments of a high order to hear the best works at a reasonable charge. It is simply to repeat another thrice-told tale to state that this end has not been accomplished, for the reason that only those who could afford to pay for an entire season's tickets reaped the bulk of the benefit so loudly proclaimed at the outset. It was made compulsory to buy tickets to the whole series, or to wait and take the chance of procuring single admissions, if any were left unsold after the more wealthy had been served. This year it has been more hard upon the general public than ever, for season tickets have been sold by auction at a premium, which arbitrarily confined their purchase to the more prosperous of the music-loving public. It is evident that up to this time cheap entertainments have favored only those who could well pay the prices previously charged for symphony concerts.

Much has been said of the advantages conferred on the public by Mr. Higginson's project, but these advantages are not so apparent when it is considered that it has made other concerts at prices which shall remunerate their projectors almost impossible. It is not everybody who is willing or who has the means to give concerts at a loss. And yet they must be so given or not given at all. The result is seen in the extinction of both the Harvard and Philharmonic societies. Not only this, but Mr. Higginson's concerts have come to be the only series of orchestral concerts possible here. It is claimed that these fulfill every necessary requirement and provide all the music that can reasonably be desired; but such points are fairly open to argument. The programmes of the symphony concerts are well enough in their way; but they do not satisfy the tastes of that large part of the musical community which took pleasure in the more harmonious and more classical programmes of the Harvard and the Philharmonic concerts. Then, too, there are prejudices in regard to the art of conducting, which are not to be overlooked wholly. If the public is to be confined to one series of concerts, and is placed in a position in which it cannot help itself to another, there is surely nothing unreasonable in claiming that nothing shall be lost by the monopoly thus created. At present, all who want a class of programmes more classic and more earnest in character cannot possibly obtain them without their projectors give them at the same prices charged by Mr. Higginson and at a similar loss willingly suffered by him. This, of course, they cannot do, for artists and concert-givers must live. The only result that must ensue is the exodus of artists to another city where symphony concert giving has not been grasped by a single hand.

It is well enough to insist that Mr. Higginson shall lose money in the way he best sees fit; that he is conferring a boon on the public at a great self-sacrifice; that he is a benefactor to whom we cannot all be too grateful; but when, to all intents and purposes, he says that we shall have no orchestral music than that he sees fit advisable to provide us with; and when, intentionally or otherwise, he practically creates a monopoly in concert-giving, against which it is vain to struggle, the point assumes an entirely different aspect. It then fairly becomes a question whether this benevolent object is or is not an injury to the progress of musical art here. On the one side it reduces itself to the simple fact that Mr. Higginson can afford to lose so many thousand dollars a year for the prestige, or the honor, or the philanthropy, of providing the only orchestral concerts for a great musical city; while on the other hand it effectually closes the door upon all artists, whether orchestral players, vocalists, soloists or conductors, who do not happen to be employed by Mr. Higginson, and thus deprives them of all opportunity of appearing in such concerts. The position may be summed up in few words: The concerts intended for the less wealthy have chiefly benefited the rich. These performances, given at a deliberate loss, have rendered all other concerts, which artists unemployed by Mr. Higginson might desire to give, and for which they would be compelled to charge a paying price, impossible. The public is forced to take such programmes and such conducting as Mr. Higginson vouchsafes them. It may be claimed that competition is the soul of business, and that Mr. Higginson is not to blame if his concerts have, in the usual course of business, killed all other similar entertainments. But the competition has not been business-like. It has been confined, so to speak, to selling at an underprice which made competition impossible, and that too without any thought of profit, present or future. Not only orchestral concerts, but chamber concerts and all other musical entertainments, have suffered here through this underselling. After having become accustomed to pay a small price to hear a larger, and, on the whole, a finer and more complete orchestra than has ever been heard here before permanently, the public will not willingly pay some hundred per cent. or two hundred per cent. more for the privilege of attending other con-certain, no heed of what description; and yet other concerts of a high order cannot possibly be given for less at any profit. And as these concerts have not been a particular boon to the poorer class of the musical community, have principally benefited the richer, have practically created a monopoly in music against which it is hopeless to struggle, and have lessened the attendance at all other concerts of importance here, we are led to the belief that more harm than good has been done to the cause of music in Boston by this enterprise, in spite of the liberality and self-sacrifice that have characterized the course of their projector.

Still the old question, already stated, arises again: Shall a man not do as he likes with his own money? and if he gives, shall he not give in his own way? To this we answer, he can equitably enjoy no such privilege, when in thus giving he hampers art, and confines its exercise upon a large scale to himself. If a man were wealthy enough to open a shop for the sale of watches, were to import his watches from abroad, and were to sell them at one-third of their market value, the public which could afford them at that price might feel grateful to him, but the watch makers and watch-sellers would not. In fact, he would confine the business of watch-selling to his own hands, content to suffer loss for the prestige of providing people with very cheap, but still, to some, very dear, watches. But he would ruin every maker and seller of watches in the city where such philanthropy were shown. This is about what Mr. Higginson has done for music here. The rich public is benefited, but the progress of art is stopped.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Herold

Sept 30. 83

The Symphony Concerts---A Chat with Mr. Henschel.

In chatting with Mr. Georg Henschel about the coming season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, some idea of his plans was gained, and it appears that much that is interesting will find a hearing during the series of programmes to be performed under his direction. Among the soloists already engaged are Miss Hope Glenn, the contralto, Mr. Max Heinrich, a baritone-singer of New York, Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist, Miss O'Brien, pianist, of Portland, Me., and Miss Radecki, pianist, these two last playing together in the Mozart concerts for two pianofortes; Mr. Magrath, a pianist, now professor at the Cincinnati College of Music, and Mr. Carl Faelton, a pianist of Baltimore. Among the notable works promised are new symphonies by Goldmark and Volckmann, a concerto for four horns by Schumann, Berlioz' funeral march, from "Hamlet," some of the "Colomba" music, Rubenstein's "Ocean," symphony (only the original five movements though), a new symphony by Cowen and many other works of equal interest, which will be named as the season progresses. The idea of an annual presentation of the Beethoven symphonies will be adhered to as usual, these being looked upon as an important educational element in the scheme of the concerts, by Mr. Higginson. The general plan of the programme will be the same as in the last two seasons, an effort being made to introduce some novelty in each programme and to have the additional numbers, aside from the symphonies of each evening, of a light description, though none but music of the highest character will be admitted, so that all hope of hearing a Strauss waltz played by this organization must be abandoned for another year, at least. It is now decided that Mr. Henschel will resign his direction of this orchestra at the close of the present season, with a view to taking an extended professional tour. This fact will naturally add to the interest of the present season's concerts, and the large audiences assured by the ticket sale will undoubtedly find ample sources of entertainment and instruction in the programme presented. The membership of the orchestra has been changed somewhat, but not radically, the only notable new members being those engaged by Mr. Henschel during his recent European trip. These are Mr. Bernhardt, first bassoon, who has been the leading player on this instrument in the Hamburg Philharmonic orchestra for the last nine years; Mr. Leo Peckmann, first oboe, who comes from the Wagner Theatre orchestra; Mr. Demuth, second oboe player, who has been leading oboe of the Leipzig Enterte concerts, and Auguste Kolache, who joins the first violins of the orchestra, and who has been playing at Geneva, Switzerland. It is now decided that the scheme of choral concerts, at first contemplated in connection with this orchestra, shall be given up, Mr. Higginson having decided that the support given choral works was already sufficient to insure their proper and frequent presentation, and that the addition of such concerts to the symphony orchestra's scheme might injuriously affect the plans made by the already established organizations. The sale of the tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Saturday evening programmes, resulted quite as successfully as did that of the concert tickets, so that large audiences are insured at both performances.

Herold MUSICAL MATTERS. Aug 26, 1883

A Boston Singer's Success—Sale of Symphony Concert Tickets.

The delay in the completion of the plans for the coming season in musical matters is a most marked characteristic of the situation in local affairs in this line, and the most experienced managers are somewhat at a loss to correctly estimate the probable results of the various ventures now in contemplation. There is little doubt but that concert and opera patrons will have an ample amount and variety of attractions to choose from during the fall and spring season, but it is impossible to say, with any degree of certainty, as yet, just what these attractions will be. The most interesting announcement to be made public is that the sale of tickets for the third season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, will open on Monday morning, Sept. 17, when the choice of seats will be offered at auction for public competition, with a view to giving all an opportunity to bid for the right of occupying the "best seats" during the season of 24 concerts. The prices fixed are $8 and $12 respectively for the two divisions made in the seats by the management, and the competition at the auction sale will be for the premium to be paid above these amounts. The division of the seats will be much the same as in former years, and it is intended that the auction sale shall be conducted so that every purchaser shall have an equal chance in securing desirable seats. The sale of tickets for the public rehearsals will follow that of the concert tickets, and the arrangements for this sale will be duly made public.

28

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Auction Sale of Tickets for the Coming Season.

In accordance with the announcement made by Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a portion of the tickets for the coming season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, were offered at auction at Music Hall yesterday forenoon by Mr. Francis Henshaw, auctioneer. About 150 gentlemen assembled in the hall before the sale, which began promptly at 10 o'clock, a large diagram on the platform showing the location of all the seats to be offered at the sale. One hundred seats were checked off the plan before the sale was opened, these being reserved for the directors of the hall, the press and for the personal use of Mr. Higginson. The sale lasted for three hours and a quarter, and there was no "dwelling on bids" by the auctioneer. The entire floor front of the balcony posts and one row of seats back of this line were sold, save the two front rows, marked off on account of the possible extension of the platform at some concert. Two rows across the front of the first balcony were also sold, and a single row on either side of this balcony. The remaining seats, those under the balcony on the floor, the rear seats in the first balcony and all the second balcony seats, will be for sale at the box office on Thursday morning. There was the widest variation in the bids for seats, the premiums ranging from $1 to $20 per seat. The sale aggregated 825 seats, and the premiums $5123, or an average of about $6.22 per ticket for the 24 concerts. Many of the tickets found their way into the hands of the regular dealers in such matters, especially the seats which were not deemed desirable by the buyers for personal use. There were a few amusing cases of rivalry during the sale, Mr. S. B. Schlesinger advancing the premium from $4 to $12.50 to get his usual seats, and Mr. E. Paige paying $20.50 premium each for seats which seemed desirable to him. The sale was conducted with perfect fairness, and every one appeared satisfied with the method taken to distribute the tickets offered for competition.

Only a portion of the seats in Music Hall will be sold at auction for the Symphony concerts of this season, and the seats to be sold will be offered in regular order, instead of the choice of all seats being put up as first announced.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To the Editor of the Herald: Why does Mr. Higginson use such peculiar methods in putting before the public his noble scheme of symphony concerts, subsidized by him for the benefit of Boston? This inquiry is uppermost in the minds of many people, who rejoice at his liberality and the happy direction of his thought that had intended most unusual opportunities for musical culture among all who would avail themselves.

That his fine concerts do not reach the public he intends, is because the manner of selling the seats is wrong. This course of 24 concerts, given in a hall which seats over 2,000, would afford opportunity to over 50,000 people each season, if the seats were sold singly for the separate concerts. But, instead of an open sale, continuing through the season, with a chance for everybody, the seats for the two courses already given have been sold by the season, thus permitting the exclusive patronage of a limited number. While, for next season, a plan to sell the choice of seats for the entire series at auction is said to have been determined upon, the most generous critic of Mr. Higginson must surely feel aggrieved that a well-meant public benefit and of such exceptional worth should be frustrated at its inception through ignorance of the right way to put it forth; for while the low price of admission, if single tickets were the rule, would embrace everybody and result in a general broadening of musical knowledge, the necessity to pay for a whole course at a given time establishes a barrier against its enjoyment for very many who desire its privileges. The theatre appeals to a varying public, and its lessons are widespread, because it is open to all. These symphony concerts should not become the exclusive property of an already well favored class, and as their continuance is probable, to the disestablishment of all similar enterprises, I most earnestly ask for a simple plan of admission which will admit, not keep out, all who would like to avail themselves of their advantages. The result of selling the seats for the single concerts without regard to the course, could not lessen the total receipts by the present method, and seems the one way to fully carry out the idea of the founder.

AMATEUR.

Certainly no one can complain of favoritism in the distribution of tickets for the Symphony Concerts this year, when Mr. George Higginson, the father of the founder of the concerts, pays the highest premium of anybody for seats!

The purchaser of a group of expensive seats at the symphony concert auction on Monday inquired of his neighbor, Mr. Thomas Ryan, why Mr. Henschel sold his tickets himself, and the auctioneer was Mr. Henshaw. Such is fame and personality. But then Mr. Ryan has often heard himself pointed out as "Mr. Mendelssohn!"

The tickets for Mr. Higginson's orchestral concerts this year are to go by auction. This will be more profitable to the projector than the old method; but Beacon Hill and Back Bay competition will probably effectually remove the course from the designation of "too cheap." The sale will open on Monday, the 17th, and premiums for the best seats will be accepted on a basis of $6 and $12 for tickets, according to location of places. The best places will be taken briskly enough.

The Boston Symphony concerts are to commence next Saturday evening, at Music Hall, and will be preceded, as last season, by a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, which will be practically the same as the concert. The orchestra contains much new talent, as well as the best of the old, and its work will undoubtedly constitute the backbone of the Boston musical season.

Mr. Georg Henschel withdrew his pianoforte concerto from the Richter concert programme in London because of the insufficient time given to its rehearsal by the orchestra. It appears, therefore, that even Hans Richter has some trouble with this matter of rehearsals, as it is stated that his players arrive at and leave rehearsals according as their other engagements permit.

Among the passengers by the Cunard steamship Cephalonia, which reached her dock late yesterday afternoon, was Mr. Georg Henschel, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, who has been abroad since May upon a tour for pleasure and the pursuit of new music for the coming season of concerts here. Mr. Henschel was accompanied by his wife, and both these artists have returned in excellent health.

28
seats by the management, and the competition at the auction sale will be for the premium to be paid above these amounts. The division of the seats will be much the same as in former years, and it is intended that the auction sale shall be conducted so that every purchaser shall have an equal chance in securing desirable seats. The sale of tickets for the public rehearsals will follow that of the concert tickets, and the arrangements for this sale will be duly made public.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Herald Sept 18, 83 Auction Sale of Tickets for the Coming Season.

In accordance with the announcement made by Mr. Henry L. Higginson, a portion of the tickets for the coming season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, were offered at auction at Music Hall yesterday forenoon by Mr. Francis Henshaw, auctioneer. About 150 gentlemen assembled in the hall before the sale, which began promptly at 10 o'clock, a large diagram on the platform showing the location of all the seats to be offered at the sale. One hundred seats were checked off the plan before the sale was opened, these being reserved for the directors of the hall, the press and for the personal use of Mr. Higginson. The sale lasted for three hours and a quarter, and there was no "dwelling on bids" by the auctioneer. The entire floor front of the balcony posts and one row of seats back of this line were sold, save the two front rows, marked off on account of the possible extension of the platform at some concerts. Two rows across the front of the first balcony were also sold, and a single row on either side of this balcony. The remaining seats, those under the balcony on the floor, the rear seats in the first balcony and all the second balcony seats, will be for sale at the box office on Thursday morning. There was the widest variation in the bids for seats, the premiums ranging from $1 to $20 per seat. The sale aggregated 825 seats, and the premiums $5123, or an average of about $6.22 per ticket for the 24 concerts. Many of the tickets found their way into the hands of the regular dealers in such matters, especially the seats which were not deemed desirable by the buyers for personal use. There were a few amusing cases of rivalry during the sale, Mr. S. B. Schlesinger advancing the premium from $4 to $12.50 to get his usual seats, and Mr. E. Paige paying $20.50 premium each for seats which seemed desirable to him. The sale was conducted with perfect fairness, and every one appeared satisfied with the method taken to distribute the tickets offered for competition.

Only a portion of the seats in Music Hall will be sold at auction for the Symphony concerts of this season, and the seats to be sold will be offered in regular order, instead of the choice of all seats being put up as first announced.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

To the Editor of the Herald: Why does Mr. Higginson use such peculiar methods in putting before the public his noble scheme of symphony concerts, subsidized by him for the benefit of Boston? This inquiry is uppermost in the minds of many people, who rejoice at his liberality and the happy direction of his thought that had intended most unusual opportunities for musical culture among all who would avail themselves.

That his fine concerts do not reach the public he intends, is because the manner of selling the seats is wrong. This course of 24 concerts, given in a hall which seats over 2,000, would afford opportunity to over 50,000 people each season, if the seats were sold singly for the separate concerts. But, instead of an open sale, continuing through the season, with a chance for everybody, the seats for the two courses already given have been sold by the season, thus permitting the exclusive patronage of a limited number. While, for next season, a plan to sell the choice of seats for the entire series at auction is said to have been determined upon, the most generous critic of Mr. Higginson must surely feel aggrieved that a well-meant public benefit and of such exceptional worth should be frustrated at its inception through ignorance of the right way to put it forth; for while the low price of admission, if single tickets were the rule, would embrace everybody and result in a general broadening of musical knowledge, the necessity to pay for a whole course at a given time establishes a barrier against its enjoyment for very many who desire its privileges. The theatre appeals to a varying public, and its lessons are widespread, because it is open to all. These symphony concerts should not become the exclusive property of an already well favored class, and as their continuance is probable, to the disestablishment of all similar enterprises, I most earnestly ask for a simple plan of admission which will admit, not keep out, all who would like to avail themselves of their advantages. The result of selling the seats for the single concerts without regard to the course, could not lessen the total receipts by the present method, and seems the one way to fully carry out the idea of the founder.

AMATEUR.

Certainly no one can complain of favoritism in the distribution of tickets for the Symphony Concerts this year, when Mr. George Higginson, the father of the founder of the concerts, pays the highest premium of anybody for seats!

The purchaser of a group of expensive seats at the symphony concert auction on Monday inquired of his neighbor, Mr. Thomas Ryan, why Mr. Henschel sold his tickets himself, and the auctioneer was Mr. Henshaw. Such is fame and personality. But then Mr. Ryan has often heard himself pointed out as "Mr. Mendelssohn!"

The tickets for Mr. Higginson's orchestral concerts this year are to go by auction. This will be more profitable to the projector than the old method; but Beacon Hill and Back Bay competition will probably effectually remove the course from the designation of "too cheap." The sale will open on Monday, the 17th, and premiums for the best seats will be accepted on a basis of $6 and $12 for tickets, according to location of places. The best places will be taken briskly enough.

The Boston Symphony concerts are to commence next Saturday evening, at Music Hall, and will be preceded, as last season, by a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, which will be practically the same as the concert. The orchestra contains much new talent, as well as the best of the old, and its work will undoubtedly constitute the backbone of the Boston musical season.

Mr. Georg Henschel withdrew his pianoforte concerto from the Richter concert programme in London because of the insufficient time given to its rehearsal by the orchestra. It appears, therefore, that even Hans Richter has some trouble with this matter of rehearsals, as it is stated that his players arrive at and leave rehearsals according as their other engagements permit.

Among the passengers by the Cunard steamship Cephalonia, which reached her dock late yesterday afternoon, was Mr. Georg Henschel, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, who has been abroad since May upon a tour for pleasure and the pursuit of new music for the coming season of concerts here. Mr. Henschel was accompanied by his wife, and both these artists have returned in excellent health.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Dedication of the House.) . . . BEETHOVEN.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Xerxes.) . . . HÆNDEL.

SYMPHONY in C, No. 2, op. 42. (Ocean.) . . . RUBINSTEIN.

Allegro maestoso.—Adagio.—Allegro.—Adagio.—
Scherzo. (Presto).—Adagio; Allegro con fuoco.—

ENTR'ACTE. (La Colombe.) . . . GOUNOD.

RECITATIVE AND SONG. (The Martyr of Antioch.) . . . SULLIVAN.

MARCH in B minor. . . . SCHUBERT-LISZT

SOLOIST:

MISS HOPE GLENN.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Xerxes.) HÆNDEL.

RECIT.: Frondi tenere e belle
Del mio platano amato,
Per voi risplende il fato;
Tuoni, lampi e procelle
Non voltragino mai la cara pace,
Ne giunga a profanarvi austro rapace!

AIR: Ombra mai fu
Di vegetabile, cara ed amabile,
Soave più.

RECIT. AND SONG. (The Martyr of Antioch.) SULLIVAN.

RECIT.: The maids lift up their hymn around the temple,
Now lead the Priestess forth to hear her doom,
To worship at Apollo's shrine or die.

SONG: Io Pæan! as we sing,
Light our smoking censers swing,
And each laden basket showers
All its painted store of flowers.
Io Pæan! Clarian God,
Come and fill thy proud abode.

Io Pæan! we behold
Naught but walls that flame with gold,
Long retiring colonnades
Crowded with the sacred maids.
Io Pæan! youth divine,
Open thou thy sacred shrine.

Io Pæan! we adore thee,
Phœbus, low we bow before thee,
Io Pæan! Lycian King!
Syria's crowding myriads sing.
Io Pæan! Heav'n and earth
Mingle in our holy mirth.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (Dedication of the House).....Beethoven.
Recitative and air (Xerxes).....Handel.
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42 (Ocean).....Rubinstein.
Entr'acte (La Colombe).....Gounod.
Recitative and song (The Mayor of Antioch).....Sullivan.
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt.

Again the great series of concerts which form the nucleus of Boston's musical season, have begun their round, and judging from the size of the audience, its character, and its enthusiasm, the public have as great a love for symphonic forms as ever. It is scarcely necessary to say a word about the character of the audience; the fable that these concerts are for the great unwashed has long since been abandoned, and we cannot quarrel with the mission of popularizing symphonies among the wealthier classes. We might more justly inquire why the first concert invariably brings forth the "Dedication of the House," by Beethoven. The house has been thrice dedicated by Mr. Henschel, and several times before Mr. Henschel came among us. It begins to have something of a stilted effect, this beginning of each season with a solemn "dedication." It was performed in excellent style, however, and displayed at once the fact that the orchestra was not inferior to its predecessors. New faces were to be seen among the musicians, but the most marked improvement was noticeable in the wood wind, which last season was noticeably out of tune and time on more than one occasion.

Mr. Henschel's conducting calls for but few remarks; was about the same, neither better nor worse, although less demonstrative than last season. The "Ocean Symphony" proved that he is thoroughly in sympathy with the broad massive style of the moderns, far more than with the sweet, limpid or clear vein of Mozart, Haydn or Cherubini. The burst of applause which greeted him as he took the conductor's stand must have placed him at once en rapport with his audience.

The "Ocean Symphony" was not a very good method of "lightening the programmes." Rubinstein seems to have felt that the immensity of the subject demanded over a half dozen movements to do it justice, but the fact is that the interior movements add to the tedium rather than to the greatness of the work. The first movement is in every way a noble one, its chief theme is broad and majestic, and admits of fine development, an opportunity which is used with artistic effect. It is rather subjective than objective, if we except the lillowy figure in the contrabasses. The second movement is in the St. Saens school of whirled and chromatics. The fourth, in its long, sustained note picturing immensity recalls the similar effect used by Mendelssohn, in the violins, in "Becalmed at Sea." The final movement almost rivals the first in majesty, and eclipses it in contrapuntal work. The performance of the first movement was altogether praiseworthy. The strings showed that they had gained in unity and expression, and not lost in power. The wood wind and brass were well balanced and thorough. But alas! the extreme heat of the evening soon told on audience conductor and orchestra alike, and the strings especially began to become irregular and demoralized. Every violin seemed to be a viol of wrath, and fired off its volley of broken strings at unexpected moments. It is scarcely fair to make too much of these almost unavoidable accidents.

The reading was a good one, and the performance especially in its first movements, had points of much excellence. The entr'acte which followed, was a sop to Cerberus; a cloying bit of united violin, and triangle sweetness. The Schubert March was in strong contrast to this, strong and stirring.

Miss Hope Glenn, the vocalist of the concert, never appeared to such good advantage in Boston. Heretofore she has chiefly been heard in the trivial English drawing-room ballads; in this programme the nobility and power of her voice had better scope. Her numbers were given in a broad, well-phrased manner, and if we say there was a shade of tremulous forcing in the sustained note in the cadence of the first number, and a slight flattening and insipidity in the recitative of the second, we have said all the most rigorous criticism could detect. She won the most abundant applause.

The orchestra was placed in very much the same manner as last season, the division of the strings being about the same, although the platform idea seems to have been partially abandoned. One change was noticeable, the solitary contrabassist (as marked a man as James's "solitary horseman"), that musical hermit who stood like a tonal "missing link," to put the wood-wind on a speaking acquaintance with the brass, has left his post at the rear of the orchestra.

In closing this review of the first of the great series of concerts, we cannot but praise the discipline which Mr. Henschel has inaugurated; the prompt beginning, the refusal of encores, the closing of the doors during the first piece, etc., are steps in the right direction, and do good even to the most cultivated concert-goers. But if ever a symphony of the length of Rubinstein's comes into Mr. Henschel's hands again, we will lend him a stout pair of scissors.

* * * As the audience was going out at the end of the symphony concert at Music Hall last Saturday night, a lady gushingly exclaimed to a friend: Oh! I think that Ocean Symphony perfectly delicious," with a strong emphasis on the "delicious." "Oh! yes," replied the other, fervently. "I vow, at times I felt just as I did when we crossed in the Cephalonia."

Opening of the Symphony Concert Season.

The third season of entertainments by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was opened at Music Hall Saturday evening with a concert, for which the following programme was provided:

Overture, "Dedication of the House".....Beethoven.
Recitation and air, "Xerxes".....Handel.
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean".....Rubinstein.
Entr'acte, "La Colombe".....Gounod.
Recitation and Song, "Martyr of Antioch".....Sullivan.
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt.

The audience was small, considering the large sale of season tickets, a considerable portion of the purchasers evidently failing to find in the programme sufficient attraction to draw them out into the air of a warm and oppressive evening. The provision for the concert was, in fact, notably heavy and without spice, and it was served in a style which was on the whole rather slow and uninteresting. It is not to be supposed that anybody would go very far to hear the Beethoven overture, since it has been performed at the initial concert in each of the two previous seasons of this orchestra and elsewhere, and at other times so frequently that, being in no respect a particularly representative work of its author, the gloss of interest has been very thoroughly rubbed from it. The "Ocean Symphony" of Rubinstein is, however, so little known here that one would think the announcement of its production would draw out a large attendance from our music lovers. Whether the second or third performance to which one might be treated would continue the interest, may, however, be questioned. The work has power and shows the

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Xerxes.) . HÆNDEL.

RECIT.: Frondi tenere e belle
Del mio platano amato,
Per voi risplende il fato;
Tuoni, lampi e procelle
Non voltraggino mai la cara pace,
Ne giunga a profanarvi austro rapace!

AIR: Ombra mai fu
Di vegetabile, cara ed amabile,
Soave più.

RECIT. AND SONG. (The Martyr of Antioch.) SULLIVAN.

RECIT.: The maids lift up their hymn around the
temple,
Now lead the Priestess forth to hear her doom,
To worship at Apollo's shrine or die.

SONG: Io Pæan! as we sing,
Light our smoking censers swing,
And each laden basket showers
All its painted store of flowers.
Io Pæan! Clarian God,
Come and fill thy proud abode.

Io Pæan! we behold
Naught but walls that flame with gold,
Long retiring colonnades
Crowded with the sacred maids.
Io Pæan! youth divine,
Open thou thy sacred shrine.

Io Pæan! we adore thee,
Phœbus, low we bow before thee,
Io Pæan! Lycian King!
Syria's crowding myriads sing.
Io Pæan! Heav'n and earth
Mingle in our holy mirth.

MUSIC. Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (Dedication of the House).....Beethoven.
Recitative and air (Xerxes).....Handel.
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42 (Ocean).....Rubinstein.
Entr'acte (La Colombe).....Gounod.
Recitative and song (The Mayor of Antioch)....Sullivan.
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt.

Again the great series of concerts which form the nucleus of Boston's musical season, have begun their round, and judging from the size of the audience, its character, and its enthusiasm, the public have as great a love for symphonic forms as ever. It is scarcely necessary to say a word about the character of the audience; the fact that these concerts are for the great unwashed has long since been abandoned, and we cannot quarrel with the mission of popularizing symphonies among the wealthier classes. We might more justly inquire why the first concert invariably brings forth the "Dedication of the House," by Beethoven. The house has been thrice dedicated by Mr. Henschel, and several times before Mr. Henschel came among us. It begins to have something of a stilted effect, this beginning of each season with a solemn "dedication." It was performed in excellent style, however, and displayed at once the fact that the orchestra was not inferior to its predecessors. New faces were to be seen among the musicians, but the most marked improvement was noticeable in the wood wind, which last season was noticeably out of tune and time on more than one occasion.

Mr. Henschel's conducting calls for but few remarks; was about the same, neither better nor worse, although less demonstrative than last season. The "Ocean Symphony" proved that he is thoroughly in sympathy with the broad massive style of the moderns, far more than with the sweet, limpid or clear vein of Mozart, Haydn or Cherubini. The burst of applause which greeted him as he took the conductor's stand must have placed him at once en rapport with his audience.

The "Ocean Symphony" was not a very good method of "lightening the programmes." Rubinstein seems to have felt that the immensity of the subject demanded over a half dozen movements to do it justice, but the fact is that the interior movements add to the tedium rather than to the greatness of the work. The first movement is in every way a noble one, its chief theme is broad and majestic, and admits of fine development, an opportunity which is used with artistic effect. It is rather subjective than objective, if we except the billowy figure in the contrabasses. The second movement is in the St. Saens school of whirls and chromatics. The fourth, in its long, sustained note picturing immensity recalls the similar effect used by Mendelssohn, in the violins, in "Becalmed at Sea." The final movement almost rivals the first in majesty, and eclipses it in contrapuntal work. The performance of the first movement was altogether praiseworthy. The strings showed that they had gained in unity and expression, and not lost in power. The wood wind and brass were well balanced and thorough. But alas! the extreme heat of the evening soon told on audience conductor and orchestra alike, and the strings especially began to become irregular and demoralized. Every violin seemed to be a viol of wrath, and fired off its volley of broken strings at unexpected moments. It is scarcely fair to make too much of these almost unavoidable accidents.

The reading was a good one, and the performance especially in its first movements, had points of much excellence. The entr'acte which followed, was a sop to Cerberus; a cloying bit of united violin, and triangle sweetness. The Schubert March was in strong contrast to this, strong and stirring.

Miss Hope Glenn, the vocalist of the concert, never appeared to such good advantage in Boston. Heretofore she has chiefly been heard in the trivial English drawing-room ballads; in this programme the nobility and power of her voice had better scope. Her numbers were given in a broad, well-phrased manner, and if we say there was a shade of tremulous forcing in the sustained note in the cadence of the first number, and a slight flattening and insipidity in the recitative of the second, we have said all the most rigorous criticism could detect. She won the most abundant applause.

The orchestra was placed in very much the same manner as last season, the division of the strings being about the same, although the platform idea seems to have been partially abandoned. One change was noticeable, the solitary contrabassist (as marked a man as James's "solitary horseman"), that musical hermit who stood like a tonal "missing link," to put the wood-wind on a speaking acquaintance with the brass, has left his post at the rear of the orchestra.

In closing this review of the first of the great series of concerts, we cannot but praise the discipline which Mr. Henschel has inaugurated; the prompt beginning, the refusal of encores, the closing of the doors during the first piece, etc., are steps in the right direction, and do good even to the most cultivated concert-goers. But if ever a symphony of the length of Rubenstein's comes into Mr. Henschel's hands again, we will lend him a stout pair of scissors.

 As the audience was going out at the end of the symphony concert at Music Hall last Saturday night, a lady gushingly exclaimed to a friend: Oh! I think that Ocean Symphony perfectly delicious," with a strong emphasis on the "delicious." "Oh! yes," replied the other, fervently. "I vow, at times I felt just as I did when we crossed in the Cephalonia."

Opening of the Symphony Concert Season.

The third season of entertainments by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was opened at Music Hall Saturday evening with a concert, for which the following programme was provided:

Overture, "Dedication of the House".....Beethoven.
Recitation and air, "Xerxes".....Handel.
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean".....Rubinstein.
Entr'acte, "La Colombe".....Gounod.
Recitation and Song, "Martyr of Antioch"....Sullivan.
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt.

The audience was small, considering the large sale of season tickets, a considerable portion of the purchasers evidently failing to find in the programme sufficient attraction to draw them out into the air of a warm and oppressive evening. The provision for the concert was, in fact, notably heavy and without spice, and it was served in a style which was on the whole rather slow and uninteresting. It is not to be supposed that anybody would go very far to hear the Beethoven overture, since it has been performed at the initial concert in each of the two previous seasons of this orchestra and elsewhere, and at other times so frequently that, being in no respect a particularly representative work of its author, the gloss of interest has been very thoroughly rubbed from it. The "Ocean Symphony" of Rubinstein is, however, so little known here that one would think the announcement of its production would draw out a large attendance from our music lovers. Whether the second or third performance to which one might be treated would continue the interest, may, however, be questioned. The work has power and shows the hand and mind of a musical master. Rubinstein himself evidently fully appreciated the vastness and force of the sea, its gloom and its brightness, its treacherous calm and its resistless might in storm; his music, however, not only fails to present to the hearer these qualities in the ocean, which may be admitted to be beyond the ability of wind and string instruments to produce, but also falls far short of suggesting them. In fact, with the exception of the first movement and part of the last, there is little in movement, description or spirit which gives a hint of the source from which the subject of the symphony was derived. The immensity of the ocean may be admitted to be suggested by the inordinate length of the composition—it took nearly an hour and a half for the orchestra to play the first two numbers on the programme—and the monotony of the watery world is certainly typified by the general dullness of the four middle movements. The first movement is worth hearing many times, and the last is capable of exciting a deep and permanent interest, but the remainder of the work might well be forgotten and no particular loss experienced. The entr'acte music from "La Colombe" is a dainty and agreeable work, of no particular value or strength either for good, or bad, but very pleasing Saturday night in the general sombreness of the programme.

Mr. Henschel, on resuming his post as conductor for the season, was warmly received. As his direction last season showed more of repose and less of extravagance than in the previous year, so now he seems to be even less demonstrative than when he opened the concert a twelve-month ago. No style could have been more quiet than his on Saturday evening, but he seemed to have fairly good control over his forces. His forces, however, are men who are experts with their individual instruments and know as much about concerted playing as he does, and judging by the composed way in which they perform their work without paying much attention to his baton, they would not go far astray if left to themselves to keep in time and maintain the ensemble. After two years of experiment in novel and unusual ways of seating the orchestra, this year a return to the normal method has been made. The raised platforms of last season are given up; the first and second violins are, respectively, on the left and right of the conductor; the violas are in front of him and the wind instruments at the back of the stage, while the basses and violoncellos are equally divided upon either side. In the first two numbers the orchestral work was rather rough and unsteady, while the use of the brasses in the Symphony was harsh and untuneful. The other works, however, were well performed, and, in any case, much allowance must be made for the first performance by an orchestra that contains many new members. The heat of the evening evidently had an unfortunate effect upon the violins, and the snapping of parting strings was noticeable at frequent intervals, even Mr. Listemann, the leader of the orchestra, being compelled to stop in the last measure of the Symphony to repair damages.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Hope Glenn, whose beautiful contralto voice was never heard to greater advantage here. In the Handel aria she had fine opportunity for the display of her more serious power, and showed herself to be a singer capable of rendering with intelligence and power the graver and deeper forms of music as well as with delicacy and pure sentimental force the ballads and operatic selections with which she has become familiar to us on former occasions. The song from "The Martyr of Antioch" was excellently performed—so well, in fact, that its triviality and weakness of treatment stood out all the more conspicuously for the pains that had been spent upon it by the singer.

At next Saturday evening's concert the programme will be: Overture, "Prometheus," Bargiel; Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes, Mozart; Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; Symphonic Poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns. The soloists are to be Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga Von Radecki. The usual public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The first of the present season's series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The galleries were well filled, but there were many large patches of empty seats on the ground floor. This, in view of the struggle that took place at the auction sale to secure seats, and the large premiums that were paid to obtain them, would seem to indicate that it was not, in every case, the privilege of hearing the music that was wanted, but the prestige of having secured a seat or two at an advance price. At all events, there was a remarkable number of empty seats, and this, too, at the opening concert. There were also a dull programme and a dull audience, which latter only waked to animation after Miss Hope Glenn had sung an example of what must have been Sir Arthur Sullivan's idea of a comic oratorio recitative and aria. It was a dreadful piece of trash, but it won more applause than any of the other selections. Mr. Henschel was pleasantly received upon his first appearance. He has returned this season to the normal method of seating the orchestra. The raised platforms of last year were abandoned. The first violins were on one side and the second violins on the other side of the conductor. The violas were in front of him, and the basses and cellos were equally divided on either side of the stage. The wind instruments were at the back, but on the same level with the strings. The concert opened with a spirited performance of Beethoven's much-heard "Dedication of the House" overture. The strings played rather coarsely, and this fault was observable through the performances; and the wood-wind instruments were exceptionally capricious in respect to correct intonation by far too frequently. The symphony was Rubinstein's No. 2, in C, called "The Ocean." It was given entire, which was somewhat of an infliction, considering the monotony of the work and its exasperating length. The first movement is perhaps the finest thing its composer has ever written, and to our mind is the only portion of the symphony that repays the hearing. The rest of it is strangely dry when it is remembered that it was written to typify in tone so vast an expanse of wet. The brass was too blatant throughout, and the strings too scratchy. The interpretation generally was rough, uneven and hard, and there were not always that precision in attack and that steadiness in unity so desirable for the best results. In the trio of the Scherzo this want of precision was particularly noticeable. However, the orchestra has had a long rest, and will doubtless do better when it has been longer in training and becomes more warmed to its work. A novelty in the performance was a delicious entr'acte to "La Colombe," by Gounod. It is extremely poetical in fancy, and exquisitely delicate in grace and expression. The instrumentation is full of charm and beauty. This selection was admirably rendered, and met with an instant appreciation from the more thoughtful portion of the audience. The concert ended with Schubert's March in B-minor, instrumented by Liszt, who has given a fine orchestral setting to this impressive and characteristic work. The lovely trio has been treated by him in a tasteful and sympathetic manner, above all praise. This number was vigorously and excellently played. Miss Hope Glenn was the soloist. Her fine voice, clear enunciation, purity of intonation, and broad style were heard to the fullest advantage in the recitative "Fronde toner" and the aria "Ombra mai" from Handel's "Xerxes." The aria is one of the master's most fresh and pleasing themes, and afforded the artist ample opportunity for the display of some admirable sostenuto singing. Had her phrasing been less formal and her expression more sincere, her rendering of this selection would have left but little if anything to desire. She was heartily encored at its conclusion. Her other contribution to the concert was Sullivan's weak and frivolous "Io Pæan," from "The Martyr of Antioch," before referred to, and for the singing of which the artist was thrice recalled.

At the next concert the programme will be: Overture, "Prometheus," Bargiel; Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes, Mozart; Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; Symphonic Poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns. The soloists are to be Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga Von Radecki.

The first of the twenty-four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The only empty seats were a few on the floor of the hall. It seemed as if the last concert of the last season had been given a week ago, for the audience was familiar, the same faces appearing here and there, and everything was natural and homelike. Mr. Henschel was greeted most warmly when he stepped forward and rapped the orchestra and audience to order. The many well-known gentlemen in the orchestra were also greeted, though silently, yet heartily, by all who have grown accustomed to watching and hearing them in these concerts. The programme for the evening was thoroughly characteristic of Mr. Henschel, and, it seems to us, in good taste. It was as follows:

Overture (Dedication of the House).....Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Xerxes).....Handel
Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 42 (Ocean).....Rubinstein
Allegro maestoso. Adagio. Allegro. Adagio.
Scherzo. (Presto.) Adagio; Allegro con fuoco.
Entr'acte (La Colombe).....Gounod
Recitative and Song (The Martyr of Antioch).....Sullivan

March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt

The rendition of the above numbers will undoubtedly reawaken many of the discussions as to the conductor's ability and success in his position. But, however he may be rated, when his results are compared with the results of the best European conductors, it cannot be denied that he is thoroughly satisfactory to his audience, and it is, on the whole, a musical audience. Few attend the symphony concerts from any motive but to enjoy the rare treats set before them in the masterpieces of the greatest composers. There are those who go to learn, who watch minutely, and with some degree of critical acuteness, every phrase in the music, every effect of coloring in the orchestration, every motion of the director. These are critics from a sense of duty to themselves, and not from any carping desire to show their erudition, if they have any, by picking flaws. To them it often occurs as an honest doubt whether certain rough, ungainly noises from the strings are intended as strong effects by the composer, or whether under more skilful leadership they might appear clearer and more musical. But whatever doubts suggest themselves from time to time they must and ought to be very few who do not feel a sense of gratitude to the men who are at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We heartily commend the judgment shown in the choice of the programmes as exemplified by the one quoted above and the one advertised for next Saturday. The Beethoven overture has become very familiar to Boston audiences, and it will ever continue to be a popular and attractive work. It was rendered well. The lights and shades were well preserved throughout, and the whole piece moved off with a crispness and accuracy that were most satisfactory. The Ocean symphony is not entirely new here, but it is a work that demands several hearings to do it full justice. Rubinstein is nothing if not original in his departures from the beaten track. There are constantly recurring places in every movement of the symphony that demand the most respectful attention, by reason of their musical worth; that charm by their exquisite melody, and fascinate by the bright treatment in instrumentation. There are on the other hand, in the first movement especially, passages of exceeding coarseness; effects which only the wildest imagination can consider musical or intelligible. They seem to betray a certain lack of concentration, as if one portion of the orchestra were pitted against the other, so that no unity appears in the tones produced. But the symphony improves in interest throughout each of its movements. The two adagio movements and the scherzo are wonderfully interesting, and the finale of the allegro con fuoco is grandeur itself. The close attention required to follow so long and great a work throughout was finely set off and contrasted in the remaining orchestral numbers. The entr'acte from La Colombe is a most exquisite gem, a model of clearness, and very popular. The march is thoroughly interesting, and both numbers were given well, leaving nothing to be desired. The soloist of the evening was Miss Hope Glenn. Her voice is well known to Boston now, and appeared to good advantage last evening, especially in the Handel air, which she sang with excellent expression. The song from Sullivan is one of those skilfully-written pieces which arouse the interest and enthusiasm of everybody, even on a first hearing, in spite of themselves. Miss Glenn won the house by her singing of it, being doubly recalled. But if her voice had been a little stronger, and her tones at times more dramatic and full of fire, the enthusiasm would have known no bounds. It is one of the best efforts of Sullivan in this line of composition.

It is probable that many will think it would have been wiser to open the season with a programme of more strength; with one whose popularity would have drawn unlimited crowds and created unbounded enthusiasm. But we think otherwise. These concerts are firmly established in popular esteem; they need no clap-trap or clamor of trumpets to announce them, and the opening of the new series can be truly said to have been thoroughly successful, and we look forward to a better season than ever before.

"Trial By Jury" and "Pinafore" at the Bijou.

It was the last chance to hear opera at the Bijou for six weeks, and, naturally, the pretty little theatre was crowded last night. A special bill had been arranged for the occasion. First came "H. M. S. Pinafore," with the same cast as on Thursday evening, and the performance was extremely good, arousing frequent applause. By way of close there was represented in very brisk style, "Trial by Jury." Rose Stella, who had a very cordial greeting, was the plaintiff, and a most attractive one. She sang with unusual spirit, and her success, therefore, was pronounced. Mr. Frank Daniels made a fairly good impression as the judge, and much the same thing is to be said of Mr. Wilkinson's performance as the counsel for plaintiff. Very satisfactory proved Mr. Bell as the defendant; and Mr. Kammerlee should have a good word for his work as the usher. What Mrs. Gamp would call "The British Judy" was an extremely lively body, and some of the "business" with the most mature of the twelve may safely be pronounced without a parallel on the comic opera stage. The audience laughed very heartily over the performance, which was never suffered to lag for a moment. Sullivan's original orchestration of "Trial by Jury" was heard for the first time in Boston, and Mr. Brahman's orchestra did excellently. Though only announced for a single representation, "Trial by Jury" had evidently been well rehearsed.

The first of the season's symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, attracting a very large audience, the vacant seats being but few and far between, and the audience was mainly made up of the very best class of our citizens to all appearances. The programme was thus composed: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; recitative and air, "Xerxes," Handel; symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean," Rubinstein; entr'acte, "La Colombe," Gounod; recitative and song, "The Martyr of Antioch," Sullivan; march in B-minor, Schubert-Liszt; Miss Hope Glenn being the soloist of the occasion. It will be seen that the great bur-

hand and mind of a musical master. Rubinstein himself evidently fully appreciated the vastness and force of the sea, its gloom and its brightness, its treacherous calm and its resistless might in storm; his music, however, not only fails to present to the hearer these qualities in the ocean, which may be admitted to be beyond the ability of wind and string instruments to produce, but also falls far short of suggesting them. In fact, with the exception of the first movement and part of the last, there is little in movement, description or spirit which gives a hint of the source from which the subject of the symphony was derived. The immensity of the ocean may be admitted to be suggested by the inordinate length of the composition—it took nearly an hour and a half for the orchestra to play the first two numbers on the programme—and the monotony of the watery world is certainly typified by the general dullness of the four middle movements. The first movement is worth hearing many times, and the last is capable of exciting a deep and permanent interest, but the remainder of the work might well be forgotten and no particular loss experienced. The entr'acte music from "La Colombe" is a dainty and agreeable work, of no particular value or strength either for good, or bad, but very pleasing Saturday night in the general sombreness of the programme.

Mr. Henschel, on resuming his post as conductor for the season, was warmly received. As his direction last season showed more of repose and less of extravagance than in the previous year, so now he seems to be even less demonstrative than when he opened the concert a twelve-month ago. No style could have been more quiet than his on Saturday evening, but he seemed to have fairly good control over his forces. His forces, however, are men who are experts with their individual instruments and know as much about concerted playing as he does, and judging by the composed way in which they perform their work without paying much attention to his baton, they would not go far astray if left to themselves to keep in time and maintain the ensemble. After two years of experiment in novel and unusual ways of seating the orchestra, this year a return to the normal method has been made. The raised platforms of last season are given up; the first and second violins are, respectively, on the left and right of the conductor; the violas are in front of him and the wind instruments at the back of the stage, while the basses and violoncellos are equally divided upon either side. In the first two numbers the orchestral work was rather rough and unsteady, while the use of the brasses in the Symphony was harsh and untuneful. The other works, however, were well performed, and, in any case, much allowance must be made for the first performance by an orchestra that contains many new members. The heat of the evening evidently had an unfortunate effect upon the violins, and the snapping of parting strings was noticeable at frequent intervals, even Mr. Listemann, the leader of the orchestra, being compelled to stop in the last measure of the Symphony to repair damages.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Hope Glenn, whose beautiful contralto voice was never heard to greater advantage here. In the Handel aria she had fine opportunity for the display of her more serious power, and showed herself to be a singer capable of rendering with intelligence and power the graver and deeper forms of music as well as with delicacy and pure sentimental force the ballads and operatic selections with which she has become familiar to us on former occasions. The song from "The Martyr of Antioch" was excellently performed—so well, in fact, that its triviality and weakness of treatment stood out all the more conspicuously for the pains that had been spent upon it by the singer.

At next Saturday evening's concert the programme will be: Overture, "Prometheus," Bargiel; Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes, Mozart; Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; Symphonic Poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns. The soloists are to be Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga Von Radecki. The usual public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The first of the present season's series of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The galleries were well filled, but there were many large patches of empty seats on the ground floor. This, in view of the struggle that took place at the auction sale to secure seats, and the large premiums that were paid to obtain them, would seem to indicate that it was not, in every case, the privilege of hearing the music that was wanted, but the prestige of having secured a seat or two at an advance price. At all events, there was a remarkable number of empty seats, and this, too, at the opening concert. There were also a dull programme and a dull audience, which latter only waked to animation after Miss Hope Glenn had sung an example of what must have been Sir Arthur Sullivan's idea of a comic oratorio recitative and aria. It was a dreadful piece of trash, but it won more applause than any of the other selections. Mr. Henschel was pleasantly received upon his first appearance. He has returned this season to the normal method of seating the orchestra. The raised platforms of last year were abandoned. The first violins were on one side and the second violins on the other side of the conductor. The violas were in front of him, and the basses and cellos were equally divided on either side of the stage. The wind instruments were at the back, but on the same level with the strings. The concert opened with a spirited performance of Beethoven's much-heard "Dedication of the House" overture. The strings played rather coarsely, and this fault was observable through the performances; and the wood-wind instruments were exceptionally capricious in respect to correct intonation by far too frequently. The symphony was Rubinstein's No. 2, in C, called "The Ocean." It was given entire, which was somewhat of an infliction, considering the monotony of the work and its exasperating length. The first movement is perhaps the finest thing its composer has ever written, and to our mind is the only portion of the symphony that repays the hearing. The rest of it is strangely dry when it is remembered that it was written to typify in tone so vast an expanse of wet. The brass was too blatant throughout, and the strings too scratchy. The interpretation generally was rough, uneven and hard, and there were not always that precision in attack and that steadiness in unity so desirable for the best results. In the trio of the Scherzo this want of precision was particularly noticeable. However, the orchestra has had a long rest, and will doubtless do better when it has been longer in training and becomes more warmed to its work. A novelty in the performance was a delicious entr'acte to "La Colombe," by Gounod. It is extremely poetical in fancy, and exquisitely delicate in grace and expression. The instrumentation is full of charm and beauty. This selection was admirably rendered, and met with an instant appreciation from the more thoughtful portion of the audience. The concert ended with Schubert's March in B-minor, instrumented by Liszt, who has given a fine orchestral setting to this impressive and characteristic work. The lovely trio has been treated by him in a tasteful and sympathetic manner, above all praise. This number was vigorously and excellently played. Miss Hope Glenn was the soloist. Her fine voice, clear enunciation, purity of intonation, and broad style were heard to the fullest advantage in the recitative "Fronde tenere" and the aria "Ombra mal" from Handel's "Xerxes." The aria is one of the master's most fresh and pleasing themes, and afforded the artist ample opportunity for the display of some admirable sostenuto singing. Had her phrasing been less formal and her expression more sincere, her rendering of this selection would have left but little if anything to desire. She was heartily encored at its conclusion. Her other contribution to the concert was Sullivan's weak and frivolous "Io Pæan," from "The Martyr of Antioch," before referred to, and for the singing of which the artist was thrice recalled.

At the next concert the programme will be: Overture, "Prometheus," Bargiel; Concerto, E-flat, for two pianofortes, Mozart; Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; Symphonic Poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns. The soloists are to be Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga Von Radecki.

The first of the twenty-four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The only empty seats were a few on the floor of the hall. It seemed as if the last concert of the last season had been given a week ago, for the audience was familiar, the same faces appearing here and there, and everything was natural and home-like. Mr. Henschel was greeted most warmly when he stepped forward and rapped the orchestra and audience to order. The many well-known gentlemen in the orchestra were also greeted, though silently, yet heartily, by all who have grown accustomed to watching and hearing them in these concerts. The programme for the evening was thoroughly characteristic of Mr. Henschel, and, it seems to us, in good taste. It was as follows:

Overture (Dedication of the House).....Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Xerxes).....Handel
Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 42 (Ocean).....Rubinstein
Allegro maestoso. Adagio. Allegro. Adagio.
Scherzo. (Presto.) Adagio; Allegro con fuoco.
Entr'acte (La Colombe).....Gounod
Recitative and Song (The Martyr of Antioch).....Sullivan

March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt

The rendition of the above numbers will undoubtedly reawaken many of the discussions as to the conductor's ability and success in his position. But, however he may be rated, when his results are compared with the results of the best European conductors, it cannot be denied that he is thoroughly satisfactory to his audience, and it is, on the whole, a musical audience. Few attend the symphony concerts from any motive but to enjoy the rare treats set before them in the masterpieces of the greatest composers. There are those who go to learn, who watch minutely, and with some degree of critical acuteness, every phrase in the music, every effect of coloring in the orchestration, every motion of the director. These are critics from a sense of duty to themselves, and not from any carping desire to show their erudition, if they have any, by picking flaws. To them it often occurs as an honest doubt whether certain rough, ungainly noises from the strings are intended as strong effects by the composer, or whether under more skillful leadership they might appear clearer and more musical. But whatever doubts suggest themselves from time to time they must and ought to be very few who do not feel a sense of gratitude to the men who are at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We heartily commend the judgment shown in the choice of the programmes as exemplified by the one quoted above and the one advertised for next Saturday. The Beethoven overture has become very familiar to Boston audiences, and it will ever continue to be a popular and attractive work. It was rendered well. The lights and shades were well preserved throughout, and the whole piece moved off with a crispness and accuracy that were most satisfactory. The Ocean symphony is not entirely new here, but it is a work that demands several hearings to do it full justice. Rubinstein is nothing if not original in his departures from the beaten track. There are constantly recurring places in every movement of the symphony that demand the most respectful attention, by reason of their musical worth; that charm by their exquisite melody, and fascinate by the bright treatment in instrumentation. There are on the other hand, in the first movement especially, passages of exceeding coarseness; effects which only the wildest imagination can consider musical or intelligible. They seem to betray a certain lack of concentration, as if one portion of the orchestra were pitted against the other, so that no unity appears in the tones produced. But the symphony improves in interest throughout each of its movements. The two adagio movements and the scherzo are wonderfully interesting, and the finale of the allegro con fuoco is grandeur itself. The close attention required to follow so long and great a work throughout was finely set off and contrasted in the remaining orchestral numbers. The entr'acte from La Colombe is a most exquisite gem, a model of clearness, and very popular. The march is thoroughly interesting, and both numbers were given well, leaving nothing to be desired. The soloist of the evening was Miss Hope Glenn. Her voice is well known to Boston now, and appeared to good advantage last evening, especially in the Handel air, which she sang with excellent expression. The song from Sullivan is one of those skilfully-written pieces which arouse the interest and enthusiasm of everybody, even on a first hearing, in spite of themselves. Miss Glenn won the house by her singing of it, being doubly recalled. But if her voice had been a little stronger, and her tones at times more dramatic and full of fire, the enthusiasm would have known no bounds. It is one of the best efforts of Sullivan in this line of composition.

It is probable that many will think it would have been wiser to open the season with a programme of more strength; with one whose popularity would have drawn unlimited crowds and created unbounded enthusiasm. But we think otherwise. These concerts are firmly established in popular esteem; they need no clap-trap or clamor of trumpets to announce them, and the opening of the new series can be truly said to have been thoroughly successful, and we look forward to a better season than ever before.

"Trial By Jury" and "Pinafore" at the Bijou.

It was the last chance to hear opera at the Bijou for six weeks, and, naturally, the pretty little theatre was crowded last night. A special bill had been arranged for the occasion. First came "H. M. S. Pinafore," with the same cast as on Thursday evening, and the performance was extremely good, arousing frequent applause. By way of close there was represented in very brisk style, "Trial by Jury." Rose Stella, who had a very cordial greeting, was the plaintiff, and a most attractive one. She sang with unusual spirit, and her success, therefore, was pronounced. Mr. Frank Daniels made a fairly good impression as the judge, and much the same thing is to be said of Mr. Wilkinson's performance as the counsel for plaintiff. Very satisfactory proved Mr. Bell as the defendant; and Mr. Kammerlee should have a good word for his work as the usher. What Mrs. Gamp would call "The British Judy" was an extremely lively body, and some of the "business" with the most mature of the twelve may safely be pronounced without a parallel on the comic opera stage. The audience laughed very heartily over the performance, which was never suffered to lag for a moment. Sullivan's original orchestration of "Trial by Jury" was heard for the first time in Boston, and Mr. Brahman's orchestra did excellently. Though only announced for a single representation, "Trial by Jury" had evidently been well rehearsed.

The first of the season's symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, attracting a very large audience, the vacant seats being but few and far between, and the audience was mainly made up of the very best class of our citizens to all appearances. The programme was thus composed: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; recitative and air, "Xerxes," Handel; symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean," Rubinstein; entr'acte, "La Colombe," Gounod; recitative and song, "The Martyr of Antioch," Sullivan; march in B-minor, Schubert-Liszt; Miss Hope Glenn being the soloist of the occasion. It will be seen that the great bur-

MONDAY, OCTOBER 15 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the present season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture: "Consecration of the House," op. 124.....Beethoven
 Recitative and Air from "Xerxes".....Handel
 Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean".....Rubinstein
 Entr'acte from "Colombe".....Gounod
 Recitative and Song from "The Martyr of Antioch".....Sullivan
 March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt

Miss Hope Glenn was the singer.

Two important changes have been made since last year: Mr. Henschel has given up the raised platforms which placed the wind instruments, thecelli and double basses several feet higher than the violins at the front of the orchestra, so that the players now all sit on the level stage, as they used to at the Harvard Musical and Philharmonic concerts. There is something to be said both for and against both arrangements. The raised platforms, which were used last year and the year before, had the great fault of being separate, slight structures, on which the players sat, one batch of players on one, another on another, and so on. Thus the orchestra had no solid, common ground to play on, without which, intelligent experts tell us, it is very difficult for that quasi-electric current of immediate musical sympathy to establish itself between all the members of the band, which should exist in all fine orchestras. In such circumstances it is not easy for a large orchestra to play exactly together and with perfect unity of spirit. The present arrangement obviates this difficulty, but it places the softer wind instruments too much under cover of the violins, so that the tone of the former instruments is much veiled to listeners sitting on the floor of the hall. Yet we think that, after all, the advantages of the present arrangement are greater than that of the raised temporary platforms. The other, and by far the more important, change is the lowering of the pitch. This all-important step has at last been taken by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It were well for every one to appreciate fully all that a decided lowering of the standard concert pitch implies. Its main object is to put an immediate stop to that overstraining of singers' voices which has been going on for many years, and which was chiefly the result of the standard pitch being unreasonably high. Thus lowering the pitch is a practical measure to prevent the art of music from literally tearing to pieces its own most valued votaries, that is, fine singers. Whatever may be one's opinion as to the relative value of voices and instruments to the art, every one agrees that the human voice is something that music cannot dispense with, and that, as it is the most fragile and delicate known producer of musical tone, it should be treated with all possible care. To lower the old concert pitch is manifestly a musical duty. But, like other duties, it entails in its performance no little self-denial; and, of all persons who have to do with music, singers are the only ones who are not called upon to practise more or less of this Christian virtue. Players on stringed instruments must not only get new strings, but, what is far more serious, they must gradually accustom their ear to the new pitch before they can be sure of playing in tune. Players on wind instruments must have new instruments, and it takes no little time for them to feel well at home on them. Again, the musical public must make up its mind to put up with very ragged and untuneful performances until the orchestra shall have succeeded in conquering all these difficulties. Critics, too, must be very lenient, for the fight is a hard one, and in a good cause, and not a word of discouragement should be spoken. If players are willing to set aside their professional self-love for a season or so, and play less well than they know they could play with their old instruments at the old pitch, surely the public ought willingly to forego a part of their musical enjoyment, feeling sure that this self-denial will be amply repaid in the end.

Thus, we do not feel like criticising the orchestra's performance last Saturday evening; for even had the players worked the miracle of mastering all the difficulties of the situation at a single blow, the depressing effect upon the ear of an unaccustomedly low pitch would have sufficed of itself to make everything sound lifeless and dull. Of the works given, the "Ocean" symphony was the central point of interest. Alas! of interest alone; for, with the exception of the magnificent first movement and of the first Adagio and the Scherzo, there is little in the long work which one can call inspiring. The length of the symphony, too, makes it tedious. Although Mr. Henschel wisely omitted the long "storm" movement, the six movements he did give proved a quite sufficient source of ennui. The Gounod entr'acte is a charming little bit of Parisian grace, and was capably played. The Handel air is a noble composition, and Miss Glenn sang it in excellent style, albeit a little formally and coldly. But her beautiful voice and general refinement of manner atoned for much. Sullivan's song is a clever imitation of Handel in his martial vein, and recalls such things as young Othniel's song in "Joshua." With this difference: that, although Sullivan catches all the life and swing of Handel, he does not reproduce his dignity and elegance of melody. It must be admitted that, with all his spiritedness, he falls sadly into the trivial. Miss Glenn sang the selection admirably, albeit we do not like her mongrel pronunciation of "Io Paan!" which was neither English nor Continental.

The next programme is—

Overture, "Prometheus".....Bargiel
 Concerto for two pianofortes in E-flat.....Mozart
 Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
 Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin
 Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint-Saëns

It is suggested that if any more seven movement symphonies are given by the Boston Orchestra, the audience will add the final movement themselves, and the janitor will give Mr. Henschel the key, with instructions to lock up the hall when he gets through.

RICHTER. It is probable that the eminent conductor, Hans Richter, will become a resident of Boston next season. His name is mentioned in connection with the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra.

THEATRE AND CONCERT STAGE.

Opening Programme of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

The first of the 24 concerts announced for the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel director, was given at Music Hall last evening, Miss Hope Glenn, contralto soloist, and with the following programme:

Overture, "Dedication of the House".....Beethoven
 Recitative and air, "Xerxes".....Handel
 Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean".....Rubinstein
 Entr'acte, "La Colombe".....Gounod
 Recitative and song, "The Martyr of Antioch".....Sullivan
 March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt

The personnel of the orchestra is largely the same as last season, though in some cases younger and more vigorous musicians have taken the chairs which have for years been filled by the older orchestral players of the city. The changes appear to have been for the better, as a whole, and the excellent character of the string quartet was especially notable in many portions of the evening's work. Mr. Henschel has apparently abandoned the somewhat elaborate arrangement of platforms used in former years, as last evening all the players were placed upon the same level, thus giving a more solid body of tone. Something of the old arrangement of the instruments has been retained, however. The selection of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony as the leading orchestral number of the first programme did not give as pleasing an opening for the season's series as might be wished. The work has little that is interesting, beyond the first movement, and when it is stated that all of the seven movements were faithfully played, occupying a solid hour, the test put on the patience of the listeners may be imagined. Rubinstein has reason to take pride in the opening movement of this his favorite work, as it has well elaborated ideas, and the instruments of the orchestra are used with rare skill in working out the plan of the composer. The following six movements, however, defy all attempts to comprehend the composer's thought in their writing and give but little satisfaction save as scholarly studies in orchestral composition. There are here and there suggestions of musical ideas in nearly every one of these half dozen movements but in hardly a single instance does the composer give a complete theme of any distinctive merit. It is difficult to explain the constant elaboration of this work by Rubinstein, who has added three of its present movements since it was first given to the public, and it is equally difficult to understand what there is in the work to call for any such enthusiastic appreciation as was shown by last evening's audience. The performance of the work was admirable throughout, so that the lack of interest in it was in no way attributable to its presentation. Whatever amount of weariness was caused by the symphony was, however, more than atoned for by the remaining instrumental numbers, the "Colombe" entr'acte, charming in its graceful and melodious measures; Schubert march, with its tuneful and pleasing characteristics, and the always enjoyable "Dedication" overture affording constant enjoyment during their admirable performance. It is seldom that an artist so quickly gains the full appreciation of the Boston public as Miss Glenn has done, and her reception last evening again proved that she is to be a constant favorite in this city. The grand simplicity of the Handel recitative and aria from "Xerxes," "Fronzi tenere e belle" proved well suited to

34
MONDAY, OCTOBER 15 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the present season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture: "Consecration of the House," op. 124.....Beethoven
Recitative and Air from "Xerxes".....Handel
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean".....Rubinstein
Entr'acte from "Colombe".....Gounod
Recitative and Song from "The Martyr of Antioch".....Sullivan
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt
Miss Hope Glenn was the singer.

den of the programme was made up of new numbers, which added greatly to the general interest manifested in the entire concert. Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture was not a new feature, but it was as pleasing as ever and gave the utmost delight. Rubenstein's "Ocean" symphony was given entire, but it is one of those works that will not become generally popular, first, on account of its length, occupying nearly a full hour in its performance, and secondly, however a fine a work it may be for the skilled and scholarly musician, there is not a great deal in it, outside of the opening number, that is of interest to the general ear. And yet the applause of Saturday evening would seem to show that the work was fully appreciated, but this may have been done more to the fairly successful handling by the orchestra, rather than to a full and complete understanding of the motive of the symphony itself. The entr'acte, "La Colombe," and the march in B-minor, an orchestral adaptation by Liszt of a march by Schubert, were both charmingly given, both works being remarkably pleasing in their characteristics, and both being well interpreted by the orchestra. Miss Glenn's numbers—the recitative and aria from Handel's "Xerxes," "Fronde tenere e belle," and a recitative and song from Arthur Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch"—were such as to show the very best qualities of her glorious contralto voice. This latter number seems to have taken the audience by storm, and she received for it a double recall. Miss Glenn has proved herself now, as in the past, one of the best of soloists, and she has certainly become one of the first of favorites. It cannot be denied that there were times on Saturday evening when the orchestra was a trifle insincere in its work. The organization is on the whole better than that of last year, several of the old members who have grown gray in the service having had their places supplied by younger, and as we doubt not by abler blood. As the season proceeds they will be found to play better, and under Mr. Henschel's energetic conductorship are certain of becoming the best local symphony orchestra that we have had in this city. The second concert of the series is to be given on Saturday evening next, with a public rehearsal the Friday afternoon preceding. The following is the programme: Overture ("Prometheus"), Bargiel; concerto for two pianofortes in E flat (Kocchel, No. 365, Mozart; symphony in C No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; rondo, for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; symphonic poem ("La Jeunesse d'Hercule"), Saint Saëns. The soloists are Miss Mary E. O'Brien, of Portland, Me., and Miss Olga von Radecki.

Two important changes have been made since last year: Mr. Henschel has given up the raised platforms which placed the wind instruments, the 'celli and double basses several feet higher than the violins at the front of the orchestra, so that the players now all sit on the level stage, as they used to at the Harvard Musical and Philharmonic concerts. There is something to be said both for and against both arrangements. The raised platforms, which were used last year and the year before, had the great fault of being separate, slight structures, on which the players sat, one batch of players on one, another on another, and so on. Thus the orchestra had no solid, common ground to play on, without which, intelligent experts tell us, it is very difficult for that quasi-electric current of immediate musical sympathy to establish itself between all the members of the band, which should exist in all fine orchestras. In such circumstances it is not easy for a large orchestra to play exactly together and with perfect unity of spirit. The present arrangement obviates this difficulty, but it places the softer wind instruments too much under cover of the violins, so that the tone of the former instruments is much veiled to listeners sitting on the floor of the hall. Yet we think that, after all, the advantages of the present arrangement are greater than that of the raised temporary platforms. The other, and by far the more important, change is the lowering of the pitch. This all-important step has at last been taken by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It were well for every one to appreciate fully all that a decided lowering of the standard concert pitch implies. Its main object is to put an immediate stop to that overstraining of singers' voices which has been going on for many years, and which was chiefly the result of the standard pitch being unreasonably high. Thus lowering the pitch is a practical measure to prevent the art of music from literally tearing to pieces its own most valued votaries, that is, fine singers. Whatever may be one's opinion as to the relative value of voices and instruments to the art, every one agrees that the human voice is something that music cannot dispense with, and that, as it is the most fragile and delicate known producer of musical tone, it should be treated with all possible care. To lower the old concert pitch is manifestly a musical duty. But, like other duties, it entails in its performance no little self-denial; and, of all persons who have to do with music, singers are the only ones who are not called upon to practise more or less of this Christian virtue. Players on stringed instruments must not only get new strings, but, what is far more serious, they must gradually accustom their ear to the new pitch before they can be sure of playing in tune. Players on wind instruments must have new instruments, and it takes no little time for them to feel well at home on them. Again, the musical public must make up its mind to put up with very ragged and untuneful performances until the orchestra shall have succeeded in conquering all these difficulties. Critics, too, must be very lenient, for the fight is a hard one, and in a good cause, and not a word of discouragement should be spoken. If players are willing to set aside their professional self-love for a season or so, and play less well than they know they could play with their old instruments at the old pitch, surely the public ought willingly to forego a part of their musical enjoyment, feeling sure that this self-denial will be amply repaid in the end.

Thus, we do not feel like criticising the orchestra's performance last Saturday evening; for even had the players worked the miracle of mastering all the difficulties of the situation at a single blow, the depressing effect upon the ear of an unaccustomedly low pitch would have sufficed of itself to make everything sound lifeless and dull. Of the works given, the "Ocean" symphony was the central point of interest. Alas! of interest alone; for, with the exception of the magnificent first movement and of the first Adagio and the Scherzo, there is little in the long work which one can call inspiring. The length of the symphony, too, makes it tedious. Although Mr. Henschel wisely omitted the long "storm" movement, the six movements he did give proved a quite sufficient source of ennui. The Gounod entr'acte is a charming little bit of Parisian grace, and was capitally played. The Handel air is a noble composition, and Miss Glenn sang it in excellent style, albeit a little formally and coldly. But her beautiful voice and general refinement of manner atoned for much. Sullivan's song is a clever imitation of Handel in his martial vein, and recalls such things as young Othniel's song in "Joshua." With this difference: that, although Sullivan catches all the life and swing of Handel, he does not reproduce his dignity and elegance of melody. It must be admitted that, with all his spiritedness, he falls sadly into the trivial. Miss Glenn sang the selection admirably, albeit we do not like her mongrel pronunciation of "Io Paean!" which was neither English nor Continental.

The next programme is—

Overture, "Prometheus".....Bargiel
Concerto for two pianofortes in E-flat.....Mozart
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin
Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint-Saëns

It is suggested that if any more seven movement symphonies are given by the Boston Orchestra, the audience will add the final movement themselves, and the janitor will give Mr. Henschel the key, with instructions to lock up the hall when he gets through.

RICHTER. It is probable that the eminent conductor, Hans Richter, will become a resident of Boston next season. His name is mentioned in connection with the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra.

THEATRE AND CONCERT STAGE.

Open: Programme of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

The first of the 24 concerts announced for the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel director, was given at Music Hall last evening, Miss Hope Glenn, contralto soloist, and with the following programme:

Overture, "Dedication of the House".....Beethoven
Recitative and air, "Xerxes".....Handel
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42, "Ocean".....Rubinstein
Entr'acte, "La Colombe".....Gounod
Recitative and song, "The Martyr of Antioch".....Sullivan
March in B minor.....Schubert-Liszt

The personnel of the orchestra is largely the same as last season, though in some cases younger and more vigorous musicians have taken the chairs which have for years been filled by the older orchestral players of the city. The changes appear to have been for the better, as a whole, and the excellent character of the string quartet was especially notable in many portions of the evening's work. Mr. Henschel has apparently abandoned the somewhat elaborate arrangement of platforms used in former years, as last evening all the players were placed upon the same level, thus giving a more solid body of tone. Something of the old arrangement of the instruments has been retained however. The selection of Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony as the leading orchestral number of the first programme did not give as pleasing an opening for the season's series as might be wished. The work has little that is interesting, beyond the first movement, and when it is stated that all of the seven movements were faithfully played, occupying a solid hour, the test put on the patience of the listeners may be imagined. Rubinstein has reason to take pride in the opening movement of this his favorite work, as it has well elaborated ideas, and the instruments of the orchestra are used with rare skill in working out the plan of the composer. The following six movements, however, defy all attempts to comprehend the composer's thought in their writing and give but little satisfaction save as scholarly studies in orchestral composition. There are here and there suggestions of musical ideas in nearly every one of these half dozen movements but in hardly a single instance does the composer give a complete theme of any distinctive merit. It is difficult to explain the constant elaboration of this work by Rubinstein, who has added three of its present movements since it was first given to the public, and it is equally difficult to understand what there is in the work to call for any such enthusiastic appreciation as was shown by last evening's audience. The performance of the work was admirable throughout, so that the lack of interest in it was in no way attributable to its presentation. Whatever amount of weariness was caused by the symphony was, however, more than atoned for by the remaining instrumental numbers, the "Colombe" entr'acte, charming in its graceful and melodious measures; Schubert march, with its tuneful and pleasing characteristics, and the always enjoyable "Dedication" overture affording constant enjoyment during their admirable performance. It is seldom that an artist so quickly gains the full appreciation of the Boston public as Miss Glenn has done, and her reception last evening again proved that she is to be a constant favorite in this city. The grand simplicity of the Handel recitative and aria from "Xerxes," "Fronde tenere e belle" proved well suited to this artist's style, and its delivery was characterized by a degree of artistic excellence which proved the sterling abilities of the singer. The selection from "The Martyr of Antioch" recitative and aria, "The Maids Lift Up" again gave the keenest enjoyment in its rendering by Miss Glenn, who was twice enthusiastically recalled upon its conclusion. The empty seats in the best portions of the hall indicated that the speculators did not find a ready sale for their tickets, as few if any desirable seats were unsold. The general well-to-do appearance of those in attendance indicated that Mr. Higginson's liberality in furnishing these concerts at a nominal price does not benefit the class he desired to aid in establishing these concerts.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There is a homely adage which says, in substance, that it is difficult to begin just where one leaves off. This popular dictum occurred many times to us as we listened on Saturday evening to the first of the new series of symphony concerts, and led us to control our constant wish that it were better, as it leads now to modify our criticism upon it. In six months of separation something of the mutual understanding between conductor and orchestra is lost; some new material enters into the composition of the band, and some new disposition of their forces disturbs for a time their relations. So, if we are forced to find this concert less good than we anticipated, and less good than we are still inclined to think it ought to have been, we shall yet make our comment rather as exceptions noted than as faults to gravely blame, expecting smoother and more united work from the successive concerts.

The programme promised well, as the orchestral selections were most of them new to these concerts, and as a favorite singer was to be heard in selections also new. The opening overture was the same with which Mr. Henschel has begun each of his preceding seasons,—Beethoven's "Dedication of the House,"—than which nothing could more fitly introduce a series of concerts whose aim and standard are presumably the highest. The grand summoning chords were splendidly struck out, with instantaneous attack and durable volume. But the next phrase foreshadowed where the principal defects of the evening were ultimately to be found; for the wind instruments fell lamely in, dissonant in pitch, and unequal in tone and movement. As the overture progressed, they recovered themselves, however, and the figured undercurrents for the brass instruments and the bassoons were well marked, as also were the little imitations by inversion nicely colored.

The symphony was Rubinstein's "Ocean," which there has been great desire to hear given by this orchestra, so well fitted by its mass and vigor to cope with many passages of the music. Mr. Henschel presented the symphony entire, instead of merely selecting four of its half-dozen of movements, as is frequently the case. Heard under any circumstances, this composition, undeniably great as it is, must weary and disappoint as well as interest and charm. It is not only of unusual length because of its extra movements, but some of the movements themselves are vague and prolix. When dealing with such a theme a composer has two courses open to him,—to attempt an imitative treatment, or to reproduce the moods originally induced by the subject itself. The former course necessarily prescribes brevity and conciseness; for no combination of strings and reeds, moved by mere human arms and lungs, can long even passably counterfeit the sounds of the elements in union or in conflict, or even give us merely,—

The trampling surf
On the rocks and the hard sea sand.

The latter course admits even extreme variety, but the composer's very freedom may tempt him into expressions as relevant to a score of other subjects as to the one he has chosen. Rubinstein seems to have wrought in both veins when writing his symphony, and one cannot help wishing that he might so far let it be classed with "programme music" as to have the hearer told what phase of the ocean, or what fancy relative to it, the several movements are intended to convey. Rufus Choate was not alone in his wish not to "dilate with the wrong emotion," and we enjoy the "Pastoral" symphony and the "William Tell" overture more intelligently, if not more deeply, because we can read what their varying themes were intended to suggest. So far as instrumental music can bring up before the imagination the ocean, as the landsman knows it, and the dreamer fancies it, the first movement of this symphony does so. Rubinstein's writing here reaches the highest plane of thought and of expression. Change after change succeeds, and phrases soft-sliding as a summer tide on a shelving beach, give instant place to hollow grumbings like those of a great wave rolling into an echoing cavern, or to chords whose clash and clangor hint of storm and beating billows. There are smooth, sweet melodies, fit for a siren's song, broken by what might be the growl of a Caliban or the tread of a Triton. If the author had stayed his hand, or if the conductor would put aside his score at the end of this movement, enjoyment would be unalloyed, and both fancy and judgment would wonder and admire. But as the symphony goes on, the impression is weakened and dulled. There are beautiful things in the other movements, unquestionably. The almost vocal harmony with which the second begins, and the harp's quaint toying with it; the strange, heavy revelry of the third; the minor strains of the fourth, like a tender monody; the martial beat and the broad chorale of the last,—these are all touches of genius, but they are not inherently oceanic, and their principal trait d'union with the subject seems to be the murmuring, rising and falling counterpoint of the inner parts, which recalls, sometimes conventionally and sometimes by association with the first movement, the flow of water and the sweep of winds. The performance was very unequal, and moments of such beauty and truth as most of the first movement (the long crescendo especially, the quartet harmony in the second, the progress of the cellos and other middle instruments in the fourth, and the obbligato for cellos in the fifth, were alternated with rough, hard and forced readings of the fortissimi by the strings, the dreadfully blurred, cadence-like transition phrase in the fourth movement, and the wonderful discordances in the last movement. We could not help feeling, as we have always felt when hearing the music of Brahms played by this orchestra, that somehow Mr. Henschel did not get to the bottom of the composer's meaning, or that somehow he could not express through the orchestra what he really understood. We thought of the many times when, after a reading by some pianist of a rhapsodie Hongroise, one could only say that it was splendid, exact playing, and yet that a meaning did not come out of it all. So with the evident intention and exertion of Saturday evening, the most brilliant illustrations of technical control of the notes were often the least clear in the meaning of the score.

The other orchestral numbers were an entr'acte from Gounod's "Colombe," which proved to be a sweet and delicate thought, deliciously set for an orchestra all subdued to the united strings, and played in perfect taste and concord, and, for the finale, a Liszt orchestration of a Schubert march in B minor, which hardly seemed up to the usual stirring quality of Mr. Henschel's good nights, in spite of its charms of arrangement and the attentive playing of the orchestra.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Hope Glenn, the contralto, for whom were set down the recitative and air, "Frondi tenera e bella," from Handel's "Xerxes," and a recitative and song from Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch,"—"Ic Pagan." In the first selection, Miss Glenn made a delightful display of those rich and peculiar tones,—not unlike a clarinet at its best, in their upper range,—which gave her voice an almost unique character. As in Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn," which she sang a few nights ago, her large and liberal method rendered full justice to the sweet, if slightly formal, measures of the air, which scarcely needed more feeling than her rather academic delivery vouchsafes. The last phrase, however, suffered a little loss of dignity by the sudden appearance of the vibrato which Miss Glenn sometimes inappropriately permits herself. The Sullivan song is from a work of presumably sacred character, but it is rather poor stuff, a trivial melody being set to a thin accompaniment. Miss Glenn made the most of it,—her notably lucid enunciation, however, setting out a mispronunciation of two only too brilliantly. The audience were evidently caught at last by the tune, as they had long been by the singer, and gave Miss Glenn a double recall.

Mr. Henschel abandons this season his last year's amphitheatre experiment with the orchestra, who are now brought back to a common level. The first and second violins and violas (among whom Mr. Thomas Ryan's face was welcome visible) are massed in their usual places, the wooden, wind and the brass being placed respectively in two lines across the centre. The violoncellos and double basses are still divided and placed at the wings. If Mr. Henschel could make up his mind to reform this disposition also, it would be a great gain, because now the thrumming of the double-basses is altogether too preponderant at all times in many parts of the hall, and also at many times in all parts of it.

The audience was a good one, although some familiar faces of habitués of previous seasons were absent, and there were a great many vacant seats on the floor of the house. Mr. Henschel was received with pleasant warmth, and the favor of the evening was bestowed, as has been said, upon Miss Glenn.

The performance of the Beethoven symphonies in sequence will begin at the next concert, when also a Mozart concerto and a Chopin rondo for two pianofortes are to be played by Miss Von Radecki and her pupil, Miss Mary E. O'Brien of Portland. Bargiel's "Prometheus" overture and Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," fill out the programme.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Rochester Advertiser—

First Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On Saturday evening last the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its third season, and presented the first programme. The programme promised well, as the orchestral selections were most of them new to these concerts, and as a favorite singer was to be heard in selections also new. The opening overture was the same with which Mr. Henschel has begun each of his preceding seasons,—Beethoven's "Dedication of the House,"—than which nothing could more fitly introduce a series of concerts whose aim and standard are presumably the highest. But the overture though beginning and begun in a grand and noble tone, fails to redeem, by its continuance, the promises made by this commencement, and leaves behind, mixed with the pleasure it brings, a feeling of disappointment. But then, anticipation is ever superior to the realization, in musical as in other matters. The Symphony was Rubinstein's symphony in C, No. 2, the "Ocean" symphony. Whether to produce by musical instrument effects imitative of the sounds and actions of the mighty deep or to represent in music the moods by such sounds and acts produced may be a subject for consideration; it is certain that no combination of strings and reeds moved by human arms and lungs can counterfeit the moving and surging of the flood. Mr. Henschel chose to present this composition in its integrity, rather than in the abridged form more often affected; by this act the piece seemed more than unusually long and wearisome, for wearisome it is. Much of the music is beautiful, much of it grand, much of it seems entirely meaningless and brute. Some of the methods of representing the sounds and movements were were—we can think of no better word than witty—in their brightness and "cuteness." The first movement is much the finest; so far as instrumental music can bring up before the imagination the ocean, as the landsman knows it, and the dreamer fancies it, this movement of this symphony does so. Rubinstein's writing here reaches the highest plane of thought and expression. But later on in the symphony this impression is made faint and weak. The other orchestral numbers were an entr'acte from Gounod's Colombe, and a Liszt' orchestration of a Schubert march in B minor. The former was full of delicate and tender melody and was played in a perfect style; the latter had some delightful movements in it, and was very pleasing. The soloist of the evening, Miss Hope Glenn, sang with peculiar sweetness and richness of tone, her voice carrying distinctly to every part of the hall. Her rendering of the recitation and aria from Handel's Xerxes, was far finer than the other selection, possibly because the music was infinitely higher. The Sullivan selection, from "The Martyr of Antioch," was of no great consequence; Miss Glenn made the most of it, her very clear enunciation serving only too well to display two faults of pronunciation. We hope to hear her again. The performance of the Beethoven symphonies, in sequence, will begin at the next concert when a Mozart concerto and a Chapin rondo, both for two pianos, will be played by Miss Olga Von Radecki and and her pupil, Miss Mary O'Brien, of Portland. Bargiel's overture "Prometheus," and Saint-Saens' symphonie poem "The Youth of Hercules" fill out the programme.

Boston Correspondence.

BOSTON, October 20. 1883

THE first of the symphony concerts took place last Saturday evening. The programme promised to be excellent, and was as follows:

Overture (Dedication of the House).....	Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Xerxes).....	Handel
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 42 (Ocean).....	Rubinstein
Allegro maestoso, adagio, allegro, adagio, scherzo (presto), adagio, allegro con fuoco.
Entr'acte (La Colombe).....	Gounod
Recitative and Song ("The Martyr of Antioch").....	Sullivan
March in B minor.....	Schubert-Liszt

Frankly, a symphony in seven movements is too long and tiresome for the average audience, however much it may love music. The strain told on the musicians, too, and the latter portion of the symphony seemed to be slightly unbalanced, notably in the fifth and sixth movements. In the seventh movement the grandeur of the symphony was irresistible. The first movement was noble, the last supreme, but the climax was not led up to, the interior numbers not being all that was to be desired. But there are passages throughout that compel admiration by their sweetness and power, and the symphony was well chosen. The entr'acte from "La Colombe" immediately following was doubly welcome from its merit and refreshing conciseness. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Hope Glenn. The song by Sullivan is more ambitious in scope than Miss Glenn is generally heard in, but she gave it full justice, never being in better voice.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

"THE Spanish fleet thou canst not see,
Because it is not yet in sight,"

Says one of the characters in Sheridan's Critic. The reviewer is almost in the same position, being unable to criticise concerts, because they have not yet fairly begun. The season will not be really open until next month, although the form a notable exception, and began early in October.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Some changes have taken place in the orchestra. The wood wind has been strengthened, and new faces are also seen in other departments of the orchestra. The men are placed in a more sensible position, the platform of last season being discarded; and the solitary contrabassist, who stood at the back of the orchestra, has renounced his hermit life, and joined his fellows at the side of the stage.

The first programme was rather long and profound. It contained, among other things, the whole of Rubinstein's Ocean Symphony, with the exception of one movement. The work is so long that it can never charm the ordinary audience. Besides, it says all that it needs to in the original four movements, especially in the first movement, which is one of the most inspired of modern musical thoughts. The added movements lengthen, but do not strengthen the work.

It was a hot, damp night; and the state of the atmosphere told sadly upon the violins, whose strings snapped in great numbers.

The orchestra did not keep well together after the first movement, although in the last there was considerable spirit and steadiness shown.

The concert opened with Beethoven's Dedication of the House, with which Mr. Henschel opens each season, evidently regarding the work as a sort of musical way of saying grace. It was well performed.

Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist, and sang two classical selections with a degree of power and finish for which we had not given her credit. She has been heard in Boston too often in the ballad school of light music. She can do herself more justice in the higher flights of music. She won great applause, and very deservedly, too, at this concert.

The second concert was not of so heavy a character. The pièce de résistance was Beethoven's First Symphony, a work belonging still to the Haydn school of composition, yet infinitely greater than any of Haydn's. In the minuet, for example, one can see how, even in this worn and threadbare form, Beethoven could present his thoughts earnestly and without formalism. Yet one feels in listening to this movement that Beethoven is not likely to continue long in these fetters. The replacing of the minuet with something less restricted is easily anticipated in the power of this portion of the work.

The entire symphony received an excellent reading. We were especially pleased with the performance of the last movement and of its introduction.

The other orchestral numbers were of the modern school, and consisted of Bargiel's Prometheus overture and Saint-Saëns's Youth of Hercules. The first-named we found dissonant and labored. It had too much of the vulture element in it. The second pictures the demigod hesitating between two paths, one of pleasure, the other of duty. The pleasure is depicted by muted violins, and duty is sternly portrayed in terrible suspensions and bass drum crashes and cymbal clashes. Eventually, Hercules reaches a high contrapuntal reward.

The soloists of the concert were Misses von Radecki and O'Brion, who performed a Mozart concerto and Chopin's rondo for two pianos with excellent ensemble and refined taste.

These concerts are about the only musical pabulum which as yet has been offered to Boston, and all that as yet has afforded an opportunity for the pen of

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Prometheus.) BARGIEL.

CONCERTO FOR TWO PIANO-FORTES in E flat. (Koechel, No. 365.) MOZART.
Cadenzas by Moscheles.
(FIRST TIME.)

SYMPHONY in C. No. 1, op. 21. BEETHOVEN.
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Andante cantabile con moto.—
Menuetto. (Allegro molto e vivace).—Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.—

RONDO FOR TWO PIANO-FORTES, OP. 73. CHOPIN.

SYMPHONIC POEM. (La jeunesse d'Hercule.) SAINT-SAËNS.

SOLOISTS:

MISS MARY E. O'BRIEN.

MISS OLGA VON RADECKI.

The Pianos used are Chickering's.

LA JEUNESSE D'HERCULE. . SAINT-SAËNS.

The legend tells us that Hercules upon entering into life saw two roads opening before him, the road of pleasure and the road of virtue.

Insensible to the temptations of the Nymphs and Bacchantes, the Hero chooses the field of combat and fame, and at the end of his life is recompensed by being lifted up through the flames of the stake to the glory of immortality.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY.

We have so often felt it our duty in the seasons past to speak of the Boston Symphony orchestra's readings of the classic symphonies as wilfully or helplessly wrong, that we have real and great pleasure in praising their performance of Beethoven's first symphony at the concert of Saturday evening last. Mr. Henschel's reading was consistent and worthy of the work, and many passages were presented with remarkable taste and beauty. The andante cantabile was particularly fine, being sweet and smooth, without, however, lacking anything in vitality. The third movement seemed to be cast in a tempo a little too slow for its character and marking, as if the director had ignored for the moment that the name "minuet" is but a conventional indication of the rhythmic form; but the playing was good and even, and the short crescendi with which the movement opens were admirably rounded up. The true allegro molto e vivace was found for the last movement, however, and the symphony finished brilliantly and without exaggeration.

The other orchestral selections were,—for the first number of the evening, Bargiel's "Prometheus" overture, and for the last, St. Saëns's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." While the two composers are not to be put in precisely the same category, because of their different natural casts and calibres of mind, and their unequal development and finish in the external qualities of their art, yet these two pieces may be classed together for the purposes of such criticism as a lay journal has to make. They mean much, little, or nothing, according to the temper, the mood and the intrinsic disposition of the listener. According as he is more or less imaginative, will they impress him more or less favorably. The dull upheavals of sound, far down in the bases, and the plaintive phrases of the violins, in the "Prometheus," may suggest perhaps equally well the physical torment of the sculptor, or the gradual struggling of his daring thought up to its execution, and the first, faint tentative efforts of the stolen fire to move the clay into life. There are rushings and sweepings and outbursts, which may portray Prometheus grasping and flying with the sacred fire, or the swift and dominant pursuit of vengeance and the vulture. So, too, in the rhapsody about the youthful Hercules, the honeyed earlier strains may stand for the peaceful and dreamful season of youth, and the single thick drum-beat which interrupts them, that a graver strain may follow, may hint at the sterner, weighed-down period of mature responsibility; or, on the contrary, these may merely be the first fanciful approaches to those moments in which the bacchanal dance and the martial onset shall be depicted in indisputable phrase. The strong, but unimpassioned passage of the violoncellos may be significant of Hercules proceeding with still deliberation to choose his course of life, or it may be only the musician proceeding by his convenient transition from one portion of his work to another. Or yet again, the hearer may find nothing but a series of disconnected sentences, rambling along without explicable purpose or estimable result, and saying their say in forms which have only grammatical correctness and pleasant variety of voicing to commend them. Such as they were, the orchestra gave these numbers with due regard for their shape and color. There were unity, volume and agreeable tone in the strings; but there were also disagreements among the wooden-wind as between themselves and with the rest of the orchestra; at the entrance of the brass, also, toward the close of the "Hercules," there was a dreary discordance. The dance movement of this same work was delivered with great suggestiveness, and the finale, with its cymbals to mean triumph and its brasses enwreathed with the harp's arpeggios, to mean Olympic glory, was worked up splendidly.

A serious standard work for two pianofortes is rare in the concert-room, although a Gottschalk has sometimes brought an overture so arranged, or a concerted work may be presented with its orchestral part reduced for a second pianist. It was therefore interesting to find on this programme Mozart's E flat concerto (numbered 365, by Köchel), given for the first time, and Chopin's rondo, opus 73. The concerto is delightful, and what would be called, faute de mieux, "characteristic." The first movement is a spring-like allegro, alive with a delicate spirit; the second, a most melodious andante, gently moving, and yet not grave; the third, a joyous allegro, a little less inspired than the first, and having somewhat of the flavor, though not the alacrity, of Don Giovanni's Fin ch' han dal vino. The cadenzas are by Moscheles, and accord wonderfully with the fundamental thoughts and the phrasal form of the concerto. The Chopin rondo has unusual cheer and lightness in the first piano part, but the second tempers it with many returns of the author's melancholy moods. The players were Miss von Radecki and Miss Mary E. O'Brien of Portland, her pupil. The former lady has gained greatly since her debut here last year; her style is broader and deeper intellectually, and her technique has more strength and fulness. Of the latter we shrink from speaking in critical fashion, for she went to her task with such simplicity and earnestness; she had studied so well to memorize her music, and she played with such prompt correctness, that it seems ungracious to say that she is not yet ripe for the concert-room, nor for the great masters. And yet that is the truth. The undulation of her hands is wasteful of strength and militates against an agreeable tone, the constant sinking of the wrist below the key-board destroying the equilibrium of tone, and the successive raisings of it altering the bearing of the fingers. As a consequence, her tone is often hard without strength, or light without life. She should sit lower, and keep her hand more evenly in its natural plane. It is only fair, however, to say that this fault, although exaggerated, she has caught from her teacher. Her execution is fluent, and her fingers independent, but she has not grown up to such music yet, and when a thought or a phrase passed from one pianoforte to the other, the discrepancy in her power of reading it, whether she had the first or the second part, was only too noticeable. At the third concert, Dvorák's symphony in D will be presented for the first time, and there will attach a similar interest to the "Procession of Bacchus" from the "Sylvia" of Delibes. The overture will be Cherubini's "Medea," and the nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will also be played. Mr. Max Heinrich, basso, from Philadelphia, will sing an air from Spohr's "Faust," and some Schubert songs with pianoforte accompaniment. Miss Lillian Norton has been engaged as the vocalist to succeed Mr. Heinrich, singing at the fifth concert, on November 3.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Production Here of a Mozart Concerto—Programme Music.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra course last evening the following programme was rendered:

Overture (Prometheus).....	Bargiel
Concerto, for two piano-fortes, in E-flat
(Köchel, No. 365).....	Mozart
Cadenzas by Moscheles.
(First time.)
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....	Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con moto—Menuetto. (Allegro molto)

LA JEUNESSE D'HERCULE. . . SAINT-SAËNS.

The legend tells us that Hercules upon entering into life saw two roads opening before him, the road of pleasure and the road of virtue.

Insensible to the temptations of the Nymphs and Bacchantes, the Hero chooses the field of combat and fame, and at the end of his life is recompensed by being lifted up through the flames of the stake to the glory of immortality.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY.

We have so often felt it our duty in the seasons past to speak of the Boston Symphony orchestra's readings of the classic symphonies as wilfully or helplessly wrong, that we have real and great pleasure in praising their performance of Beethoven's first symphony at the concert of Saturday evening last. Mr. Henschel's reading was consistent and worthy of the work, and many passages were presented with remarkable taste and beauty. The andante cantabile was particularly fine, being sweet and smooth, without, however, lacking anything in vitality. The third movement seemed to be cast in a tempo a little too slow for its character and marking, as if the director had ignored for the moment that the name "minuet" is but a conventional indication of the rhythmic form; but the playing was good and even, and the short crescendi with which the movement opens were admirably rounded up. The true allegro molto e vivace was found for the last movement, however, and the symphony finished brilliantly and without exaggeration.

The other orchestral selections were,—for the first number of the evening, Bargiel's "Prometheus" overture, and for the last, St. Saëns's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules." While the two composers are not to be put in precisely the same category, because of their different natural casts and calibres of mind, and their unequal development and finish in the external qualities of their art, yet these two pieces may be classed together for the purposes of such criticism as a lay journal has to make. They mean much, little, or nothing, according to the temper, the mood and the intrinsic disposition of the listener. According as he is more or less imaginative, will they impress him more or less favorably. The dull upheavals of sound, far down in the bases, and the plaintive phrases of the violins, in the "Prometheus," may suggest perhaps equally well the physical torment of the sculptor, or the gradual struggling of his daring thought up to its execution, and the first, faint tentative efforts of the stolen fire to move the clay into life. There are rushings and sweepings and outbursts, which may portray Prometheus grasping and flying with the sacred fire, or the swift and dominant pursuit of vengeance and the vulture. So, too, in the rhapsody about the youthful Hercules, the honeyed earlier strains may stand for the peaceful and dreamful season of youth, and the single thick drum-beat which interrupts them, that a graver strain may follow, may hint at the sterner, weighed-down period of mature responsibility; or, on the contrary, these may merely be the first fanciful approaches to those moments in which the bacchanal dance and the martial onset shall be depicted in indisputable phrase. The strong, but unimpassioned passage of the violoncellos may be significant of Hercules proceeding with still deliberation to choose his course of life, or it may be only the musician proceeding by his convenient transition from one portion of his work to another. Or yet again, the hearer may find nothing but a series of disconnected sentences, rambling along without explicable purpose or estimable result, and saying their say in forms which have only grammatical correctness and pleasant variety of voicing to commend them. Such as they were, the orchestra gave these numbers with due regard for their shape and color. There were unity, volume and agreeable tone in the strings; but there were also disagreements among the wooden-wind as between themselves and with the rest of the orchestra; at the entrance of the brass, also, toward the close of the "Hercules," there was a dreary discordance. The dance movement of this same work was delivered with great suggestiveness, and the finale, with its cymbals to mean triumph and its brasses enwreathed with the harp's arpeggios, to mean Olympic glory, was worked up splendidly.

A serious standard work for two pianofortes is rare in the concert-room, although a Gottschalk has sometimes brought an overture so arranged, or a concerted work may be presented with its orchestral part reduced for a second pianist. It was therefore interesting to find on this programme Mozart's E flat concerto (numbered 365, by Köchel), given for the first time, and Chopin's rondo, opus 73. The concerto is delightful, and what would be called, faute de mieux, "characteristic." The first movement is a spring-like allegro, alive with a delicate spirit; the second, a most melodious andante, gently moving, and yet not grave; the third, a joyous allegro, a little less inspired than the first, and having somewhat of the flavor, though not the alacrity, of Don Giovanni's Fin ch' han dal vino. The cadenzas are by Moscheles, and accord wonderfully with the fundamental thoughts and the phrasal form of the concerto. The Chopin rondo has unusual cheer and lightness in the first piano part, but the second tempers it with many returns of the author's melancholy moods. The players were Miss von Radecki and Miss Mary E. O'Brien of Portland, her pupil. The former lady has gained greatly since her debut here last year; her style is broader and deeper intellectually, and her technique has more strength and fulness. Of the latter we shrink from speaking in critical fashion, for she went to her task with such simplicity and earnestness; she had studied so well to memorize her music, and she played with such prompt correctness, that it seems ungracious to say that she is not yet ripe for the concert-room, nor for the great masters. And yet that is the truth. The undulation of her hands is wasteful of strength and militates against an agreeable tone, the constant sinking of the wrist below the key-board destroying the equilibrium of tone, and the successive raisings of it altering the bearing of the fingers. As a consequence, her tone is often hard without strength, or light without life. She should sit lower, and keep her hand more evenly in its natural plane. It is only fair, however, to say that this fault, although exaggerated, she has caught from her teacher. Her execution is fluent, and her fingers independent, but she has not grown up to such music yet, and when a thought or a phrase passed from one pianoforte to the other, the discrepancy in her power of reading it, whether she had the first or the second part, was only too noticeable. At the third concert, Dvorak's symphony in D will be presented for the first time, and there will attach a similar interest to the "Procession of Bacchus" from the "Sylvia" of Delibes. The overture will be Cherubini's "Medea," and the nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will also be played. Mr. Max Heinrich, basso, from Philadelphia, will sing an air from Spohr's "Faust," and some Schubert songs with pianoforte accompaniment. Miss Lillian Norton has been engaged as the vocalist to succeed Mr. Heinrich, singing at the fifth concert, on November 3.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Production Here of a Mozart Concerto—Programme Music.

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra course last evening the following programme was rendered:

Overture (Prometheus).....	Bargiel
Concerto, for two piano-fortes, in E-flat
(Koechel No. 365).....	Mozart
Cadenzas by Moscheles.
(First time.)
Symphony in C. No. 1, op. 21.....	Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con moto—Menuetto. (Allegro molto)

vivace.—Adagio: Andante molto e vivace.
Rondo, for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin.
Symphonic poem (La jeunesse d'Hercule).....Saint-Saëns

This is a remarkably fine programme, not only in the worth of the individual numbers, but in their arrangement together. There were no two pieces in the same style, and at the same time there were no contrasts so violent as to disturb the enjoyment of each selection. Add to this the fact that the rendition of the entire programme was all that could be desired, and the result is a most satisfactory concert. The novelty of the evening was the Mozart concerto. It is divided into three movements, each one thoroughly characteristic of the composer and sparkling with melody throughout. The pianists were Miss Olga von Radecki, who is well and favorably known in Boston, and her pupil, Miss Mary E. O'Brien. The attractive feature of their playing was the perfect union of spirit by which the same mind seemed to actuate each player. The concerto does not call for the display of the greatest talent, and, compared with many of the works of more modern masters, its technical difficulties are not considerable. The general tone of the composition is light and cheerful, and these qualities found excellent interpretation at the hands of the soloists. They succeeded in the same way in the rondo by Chopin. The audience was very generous in its applause, recalling them after each appearance. With more power and greater breadth of style, they might have created more enthusiasm, more of a furor, but the work set before them hardly called for a great demonstration, and they were very satisfactory in their performance.

Passing by the symphony, whose familiar beauties were finely brought out, the symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns attracts attention irresistibly. The ideal poem on which the symphony was written is thus translated into words:

"The legend tells us that Hercules upon entering into life saw two roads opening before him, the road of pleasure and the road of virtue.

"Insensible to the temptations of the nymphs and unchastities, the hero chooses the field of combat and fame, and at the end of his life is recompensed by being lifted up through the flames of the stake to the glory of immortality."

The work is not new to Boston, but its fine fancies and intense dramatic power compel us again to admit that "programme music" may be of the highest merit. It is outside the province of music to express tangible things, and we have no patience with the pastorates in which the rustling leaves are constantly heard in the pianissimo quivering of the strings, or the battle scene made horrid by muscular pounding on the drums and coarse blows on the horns. But when a composer chooses a fanciful theme, and develops it in music, guiding his fancy by reason and erudition, the result is a composition of intense interest. Saint-Saëns is forever introducing strange effects of orchestration, but not without musical meaning. His symphonic poems are of a very exciting character, and if we judge music by its effects on the emotions, we must admit that he is a master in this field and produces genuine music. Throughout all the deviations of his theme there is a strong current of fascinating melody, and by the judicious choice of his poetical themes he keeps his work within the bounds of form, thus making them true works of art, rather than the shapeless effusions indulged in by some extremists among the modern writers.

The novelties for the next concert will be a new symphony by Dvorak, and new selections from Sylvia by Delibes.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience, despite the unfavorable state of the weather, although, as at the previous concert, there were many vacant seats on the floor. The performances opened with Bargiel's dreary and blatantly unmeaning "Prometheus" overture. The only suggestiveness it conveys of Prometheus is in connection with his painful liver trouble and the agony attendant thereon. It was vigorously performed, with particularly fine unity and precision in the strings. The flutes, oboes and clarinets were not always true in pitch with each other, and this was observable through the concert, at times painfully so. The overture was followed by Mozart's Concerto for two pianos in E-flat (Koechel 365), a thoroughly delightful work despite the quaintness that characterizes its cadences and many of its figures. The opening allegro has a charming freshness, spirit and solidity. The andante is a bit of pure Mozart in his most characteristic vein, and fascinating in its frank artlessness and its easy grace and flow. The finale, perhaps, shows its age more than any of the other movements, but its beautiful development, and its alternate fire and tenderness, caused this to be forgotten. It was performed by Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga Von Radecki, the former taking the first and the latter the second part. Miss O'Brien has a delicate touch and a fluent technique, but is lacking in power. She has evidently been well taught, save in respect to an unmeaning and disturbing restlessness of the hands, which is almost eccentric in effect. Her pleasing modesty of manner almost disarms criticism, but it is only just to state that on this occasion she showed but little more than the intelligent and carefully-taught scholar who recited her lesson literally and perfectly, and if not in a perfunctory manner, still without a clear perception of its deeper import. Her playing was pretty, delicate, and not void of a certain refinement of taste; but it conveyed no special meaning, and was without other than mere technical style. The young lady was completely overshadowed by Miss Von Radecki, who has gained much in power and breadth of style since she was last heard here. Her phrasing was admirable, and her reading throughout was intelligent to a high degree, and wholly musicianly. The orchestra was handled in a thoroughly excellent manner. Later in the evening the same young artists played Chopin's familiar Rondo for two pianos, op. 73. This time Miss Radecki sat at the first piano. Her performance was clean-cut, brilliant, and as thoughtful as it was artistically sympathetic in style. Miss O'Brien acquitted herself again conscientiously and skillfully, but manifested the same lack of power and of individuality as before. The artists were applauded with great cordiality, and were recalled after each piece. The symphony was Beethoven's in C, No. 1. Mr. Henschel interpreted it in a clear, graceful and appropriately characteristic manner that calls for warm praise. The reading was a great improvement upon that he gave in either of his preceding treatments of the work. The slow movement, in particular, was charmingly rendered, and the finale was one of the most satisfying bits of conducting that Mr. Henschel has achieved. The responses of the wind instruments near the end of this movement came out with unwonted precision, clearness and fluency. The concert ended with Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Medea," Cherubini; Recitative and Air, "Faust," Spohr; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (first time); Nocturne, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Songs, Schubert; "Cortège de Bacchus" from "Sylvia," Delibes. The soloist is to be Mr. Max Héhrlieh.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Consider

Overture. (Prometheus).....Bargiel.
Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat (Koechel, No. 365.) Cadenzas by Moscheles.....Mozart.
(First time.)

Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven.
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin.
Symphonic Poem. (La jeunesse d'Hercule).....Saint-Saëns.
Soloists: Miss Mary E. O'Brien, Miss Olga Von Radecki.

This was again a long programme, but more popularly pleasing than that of last week. It began with rather a swollen work of the modern school, dealing largely in dissonances and containing rather more vulture than Prometheus. The work was not, to us, intelligible or decisive, but seemed to swim about in the sea of tones of the Wagnerian school. Following this came a work that was altogether delightful. The two young pianists gave a very clear reading of a work that only gained by its juxtaposition with the noisy Bargiel selection. There was something of rigidity in the first movement, but the second was pure, sweet and unaffected, and the ensemble was perfect throughout. The cadenzas, dealing with prominent themes of the work, seemed a natural outgrowth from it, and were given with praiseworthy brilliancy. In the second work played by the pianists a lack of elasticity was noticeable, although every portion was clearly interpreted. The recurring theme was daintily played, but more freedom might have been taken with the zwischen satze.

The Haydn-ish Beethoven symphony was clearly given. The first introduction was a trifle heavy and coarse, but the introduction to the last movement deserves especial praise because of the manner in which the scales were read. At first dallying slowly, uncertain, and then as if a ray of light had shone in, dashing off into the chief theme of the movement. The reprise of the minuet was rather oddly and abruptly taken, but the movement as a whole was well done. What a minuet it is! Although Beethoven had not yet made the reform which put aside this style of movement in favor of the Scherzo, yet even in this first symphony his minuet throws aside all of Haydn's formalism. The second movement with its pleasing imitations in the strings was well balanced and effective. All in all, a good reading of a pleasing symphony.

The "Youth of Hercules" has, we believe, been heard once before in the Philharmonic orchestra. Its story is thus told on the programme: "The legend tells us that Hercules upon entering into life saw two roads opening before him, the road of pleasure and the road of virtue. Insensible to the temptations of the Nymphs and Bacchantes, the hero chooses the field of combat and fame, and at the end of his life is recompensed by being lifted up through the flames of the stake to the glory of immortality." We find Hercules tempted to try a path strewn with roses, and muted violins, seductive flutes try to entice him in vain. He chooses a road filled with brass instruments, where bass drums flourish and cymbals crash, and terrible syncopations and awkward suspensions abound. It is difficult to be virtuous at such a price, but he achieves his reward by finally reaching a realm of counter point, and harp obligato. The work was well performed, the brasses doing their difficult work with steadiness, and the difficult violin figures being clearly rendered.

The audience exhibited great interest, applauding liberally and (with few exceptions), remaining seated until the last notes of the last number.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Second of the Season's Programmes at Music Hall.

The second of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga Von Radecki, pianists, as the soloists, and the following programme:

Overture "Prometheus".....Bargiel
Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat.....Mozart
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin
Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint-Saëns

The programme as a whole, though of an interesting character, proved somewhat wearisome, the concluding numbers following the symphony not being calculated to give the relief demanded after such numbers as the concerto and symphony. The concerto proved a very pleasing novelty, as it has not been given here before, of late years at least, and the performance added much to the listeners' pleasure. The composition is full of the melodious themes with which Mozart's music abounds, and the ladies selected for its presentation were admirably suited to the duty assigned them. Miss O'Brien, a resident of Portland, Me., was heard for the first time here, and gave unmistakable evidence of rare abilities as a pianist. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic, and her playing has an individuality which gives an added beauty to all her work. The two ladies played with remarkable unity, and the several movements were highly enjoyable. Miss Von Radecki ably seconded the efforts of her associate. The cadenzas by Moscheles were added, and the orchestral score was given with excellent taste, being never so prominent as to cover the pianoforte parts. In the Chopin number for the two pianists the results gained were only less satisfactory, the unusual excellence of the playing in the concerto not being fully equalled. Both numbers won the favor of the audience to such a degree that the ladies were recalled after each by the enthusiastic applause which rewarded their performances. The Bargiel overture, with its skilfully elaborated themes, was finely played, and the reading given the symphony was highly satisfactory, the beautiful melodies of the several movements giving uninterrupted pleasure throughout the work. The Saint-Saëns number is of rather an exciting and somewhat exhausting character to be heard with pleasure at the close of such a programme, but it was played with spirit throughout, and displayed the fine abilities of the players in many ways. The bad weather and other causes gave a large array of empty seats, which ought to be filled by some means, as there are many who would gladly attend if an opportunity was given to use such seats as are unoccupied.

NOTES.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give five concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 14 and March 20.

Mrs. Gower, more generally known as Miss Lillian Norton, has accepted an invitation to sing at the Symphony concert of Nov. 3.

vivace.)—Adagio: Allegro molto e vivace.
Rondo, for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin.
Symphonic poem (La jeunesse d'Hercule).....Saint-Saëns.

This is a remarkably fine programme, not only in the worth of the individual numbers, but in their arrangement together. There were no two pieces in the same style, and at the same time there were no contrasts so violent as to disturb the enjoyment of each selection. Add to this the fact that the rendition of the entire programme was all that could be desired, and the result is a most satisfactory concert. The novelty of the evening was the Mozart concerto. It is divided into three movements, each one thoroughly characteristic of the composer and sparkling with melody throughout. The pianists were Miss Olga von Radecki, who is well and favorably known in Boston, and her pupil, Miss Mary E. O'Brien. The attractive feature of their playing was the perfect unison of spirit by which the same mind seemed to actuate each player. The concerto does not call for the display of the greatest talent, and, compared with many of the works of more modern masters, its technical difficulties are not considerable. The general tone of the composition is light and cheerful, and these qualities found excellent interpretation at the hands of the soloists. They succeeded in the same way in the rondo by Chopin. The audience was very generous in its applause, recalling them after each appearance. With more power and greater breadth of style, they might have created more enthusiasm, more of a furor, but the work set before them hardly called for a great demonstration, and they were very satisfactory in their performance.

Passing by the symphony, whose familiar beauties were finely brought out, the symphonic poem of Saint-Saëns attracts attention irresistibly. The ideal poem on which the symphony was written is thus translated into words:

"The legend tells us that Hercules upon entering into life saw two roads opening before him, the road of pleasure and the road of virtue.

"Insensible to the temptations of the nymphs and bacchantes, the hero chooses the field of combat and fame, and at the end of his life is recompensed by being lifted up through the flames of the stake to the glory of immortality."

The work is not new to Boston, but its fine fancies and intense dramatic power compel us again to admit that "programme music" may be of the highest merit. It is outside the province of music to express tangible things, and we have no patience with the pastorales in which the rustling leaves are constantly heard in the pianissimo quivering of the strings, or the battle scene made horrid by muscular pounding on the drums and coarse blares on the horns. But when a composer chooses a fanciful theme, and develops it in music, guiding his fancy by reason and erudition, the result is a composition of intense interest. Saint-Saëns is forever introducing strange effects of orchestration, but not without musical meaning. His symphonic poems are of a very exciting character, and if we judge music by its effects on the emotions, we must admit that he is a master in this field and produces genuine music. Throughout all the deviations of his theme there is a strong current of fascinating melody, and by the judicious choice of his poetical themes he keeps his work within the bounds of form, thus making them true works of art, rather than the shapeless effusions indulged in by some extremists among the modern writers.

The novelties for the next concert will be a new symphony by Dvorak, and new selections from Sylvia by Delibes.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience, despite the unfavorable state of the weather, although, as at the previous concert, there were many vacant seats on the floor. The performances opened with Bargiel's dreary and blatantly unmeaning "Prometheus" overture. The only suggestiveness it conveys of Prometheus is in connection with his painful liver trouble and the agony attendant thereon. It was vigorously performed, with particularly fine unity and precision in the strings. The flutes, oboes and clarinets were not always true in pitch with each other, and this was observable through the concert, at times painfully so. The overture was followed by Mozart's Concerto for two pianos in E-flat (Koechel 365), a thoroughly delightful work despite the quaintness that characterizes its cadences and many of its figures. The opening allegro has a charming freshness, spirit and solidity. The andante is a bit of pure Mozart in his most characteristic vein, and fascinating in its frank artlessness and its easy grace and flow. The finale, perhaps, shows its age more than any of the other movements, but its beautiful development, and its alternate fire and tenderness, caused this to be forgotten. It was performed by Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga von Radecki, the former taking the first and the latter the second part. Miss O'Brien has a delicate touch and a fluent technique, but is lacking in power. She has evidently been well taught, save in respect to an unmeaning and disturbing restlessness of the hands, which is almost eccentric in effect. Her pleasing modesty of manner almost disarms criticism, but it is only just to state that on this occasion she showed but little more than the intelligent and carefully-taught scholar who recited her lesson literally and perfectly, and if not in a perfunctory manner, still without a clear perception of its deeper import. Her playing was pretty, delicate, and not void of a certain refinement of taste; but it conveyed no special meaning, and was without other than mere technical style. The young lady was completely overshadowed by Miss von Radecki, who has gained much in power and breadth of style since she was last heard here. Her phrasing was admirable, and her reading throughout was intelligent to a high degree, and wholly musicianly. The orchestra was handled in a thoroughly excellent manner. Later in the evening the same young artists played Chopin's familiar Rondo for two pianos, op. 73. This time Miss Radecki sat at the first piano. Her performance was clean-cut, brilliant, and as thoughtful as it was artistically sympathetic in style. Miss O'Brien acquitted herself again conscientiously and skillfully, but manifested the same lack of power and of individuality as before. The artists were applauded with great cordiality, and were recalled after each piece. The symphony was Beethoven's in C, No. 1. Mr. Henschel interpreted it in a clear, graceful and appropriately characteristic manner that calls for warm praise. The reading was a great improvement upon that he gave in either of his preceding treatments of the work. The slow movement, in particular, was charmingly rendered, and the finale was one of the most satisfying bits of conducting that Mr. Henschel has achieved. The responses of the wind instruments near the end of this movement came out with unwonted precision, clearness and fluency. The concert ended with Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule." The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Medea," Cherubini; Recitative and Air, "Faust," Spohr; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (first time); Nocturne, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Songs, Schubert; "Cortège de Bacchus" from "Sylvia," Delibes. The soloist is to be Mr. Max Hémrich.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Continued

Overture. (Prometheus).....Bargiel.
Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat (Koechel, No. 365.) Cadenzas by Moscheles.....Mozart.
(First time.)

Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven.
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin.
Symphonic Poem. (La jeunesse d'Hercule.).....Saint-Saëns.

Soloists: Miss Mary E. O'Brien, Miss Olga von Radecki.

This was again a long programme, but more popularly pleasing than that of last week. It began with rather a swollen work of the modern school, dealing largely in dissonances and containing rather more vulture than Prometheus. The work was not, to us, intelligible or decisive, but seemed to swim about in the sea of tones of the Wagnerian school. Following this came a work that was altogether delightful. The two young pianists gave a very clear reading of a work that only gained by its juxtaposition with the noisy Bargiell selection. There was some thing of rigidity in the first movement, but the second was pure, sweet and unaffected, and the ensemble was perfect throughout. The cadenzas, dealing with prominent themes of the work, seemed a natural outgrowth from it, and were given with praiseworthy brilliancy. In the second work played by the pianists a lack of elasticity was noticeable, although every portion was clearly interpreted. The recurring theme was daintily played, but more freedom might have been taken with the zwischen satze.

The Haydn-ish Beethoven symphony was clearly given. The first introduction was a trifle heavy and coarse, but the introduction to the last movement deserves especial praise because of the manner in which the scales were read. At first dallying slowly, uncertain, and then as if a ray of light had shone in, dashing off into the chief theme of the movement. The reprise of the minuet was rather oddly and abruptly taken, but the movement as a whole was well done. What a minuet it is! Although Beethoven had not yet made the reform which put aside this style of movement in favor of the Scherzo, yet even in this first symphony his minuet throws aside all of Haydn's formalism. The second movement with its pleasing imitations in the strings was well balanced and effective. All in all, a good reading of a pleasing symphony.

The "Youth of Hercules" has, we believe, been heard once before in the Philharmonic orchestra. Its story is thus told on the programme: "The legend tells us that Hercules upon entering into life saw two roads opening before him, the road of pleasure and the road of virtue. Insensible to the temptations of the Nymphs and Bacchantes, the hero chooses the field of combat and fame, and at the end of his life is recompensed by being lifted up through the flames of the stake to the glory of immortality." We find Hercules tempted to try a path strewn with roses, and muted violins, seductive flutes try to entice him in vain. He chooses a road filled with brass instruments, where bass drums flourish and cymbals crash, and terrible syncopations and awkward suspensions abound. It is difficult to be virtuous at such a price, but he achieves his reward by finally reaching a realm of counter point, and harp obligato. The work was well performed, the brasses doing their difficult work with steadiness, and the difficult violin figures being clearly rendered.

The audience exhibited great interest, applauding liberally and (with few exceptions), remaining seated until the last notes of the last number.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Second of the Season's Programmes at Music Hall.

The second of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga von Radecki, pianists, as the soloists, and the following programme:

Overture "Prometheus".....Bargiel.
Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat.....Mozart.
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven.
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin.
Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint-Saëns.

The programme as a whole, though of an interesting character, proved somewhat wearisome, the concluding numbers following the symphony not being calculated to give the relief demanded after such numbers as the concerto and symphony. The concerto proved a very pleasing novelty, as it has not been given here before, of late years at least, and the performance added much to the listeners' pleasure. The composition is full of the melodious themes with which Mozart's music abounds, and the ladies selected for its presentation were admirably suited to the duty assigned them. Miss O'Brien, a resident of Portland, Me., was heard for the first time here, and gave unmistakable evidence of rare abilities as a pianist. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic, and her playing has an individuality which gives an added beauty to all her work. The two ladies played with remarkable unity, and the several movements were highly enjoyable. Miss von Radecki ably seconding the efforts of her associate. The cadenzas by Moscheles were added, and the orchestral score was given with excellent taste, being never so prominent as to cover the pianoforte parts. In the Chopin number for the two pianists the results gained were only less satisfactory, the unusual excellence of the playing in the concerto not being fully equalled. Both numbers won the favor of the audience to such a degree that the ladies were recalled after each by the enthusiastic applause which rewarded their performances. The Bargiell overture, with its skillfully elaborated themes, was finely played, and the reading given the symphony was highly satisfactory, the beautiful melodies of the several movements giving uninterrupted pleasure throughout the work. The Saint-Saëns number is of rather an exciting and somewhat exhausting character to be heard with pleasure at the close of such a programme, but it was played with spirit throughout, and displayed the fine abilities of the players in many ways. The bad weather and other causes gave a large array of empty seats, which ought to be filled by some means, as there are many who would gladly attend if an opportunity was given to use such seats as are unoccupied.

NOTES.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give five concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 14 and March 20.

Mrs. Gower, more generally known as Miss Ellen Norton, has accepted an invitation to sing at the Symphony concert of Nov. 3.

Second Symphony Concert.

The second concert in the present course of entertainments by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday night, and, despite the disagreeable weather, was more largely attended than that of the previous week. The programme was long, but the performance was on the whole more interesting than that which opened the season, and engaged the attention of the audience closely to the end. The concert opened with Bargiel's overture to "Prometheus," which was well played, so far as could be judged by the restless, incoherent and disjointed quality of the composer's instrumentation. The work is hardly worth the playing, for it conveys no clear idea and has no distinguishable form. One instinctively feels a profound sympathy for the hard lines of the unhappy Prometheus, as if it were not bad enough to have his liver eaten out in life without having his memory preserved by the dedication to his fame of such a composition. There was a good deal of celebration of classic myths and heroes during the concert. Introduced by Prometheus, it was ushered out by Hercules, the struggles of whose youth and the triumph of whose mature age were celebrated in Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem. This work, as the description which was printed on the programme recites, treats of the contrary influences which were brought to bear upon the hero in early life, the nymphs and bacchants endowing him to pleasure, and other more noble but undesignated personages to arms and honor. The attractions of the former are set forth by the "lascivious plausings" of united violins, flutes and other instruments which are supposed to be the concomitants of luxury; those of the latter by a fearful hullabaloo of brass and drums and other such stirring agencies. From a musical point of view Hercules's choice of the ways of war cannot be too much condemned, but in a moral sense he probably acted with discretion. Introduced between these compositions appeared, very gratefully, Beethoven's charming first symphony. It was delightfully played; in fact so well that the criticism which might be aroused on one or two points may justly be disarmed by the general excellence of the reading and performance. We can hardly recall an instance when Mr. Henschel and the orchestra have done a more sympathetic and earnest piece of work. If only the remaining eight symphonies from Beethoven's hand shall be as well interpreted, the season will be one of singular importance.

The soloists of the evening were Miss Olga Von Radecki and Miss Mary E. O'Brien, who played upon two pianos Mozart's concerto in E-flat (Kochel, No. 365), with cadenzas by Moscheles—its first performance here—and a rondo by Chopin, op. 73. The concerto proved to be a beautiful work and thoroughly characteristic of the composer. The first movement, perhaps, suggested Mozart only indirectly, but the second and third were most interesting examples of his peculiar power. In this work Miss O'Brien took the first part and Miss Von Radecki the second, an arrangement which was reversed in the Chopin selection. Both artists played exceedingly well, showing a fine appreciation of the works which they interpreted and presenting them in a sincere and intelligent manner which was eminently worthy of praise. Neither, however, displayed any marked power of execution or original insight into the composer's ideas, and their performance impressed one as being that of thoroughly well taught and talented players, who are not, however, possessed of any profound genius. Of the two Miss Von Radecki's playing pleased us the better, as being, on the whole, broader and more individual. The pianists were warmly applauded, and recalled after each of the selections.

The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows, Mr. Max Heinrich being the soloist: Overture (Medea), Cherubini; Recitative and Air (Faust), Spohr; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (new, first time); Notturmo (Midsummer Night's Dream), Mendelssohn; Songs with piano, Schubert; Cortège de Bacchus (Sylvia), first time, Delibes.

Journal

Notes.

The second of the Symphony Concerts was given in the Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was interpreted: Overture "Prometheus," Bargiel; Concerto for two pianofortes in E-flat, Mozart; Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; Symphonic Poem "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns. Although the state of the weather was quite unpropitious, it did not seem to have any effect on the public, who turned out in very large numbers, and almost completely filled the hall. The programme was somewhat lengthy, yet on the whole much more interesting than that with which the series opened, and the attention bestowed on all the numbers was quite marked, while a liberal amount of applause was bestowed. The opening Bargiel's overture "Prometheus" was well played by the orchestra, and this was followed by Mozart's concerto for two pianos in E-flat, played by Miss Von Radecki and her pupil, Miss Mary E. O'Brien, of Portland. Miss Radecki, who has been heard here before, appears to have broadened her mastery of the instrument, and Miss O'Brien, who appeared in Boston for the first time, showed thorough training and excellent proficiency. The concerto is one perfect piece of melody, and to it were added Moscheles' cadenzas. The performance was an admirable one, Miss Radecki being ably seconded by her pupil. Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1, followed, and on the whole was exceedingly well played, the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's lead achieving quite a triumph. Then followed a rondo of Chopin for two pianofortes, which was warmly applauded, and the concert was brought to a close with a performance of a Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," by Saint-Saëns. This evidently did not give as much pleasure as the preceding numbers, but there can be no doubt of the fine orchestral work, in which the band showed fully of what capital material it is made. The third concert of the season takes place on Saturday evening next, when the following programme is to be given, Overture (Medea) Cherubini; Recitative and Air (Faust), Spohr; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (new, first time); Notturmo (Midsummer Night's Dream), Mendelssohn; Songs with piano, Schubert; Cortège de Bacchus (Sylvia), first time, Delibes. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist. The public rehearsal takes place on the preceding Friday afternoon.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1893.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the second concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
Overture, "Prometheus".....Bargiel
Concerto for two pianofortes in E-flat (Kochel, No. 365).....Mozart
Cadenzas by Moscheles.
Symphony in C No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73.....Chopin
Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule".....Saint-Saëns.

Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga von Radecki were the pianists.

Bargiel's "Prometheus" overture is a work which we should like well to hear again. A single hearing proved tantalizing, because confusing. The form, the musical structure and coherence of the piece were by no means clear to our apprehension, albeit that certain unmistakable landmarks showed plainly enough that a symmetrical musical form lay in the composer's intention. For the rest, however, the composition seemed full of vigor, and of that sort of expressive force which the world has agreed to call dramatic. Saint-Saëns's "La jeunesse d'Hercule" has always seemed to us the weakest of the composer's symphonic poems, from a musical point of view. On the present occasion, however, it sounded stronger and more comprehensible than ever before; and although one cannot yet consider it as the equal of "Le Rouet d'Omphale," "Phaëton" or "La Danse Macabre," it may fairly be said to improve upon acquaintance. One need not be long in doubt as to the point of view from which Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems are to be judged. Between them and those of Liszt there exists a certain difference of artistic aim. Whereas, Liszt established the symphonic poem mainly because he felt impelled to write "programme music," that is, to give the fullest musical expression to certain poetical or dramatic ideas unhampered by conventional musical forms, Saint-Saëns is credibly reported to have said that he, himself, took to "programme music"—i. e., the symphonic poem—merely because it seemed to him the best practicable means of escaping from the "tyranny of the old cyclical forms," with their traditional regularity of cut. Thus, Liszt gave up the cyclical (sonata) form because he found it incompatible with the free development of his poetic ideas; but Saint-Saëns took to developing poetic ideas because it would excuse the abandonment of traditional musical forms. It would consequently seem as if the poetic, descriptive and dramatic element in Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems were valued less by the composer than their purely musical side. In view of this fact, it were perhaps out of place to criticise "La jeunesse d'Hercule" on the ground of want of contrast in essential character between the two principal themes upon which it is built up. Certainly the theme which typifies the sterner voice of conscience and the ambition to do great deeds sounds to the full as sensuous and seductive as the other theme which represents the lower voice of the flesh and the yearning after self-indulgence. Ethically speaking, the music seems to picture a struggle between "refined sensuality" and low debauchery, rather than one between duty and desire.

The orchestra played far better than at the first concert. If the wind instruments were still a good deal out of tune in many places, the strings, for some unexplained reason, sounded unusually brilliant. Whether this difference lay wholly or partly in our own ear, or whether the violins were strung with new and thicker strings, we will not attempt to conjecture. Beethoven's ever-delightful first symphony was capitally rendered; the few intricate passages in the work were given with perfect clearness, and the whole conception and execution left very little to be desired. Mozart's beautiful concerto was nicely played, and made a charming impression. We cannot conceive, however, what prompted Mr. Henschel to mark it "first time" in the programme; it has been played, to our knowledge, at least five times before in Boston, and three times with the Moscheles cadenzas. The Chopin Rondo went less well, the players all but coming to grief in two places; another proof of the foolishness in young pianists of playing concerted pieces without notes.

The next programme is—

Overture—"Medea".....Cherubini
Recitative and air from "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
(New, First time.)
Notturmo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Songs with pianoforte.....Schubert
Cortège de Bacchus, from "Sylvia" (First time).....Delibes

Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

Mrs. Garner (Lillian Norton) will sing in the concert of Nov. 3. The orchestra will give concerts in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on the evenings of Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 14 and March 20.

There is a good deal of mourning this winter among musical people over the musical situation here. Mr Higginson's enterprise, as was predicted would be the case, has crowded the most of the other organizations to one side. Admirable as the scheme is as respects the character of the music performed and the excellence of its performance, it is complained that it works to the decided disadvantage of the completest musical development in this city. The effect of crowding on so extensive a series of concerts and at a price for tickets below the cost of production, is to disable the organizations which must count the cost of their performances, and also to suffocate the market.

People cannot take in such a long series of frequent concerts as comprise the Higginson-Henschel season and those usually offered by the other societies and clubs. The result of the crowding of the market thus far has been the loss of $4000 on its Luther concert by the Handel and Haydn society; the Calia has just been able to struggle through; the Beylston is affected, and so is the little Euterpe, which confines itself to chamber concerts; and the Philharmonic has been temporarily at least snuffed out. The Apollo, musical people say, stands alone unaffected. The result of this condition of things is that there is not the musical progress there should be in Boston. Each of these societies has a well defined field of action; and so long as they are prevented from working in their fields art suffers. Such is the complaint, and it is not indulged by the "anti-Henschelites," or by any particular school or clique; but it is common with musical observers who pride themselves upon being unattached to any one clique or set. What will be the course next season is not known. Statements that Mr Henschel will withdraw at the close of this season have been reiterated. But he keeps his own counsel, as does Mr Higginson also. Each, too, is indifferent to the newspaper criticism, but goes his own way as he thinks best, or his judgment dictates, and so wins support and approval. Mr Higginson is now abroad, and may have new plans when he returns. The Higginson-Henschel season this year is apparently the most satisfactory of all in a musical sense; and it is certain that the critics who were so savage at the beginning have calmed down, and now find a great deal to praise and little to condemn. The next important musical event will be Theodore Thomas's Wagner festival in April. This will be given not in the Music hall, but in the huge hall of the Charitable-Mechanic exhibition building in the Back-bay district.

Springfield Republican

Second Symphony Concert.

The second concert in the present course of entertainments by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday night, and, despite the disagreeable weather, was more largely attended than that of the previous week. The programme was long, but the performance was on the whole more interesting than that which opened the season, and engaged the attention of the audience closely to the end. The concert opened with Bargiel's overture to "Prometheus," which was well played, so far as could be judged by the restless, incoherent and disjointed quality of the composer's instrumentation. The work is hardly worth the playing, for it conveys no clear idea and has no distinguishable form. One instinctively feels a profound sympathy for the hard lines of the unhappy Prometheus, as if it were not bad enough to have his liver eaten out in life without having his memory preserved by the dedication to his fame of such a composition. There was a good deal of celebration of classic myths and heroes during the concert. Introduced by Prometheus, it was ushered out by Hercules, the struggles of whose youth and the triumph of whose mature age were celebrated in Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem. This work, as the description which was printed on the programme recites, treats of the contrary influences which were brought to bear upon the hero in early life, the nymphs and bacchantes enticing him to pleasure, and other more noble but undesignated personages to arms and honor. The attractions of the former are set forth by the "lascivious pleatings" of united violins, flutes and other instruments which are supposed to be the concomitants of luxury; those of the latter by a fearful hullabaloo of brass and drums and other such stirring agencies. From a musical point of view Hercules's choice of the ways of war cannot be too much condemned, but in a moral sense he probably acted with discretion. Introduced between these compositions appeared, very gratefully, Beethoven's charming first symphony. It was delightfully played; in fact so well that the criticism which might be aroused on one or two points may justly be disarmed by the general excellence of the reading and performance. We can hardly recall an instance when Mr. Henschel and the orchestra have done a more sympathetic and earnest piece of work. If only the remaining eight symphonies from Beethoven's hand shall be as well interpreted, the season will be one of singular importance.

The soloists of the evening were Miss Olga Von Radecki and Miss Mary E. O'Brien, who played upon two pianos Mozart's concerto in E flat (Köchel, No. 365), with cadenzas by Moscheles—its first performance here—and a rondo by Chopin, op. 73. The concerto proved to be a beautiful work and thoroughly characteristic of the composer. The first movement, perhaps, suggested Mozart only indirectly, but the second and third were most interesting examples of his peculiar power. In this work Miss O'Brien took the first part and Miss Von Radecki the second, an arrangement which was reversed in the Chopin selection. Both artists played exceedingly well, showing a fine appreciation of the works which they interpreted and presenting them in a sincere and intelligent manner which was eminently worthy of praise. Neither, however, displayed any marked power of execution or original insight into the composer's ideas, and their performance impressed one as being that of thoroughly well taught and talented players, who are not, however, possessed of any profound genius. Of the two Miss Von Radecki's playing pleased us the better, as being, on the whole, broader and more individual. The pianists were warmly applauded, and recalled after each of the selections.

The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows, Mr. Max Heinrich being the soloist: Overture (Medea), Cherubini; Recitative and Air (Faust), Spohr; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (new, first time); Notturmo (Midsummernight's Dream), Mendelssohn; Songs with piano, Schubert; Cortège de Bacchus (Sylvia), first time, Delibes.

Notes.

The second of the Symphony Concerts was given in the Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was interpreted: Overture "Prometheus," Bargiel; Concerto for two pianofortes in E flat, Mozart; Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73, Chopin; Symphonic Poem "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns. Although the state of the weather was quite unpropitious, it did not seem to have any effect on the public, who turned out in very large numbers, and almost completely filled the hall. The programme was somewhat lengthy, yet on the whole much more interesting than that with which the series opened, and the attention bestowed on all the numbers was quite marked, while a liberal amount of applause was bestowed. The opening Bargiel's overture "Prometheus" was well played by the orchestra, and this was followed by Mozart's concerto for two pianos in E flat, played by Miss Von Radecki and her pupil, Miss Mary E. O'Brien, of Portland. Miss Radecki, who has been heard here before, appears to have broadened her mastery of the instrument, and Miss O'Brien, who appeared in Boston for the first time, showed thorough training and excellent proficiency. The concerto is one perfect piece of melody, and to it were added Moscheles' cadenzas. The performance was an admirable one, Miss Radecki being ably seconded by her pupil. Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1, followed, and on the whole was exceedingly well played, the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's lead achieving quite a triumph. Then followed a rondo of Chopin for two pianofortes, which was warmly applauded, and the concert was brought to a close with a performance of a Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," by Saint-Saëns. This evidently did not give as much pleasure as the preceding numbers, but there can be no doubt of the fine orchestral work, in which the band showed fully of what capital material it is made. The third concert of the season takes place on Saturday evening next, when the following programme is to be given, Overture (Medea) Cherubini; Recitative and Air (Faust), Spohr; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (new, first time); Notturmo (Midsummernight's Dream), Mendelssohn; Songs with piano, Schubert; Cortège de Bacchus (Sylvia), first time, Delibes. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist. The public rehearsal takes place on the preceding Friday afternoon.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the second concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
Overture, "Prometheus," Bargiel
Concerto for two pianofortes in E-flat (Köchel, No. 365) Mozart
Cadenzas by Moscheles.
Symphony in C No. 1, op. 21 Beethoven
Rondo for two pianofortes, op. 73 Chopin
Symphonic poem, "La jeunesse d'Hercule," Saint-Saëns.

Miss Mary E. O'Brien and Miss Olga von Radecki were the pianists.

Bargiel's "Prometheus" overture is a work which we should like well to hear again. A single hearing proved tantalizing, because confusing. The form, the musical structure and coherence of the piece were by no means clear to our apprehension, albeit that certain unmistakable landmarks showed plainly enough that a symmetrical musical form lay in the composer's intention. For the rest, however, the composition seemed full of vigor, and of that sort of expressive force which the world has agreed to call dramatic. Saint-Saëns's "La jeunesse d'Hercule" has always seemed to us the weakest of the composer's symphonic poems, from a musical point of view. On the present occasion, however, it sounded stronger and more comprehensible than ever before; and although one cannot yet consider it as the equal of "Le Rouet d'Omphale," "Phaëton" or "La Danse Macabre," it may fairly be said to improve upon acquaintance. One need not be long in doubt as to the point of view from which Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems are to be judged. Between them and those of Liszt there exists a certain difference of artistic aim. Whereas, Liszt established the symphonic poem mainly because he felt impelled to write "programme music," that is, to give the fullest musical expression to certain poetical or dramatic ideas unhampered by conventional musical forms, Saint-Saëns is credibly reported to have said that he, himself, took to "programme music"—i. e., the symphonic poem—merely because it seemed to him the best practicable means of escaping from the "tyranny of the old cyclical forms," with their traditional regularity of cut. Thus, Liszt gave up the cyclical (sonata) form because he found it incompatible with the free development of his poetic ideas; but Saint-Saëns took to developing poetic ideas because it would excuse the abandonment of traditional musical forms. It would consequently seem as if the poetic, descriptive and dramatic element in Saint-Saëns's symphonic poems were valued less by the composer than their purely musical side. In view of this fact, it were perhaps out of place to criticise "La jeunesse d'Hercule" on the ground of want of contrast in essential character between the two principal themes upon which it is built up. Certainly the theme which typifies the sterner voice of conscience and the ambition to do great deeds sounds to the full as sensuous and seductive as the other theme which represents the lower voice of the flesh and the yearning after self-indulgence. Ethically speaking, the music seems to picture a struggle between "refined sensuality" and low debauchery, rather than one between duty and desire.

The orchestra played far better than at the first concert. If the wind instruments were still a good deal out of tune in many places, the strings, for some unexplained reason, sounded unusually brilliant. Whether this difference lay wholly or partly in our own ear, or whether the violins were strung with new and thicker strings, we will not attempt to conjecture. Beethoven's ever-delightful first symphony was capitally rendered; the few intricate passages in the work were given with perfect clearness, and the whole conception and execution left very little to be desired. Mozart's beautiful concerto was nicely played, and made a charming impression. We cannot conceive, however, what prompted Mr. Henschel to mark it "first time" in the programme; it has been played, to our knowledge, at least five times before in Boston, and three times with the Moscheles cadenzas. The Chopin Rondo went less well, the players all but coming to grief in two places; another proof of the foolishness in young pianists of playing concerted pieces without notes.

The next programme is—

Overture—"Medea" Cherubini
Recitative and air from "Faust" Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60 Dvorak
(New, first time.)
Notturmo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Songs with pianoforte Schubert
Cortège de Bacchus, from "Sylvia" (First time) Delibes

Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

Mrs. Garner (Lillian Norton) will sing in the concert of Nov. 3. The orchestra will give concerts in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on the evenings of Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 14 and March 20.

There is a good deal of mourning this winter among musical people over the musical situation here. Mr. Higginson's enterprise, as was predicted would be the case, has crowded the most of the other organizations to one side. Admirable as the scheme is as respects the character of the music performed and the excellence of its performance, it is complained that it works to the decided disadvantage of the completest musical development in this city. The effect of crowding on so extensive a series of concerts and at a price for tickets below the cost of production, is to disable the organizations which must count the cost of their performances, and also to suffocate the market. People cannot take in such a long series of frequent concerts as comprise the Higginson-Henschel season and those usually offered by the other societies and clubs. The result of the crowding of the market thus far has been the loss of $4000 on its Luther concert by the Handel and Haydn society; the Calia has just been able to struggle through; the Beylston is affected, and so is the little Euterpe, which confines itself to chamber concerts; and the Philharmonic has been temporarily at least snuffed out. The Apollo, musical people say, stands alone unaffected. The result of this condition of things is that there is not the musical progress there should be in Boston. Each of these societies has a well defined field of action; and so long as they are prevented from working in their fields art suffers. Such is the complaint, and it is not indulged by the "anti-Henschelites," or by any particular school or clique; but it is common with musical observers who pride themselves upon being unattached to any one clique or set. What will be the course next season is not known. Statements that Mr Henschel will withdraw at the close of this season have been reiterated. But he keeps his own counsel, as does Mr Higginson also. Each, too, is indifferent to the newspaper criticism, but goes his own way as he thinks best, or his judgment dictates, and so wins support and approval. Mr Higginson is now abroad, and may have new plans when he returns. The Higginson-Henschel season this year is apparently the most satisfactory of all in a musical sense; and it is certain that the critics who were so savage at the beginning have calmed down, and now find a great deal to praise and little to condemn. The next important musical event will be Theodore Thomas's Wagner festival in April. This will be given not in the Music hall, but in the huge hall of the Charitable-Mechanic exhibition building in the Back-bay district.

l
f l n
e
,
e d
n

56

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Medea.) CHERUBINI.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Faust.) SPOHR.

SYMPHONY in D. op. 60. DVOŘÁK.

(New. First time.)

Allegro non tanto.—Adagio.—Scherzo. [Furiant. (Presto.)]

Finale. (Allegro con spirito.)—

NOTTURNO. (Midsummernights Dream.) MENDELSSOHN.

SONGS WITH PIANO. SCHUBERT.

(a) Liebesbotschaft.

(b) Rastlose Liebe.

CORTEGE DE BACCHUS. (Sylvia.) [First time.] DELIBES.

SOLOIST:

MR. MAX HEINRICH.

57

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Faust.)

SPOHR.

RECIT.

Der Hoelle selbst will ich Segen entringen.
Und ihre Macht gehorche meinem Spruch!
Sie soll der Tugend die Belohnung bringen,
Nur mich allein treffe einst ihr Fluch.
Will mir die Liebe süsses Freuden geben,
So ist das Ziel erreicht vom Erdenleben.

AIR.

Liebe ist die zarte Bluete,
Die mit süsssem Zauberduft
Aufgekeimt in dem Gemuete
Uns zur sanften Freude ruft.
Liebe blühet in Roes'chens Armen,
An der holden Brust,
Dort will ich zum Glueck erwarmen,
Und zur Himmelslust.
Doch woran denk' ich verwegen?
Mich flieht der himmlische Segen.
Schlangen vom Abgrund zischen herauf.
Und die Macht der hoellischen Nacht
Tueckisch hemmt sie den freudigen Lauf.
Doch selbst der Hoelle graessliches Hoehnen
Können die Bande der Liebe versöhnen.
Liebe!
Liebe ist die zarte Bluete, etc.

SONG.

SCHUBERT.

(a) LOVE'S MESSAGE.

Dear prattling brooklet, so silvery bright,
Haste to my fair one with eager delight;
Messenger trusty, when near her you are,
Take her the greeting of love from afar.
All the sweet flowers she has nursed and caressed,
Proud to be worn on her beauteous breast;
Roses that bloom in the purple's rich glow,
Moisten and freshen as onward you flow.

When on the green bank to slumber resigned,
My love recalling, her head's declined,
Comfort the darling with friendly regard,
He who adores her will not retard.
When the sun sets in bright ruby and pearl,
Soothe with low music the sleeping girl,
Murmuring, lull her to sweet repose,
Whispering love's dream as her eyelids close.

(b) RESTLESS LOVE.

The fierce storm breasting,
No moment resting,
The snow-drift facing,
Through dense fog racing,
Still away, still away,
No repose, no stay.

Rather to toil, opposing resistance,
Than so much joy undergo in existence.
All the devotion that heart to heart
renders,
Ah! what emotion and pain it engenders.
How shall I flee? O'er land, or sea?
All's unavailing: Crown of existence,
Blissful annoy—Love's restless joy!

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, before the best house of the season thus far. There were not so many empty seats on the floor as at the earlier concerts of the series. On this occasion Mr. Henschel made a change in the arrangement of the orchestra which gave a great improvement to the general body of tone. The double basses were placed in a line across the back, and the cellos were seated behind the other strings. The result was that the undue prominence into which the basses have hitherto come was avoided, and they took their proper place and produced their proper effect. The wind instruments were better in tune than before, and the concert generally was a remarkably brilliant and satisfactory one. The symphony was Drorak's Op. 60, an exceptionally fine work. In common with all other modern compositions of its class, it could not be fully understood or thoroughly appreciated upon a single hearing; but neither did it weary with vagueness nor confuse with a blind groping after originality at the expense of melody and clearness. The opening allegro is broad, simple in design, and easily understood at once. It is charming in its freshness and its easy flow, and its themes are uncommonly beautiful. The continuity of idea is admirable throughout, and the harmonic and orchestral treatment are very fine. The latter especially is full of grace, imagination and freshness, while it wholly avoids the bizarre. It is one of the finest new symphony movements we have heard for many a day, and there were moments, if we dare say so, in which it seemed as if Beethoven had again spoken with a new utterance; and had it been less long, or had there been less of repetition in it, this movement would be faultless. The adagio is not so clear in meaning and is somewhat prolix, but it is delightful in character and lovely in orchestration. The scherzo is wild and almost weird in character, but it is scored with great brilliancy, is always interesting, and its tone color is very striking and original. The finale is nearly savage in its fire and impetuosity, and in its strange and strongly marked rhythms, and is characterized throughout by immense vitality. Here and there it degenerates into noise, but it is wonderfully effective, and the folk-song that runs through it is treated with great skill and ingenuity. The symphony is a work of genuine power, and we trust that Mr. Henschel will vouchsafe another hearing of it. The orchestra did it ample justice in the spirit, the precision, and the expressiveness with which it assisted the conductor in its interpretation. The strings, upon which great demands are made, acquitted themselves in splendid style. The performance was heartily and deservedly applauded, and the symphony both interested and pleased its hearers. The other novelty of the evening was the "Cortège de Bacchus," from D. Libes's "Sylvia." It is eminently theatrical and somewhat sensational, but is full of character, is instrumented in a most masterly manner, and is brilliant and exciting in effect. This selection also was splendidly played. The other orchestral numbers were Cherubini's overture to "Medea," and the nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," to both of which entire justice was done. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich, who sang the fine bass recitative and air, "Der Hölle selbst" and "Liebe ist die Zarte Bluete," from Spohr's "Faust," and Schubert's song, "Liebesbotschaft," and "Rastlose Liebe." Mr. Heinrich sang with intelligence and thorough artistic taste. His voice is full and resonant, but it is by no means remarkable. It is at times muddy and nasal in quality and unpleasant in effect. Like most German singers, Mr. Heinrich has not the best method of tone production. His singing of the selection from "Faust" was abundant in dramatic force and musically sentiment, but in his rendering of "Restless Love" he sang with much passion and fervor, and achieved a merited success. Mr. Henschel's piano-forte accompaniments to these two songs were full of grace, delicacy and general charm of style. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Concert overture in A, Reitz; Aria, "Il Flauto Magico"; Symphony in G, (Military), Haydn; Adagietto from the Suite op. 101, Raff; Aria, "Il Barbiere di Siviglia"; Hungarian Rhapsody in D (first time), Liszt. The soloist will be Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Music Hall on Saturday night, was attended by the largest audience of the season thus far, and was the best in interest of programme and excellence of performance of the three. It presented a vocalist who is new to Boston, Mr. Max Heinrich, who sang a recitative and air from Spohr's "Faust" and two songs by Schubert, and for the instrumental part of the entertainment Cherubini's overture to "Medea," Dvorak's Symphony in D, op. 60, the nocturne from Mendelssohn's music for "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the "Cortège de Bacchus" from Delibes's "Sylvia." A change of the players from the arrangement hitherto held was noticed in the massing of the double basses behind the other instruments, and the withdrawing of the cellos that have hitherto been placed at the sides of the orchestra and putting them behind the violins. After trying other distributions for two years Mr. Henschel has at last restored his forces to the positions in which other conductors have held them, and it is to be hoped that he will permit their relative locations to remain as they now are. Whether the superior effectiveness of the playing on Saturday night was entirely due to the return to the conventional order of seating may be questioned, but at all events the band has never acquitted itself better than it did on this occasion.

The chief interest of the evening centred upon the symphony, which has now received its first performance in Boston. It is, of course, impossible to speak confidently upon a work of such importance after a single hearing, but the impression it made was exceedingly satisfactory, and there is reason to believe that further performances of it will confirm the favorable verdict which we feel disposed to pass upon it. Certainly, no symphony by any modern composer has been listened to by a Boston audience with such unwearied attention and evident delight. It is an extremely picturesque work, clear in its construction and development, simple and broad in idea, and tune-fully and clearly elaborated. Coming so soon after the turgid and labored commonplaces of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," it aroused warm admiration for its thoughtfulness and refined melody of expression, and seemed to show the hand and brain of a master. The opening of the first—allegro—movement enchained the attention at once, and charms throughout by new and spontaneous beauties of expression, all of which are varied in their development, yet run not into sensationalism or effort, and are coherent with the main themes of the work. A trifle too long, perhaps, and showing a proneness of the composer to linger overmuch on the beautiful changes of orchestration which embellish it—although one can fairly sympathize with his reluctance to leave it—this first movement is, on the whole, worthy of the greatest masters of symphonic writing, and for our part we should have been glad if the orchestra had returned to the beginning when it reached the end, and had played the whole thing over again. The second movement—adagio—is less clear or interesting, but very beautiful in many parts, and exceedingly skillfully arranged in its employment of the various forces of the orchestra. It is, however, the least valuable part of the work. The scherzo is as diametrically opposed to the adagio as one musical composition can be to another. It is wild and breezy in character, like the rest of the symphony original, and very interesting in its almost uncanny power. The concluding allegro, although second in value as a great work of art to the opening movement, is not far behind it in many respects. It demands a vast amount of strength as well as feeling from an orchestra in its performance, and is strangely and quaintly scored. The passages for the strings that occur in it are the most striking parts of the symphony, and present exacting requirements upon the players, but they were interpreted by the orchestra in magnificent style. It is sincerely to be hoped that we may soon be permitted to hear this noble work a second time. The other instrumental numbers were performed equally as well as the symphony—and that is suf-

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Faust.)

SPOHR.

RECIT.

Der Hoelle selbst will ich Segen entringen,
Und ihre Macht gehorche meinem Spruch!
Sie soll der Tugend die Belohnung bringen,
Nur mich allein treffe einst ihr Fluch.
Will mir die Liebe susses Freuden geben,
So ist das Ziel erreicht vom Erdenleben.

AIR.

Liebe ist die zarte Bluete,
Die mit suessem Zauberduft
Aufgekeimt in dem Gemuete
Uns zur sanften Freude ruft.
Liebe bluet in Roes'chens Armen,
An der holden Brust,
Dort will ich zum Glueck erwarmen,
Und zur Himmelslust.
Doch woran denk' ich verwegen?
Mich flicht der himmlische Segen.
Schlangen vom Abgrund zischen herauf,
Und die Macht der hoellischen Nacht
Tueckisch hemmt sie den freudigen Lauf.
Doch selbst der Hoelle graessliches Hoehnen
Koennen die Bande der Liebe versoeennen,
Liebe!
Liebe ist die zarte Bluete, etc.

SONG.

SCHUBERT.

(a) LOVE'S MESSAGE.

Dear prattling brooklet, so silvery bright,
Haste to my fair one with eager delight;
Messenger trusty, when near her you are,
Take her the greeting of love from afar.
All the sweet flowers she has nursed and caressed,
Proud to be worn on her beauteous breast;
Roses that bloom in the purple's rich glow,
Moisten and freshen as onward you flow.

When on the green bank to slumber resigned,
My love recalling, her head's declined,
Comfort the darling with friendly regard,
He who adores her will not retard.
When the sun sets in bright ruby and pearl,
Soothe with low music the sleeping girl,
Murmuring, lull her to sweet repose,
Whispering love's dream as her eyelids close.

(b) RESTLESS LOVE.

The fierce storm breasting,
No moment resting,
The snow-drift facing,
Through dense fog racing,
Still away, still away,
No repose, no stay.

Rather to toil, opposing resistance,
Than so much joy undergo in existence.
All the devotion that heart to heart
renders,
Ah! what emotion and pain it engenders.
How shall I flee? O'er land, or sea?
All's unavailing: Crown of existence,
Blissful annoy—Love's restless joy!

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, before the best house of the season thus far. There were not so many empty seats on the floor as at the earlier concerts of the series. On this occasion Mr. Henschel made a change in the arrangement of the orchestra which gave a great improvement to the general body of tone. The double basses were placed in a line across the back, and the cellos were seated behind the other strings. The result was that the undue prominence into which the basses have hitherto come was avoided, and they took their proper place and produced their proper effect. The wind instruments were better in tune than before, and the concert generally was a remarkably brilliant and satisfactory one. The symphony was Drorak's Op. 60, an exceptionally fine work. In common with all other modern compositions of its class, it could not be fully understood or thoroughly appreciated upon a single hearing; but neither did it weary with vagueness nor confuse with a blind groping after originality at the expense of melody and clearness. The opening allegro is broad, simple in design, and easily understood at once. It is charming in its freshness and its easy flow, and its themes are uncommonly beautiful. The continuity of idea is admirable throughout, and the harmonic and orchestral treatment are very fine. The latter especially is full of grace, imagination and freshness, while it wholly avoids the bizarre. It is one of the finest new symphony movements we have heard for many a day, and there were moments, if we dare say so, in which it seemed as if Beethoven had again spoken with a new utterance; and had it been less long, or had there been less of repetition in it, this movement would be faultless. The adagio is not so clear in meaning and is somewhat prolix, but it is delightful in character and lovely in orchestration. The scherzo is wild and almost weird in character, but it is scored with great brilliancy, is always interesting, and its tone color is very striking and original. The finale is nearly savage in its fire and impetuosity, and in its strange and strongly marked rhythms, and is characterized throughout by immense vitality. Here and there it degenerates into noise, but it is wonderfully effective, and the folk-song that runs through it is treated with great skill and ingenuity. The symphony is a work of genuine power, and we trust that Mr. Henschel will vouchsafe another hearing of it. The orchestra did it ample justice in the spirit, the precision, and the expressiveness with which it assisted the conductor in its interpretation. The strings, upon which great demands are made, acquitted themselves in splendid style. The performance was heartily and deservedly applauded, and the symphony both interested and pleased its hearers. The other novelty of the evening was the "Cortège de Bacchus," from Delibes' "Sylvia." It is eminently theatrical and somewhat sensational, but is full of character, is brilliantly instrumented in a most masterly manner, and is brilliant and exciting in effect. This selection also was splendidly played. The other orchestral numbers were Cherubini's overture to "Medea," and the nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," to both of which entire justice was done. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich, who sang the fine bass recitative and air, "Der Hoelle selbst," and "Liebe ist die Zarte Bluete," from Spohr's "Faust," and Schubert's song, "Liebesbotschaft," and "Rastlose Liebe." Mr. Heinrich sang with intelligence and thorough artistic taste. His voice is full and resonant, but it is by no means remarkable. It is at times muddy and nasal in quality and unpleasing in effect. Like most German singers, Mr. Heinrich has not the best method of tone production. His singing of the selection from "Faust" was abundant in dramatic force and musically sentiment, but in his rendering of "Restless Love" he sang with much passion and fervor, and achieved a merited success. Mr. Henschel's piano-forte accompaniments to these two songs were full of grace, delicacy and general charm of style. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Concert overture in G, A. Reitz; Aria, "Il Flauto Magico"; Symphony in G, (Military), Haydn; Adagietto from the Suite op. 101, Raff; Aria, "Il Barbiere di Siviglia"; Hungarian Rhapsody in D (first time), Liszt. The soloist will be Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower.

Third Symphony Concert.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Music Hall on Saturday night, was attended by the largest audience of the season thus far, and was the best in interest of programme and excellence of performance of the three. It presented a vocalist who is new to Boston, Mr. Max Heinrich, who sang a recitative and air from Spohr's "Faust" and two songs by Schubert, and for the instrumental part of the entertainment Cherubini's overture to "Medea," Dvorak's Symphony in D, op. 60, the nocturne from Mendelssohn's music for "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the "Cortège de Bacchus" from Delibes' "Sylvia." A change of the players from the arrangement hitherto held was noticed in the massing of the double basses behind the other instruments, and the withdrawing of the cellos that have hitherto been placed at the sides of the orchestra and putting them behind the violins. After trying other distributions for two years Mr. Henschel has at last restored his forces to the positions in which other conductors have held them, and it is to be hoped that he will permit their relative locations to remain as they now are. Whether the superior effectiveness of the playing on Saturday night was entirely due to the return to the conventional order of seating may be questioned, but at all events the band has never acquitted itself better than it did on this occasion.

The chief interest of the evening centred upon the symphony, which has now received its first performance in Boston. It is, of course, impossible to speak confidently upon a work of such importance after a single hearing, but the impression it made was exceedingly satisfactory, and there is reason to believe that further performances of it will confirm the favorable verdict which we feel disposed to pass upon it. Certainly, no symphony by any modern composer has been listened to by a Boston audience with such unwearied attention and evident delight. It is an extremely picturesque work, clear in its construction and development, simple and broad in idea, and tunelessly and clearly elaborated. Coming so soon after the turgid and labored commonplaces of Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony," it aroused warm admiration for its thoughtfulness and refined melody of expression, and seemed to show the hand and brain of a master. The opening of the first—allegro—movement enchains the attention at once, and charms throughout by new and spontaneous beauties of expression, all of which are varied in their development, yet run not into sensationalism or effort, and are coherent with the main themes of the work. A trifle too long, perhaps, and showing a proneness of the composer to linger overmuch on the beautiful changes of orchestration which embellish it—although one can fairly sympathize with his reluctance to leave it—this first movement is, on the whole, worthy of the greatest masters of symphonic writing, and for our part we should have been glad if the orchestra had returned to the beginning when it reached the end, and had played the whole thing over again. The second movement—adagio—is less clear or interesting, but very beautiful in many parts, and exceedingly skilfully arranged in its employment of the various forces of the orchestra. It is, however, the least valuable part of the work. The scherzo is as diametrically opposed to the adagio as one musical composition can be to another. It is wild and breezy in character, like the rest of the symphony original, and very interesting in its almost uncanny power. The concluding allegro, although second in value as a great work of art to the opening movement, is not far behind it in many respects. It demands a vast amount of strength as well as feeling from an orchestra in its performance, and is strangely and quaintly scored. The passages for the strings that occur in it are the most striking parts of the symphony, and present exacting requirements upon the players, but they were interpreted by the orchestra in magnificent style. It is sincerely to be hoped that we may soon be permitted to hear this noble work a second time. The other instrumental numbers were performed equally as well as the symphony—and that is suf-

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Recent praise. The selection from "Sylvia," which also received its first performance before a Boston audience, on this occasion, proved to be a brilliant work, richly scored and characteristic, with plentiful suggestions of the chronic conditions of the deity whom it celebrated, riotous, tripping and amusing.

Mr. Heinrich sang his selection from Spohr with excellent taste and to good effect; his Schubert songs less well, but nevertheless satisfactorily. His voice is of pleasant quality for the most part, and has a fair degree of strength, but is not of any very remarkable beauty or power, and seems to be of uneven quality, very rich and beautiful tones in one part of his register being succeeded by very dry and rough ones in others. He was very generously applauded, and evidently made a very good impression. The accompaniments to the Schubert songs were played on the piano by Mr. Henschel, who approved himself, as he has often done before, as the inferior of no accompanist in the matters of beauty, taste and judgment.

The next concert introduces Mrs. Lillian Norton Gower as the soloist, and presents the following programme: Concert-overture in A, Rietz; Aria (Flauto Magico), Mozart; Symphony in G (military), Haydn; Adagio from the Suite op. 101, Raff; Aria (Barbiere di Siviglia), Rossini; Hungarian Rhapsody in D, Liszt (first time).

The regular concert-goer looked in vain for the contrabasses in their usual position. The orchestra has again been (like a paid bill) reseated, and now in a very sensible manner; the double basses are in the rear. One by one Mr. Henschel has dropped his reforms and innovations, but he is not to be derided for proving the saying that "a wise man changes his mind," etc., but rather to be commended for not proving himself self-opinionated. His conducting this year is better than ever, being more reserved and quite as effective, and his readings show more of study and less of audacity.

The concert began with that ever fresh, symmetrical bit of pure music—the overture to "Medea" by Cherubini. It was well rendered.

A new vocalist, Mr. Max Heinrich, a bass-baritone, in aria from Spohr's sugary—not to say treacly—"Faust," proved himself a singer of exquisite taste and generally good method. He managed his breathing and phrasing very artistically, with the single exception of the cadenza on "erwarmen," which was stiff. In Schubert's "Lieschen" and "Rastlose Liebe" with excellent accompaniments by Mr. Henschel, he showed that he really comprehended the poetry of the German lied. The only faults were a throatiness at the passage "Krone des Lebens," and a thinness on the highest tones.

The interest of the concert centred on Dvorak's new symphony, heard here for the first time. It is plainly a lofty and well developed work. It opens with a square chorale like theme, well suited to development and to a full (brass) climax. Both opportunities are used to the best advantage. There is much treatment of figures, but this only heightens the interest. The Adagio comes second to afford a contrast with the force of the first movement. It has long, mournful phrases, leading to some very striking dissonances, which dissolve into calmness and melodic ecstasy on the wood wind in high register, after the manner of high modern composers. It contains some very brusque contrasts. The third movement is a wild and furious one. It might be a Czech festivity, or for the matter of that a Jewish Dance. Yet the instrumentation is not so bizarre as the sensational composers would have used. An excellent effect is that at the end of the trio—which is chiefly wood wind and very swingy—where the tempo which has been calm for a moment, grows faster and faster, and finally whirls back into the chief theme. The last movement has a noble, martial style, and again becomes broad and chorale-like, has one of the noblest of climaxes. The treatment of the theme in short staccato phrases against running scales, is masterly, as also are the reminiscences of the previous movements. All the movements are well-contrasted, and the work seems pregnant with meaning, but in the absence of any clue we dare not join the ranks of the intention finders.

Mendelssohn's Nocturne was a good and legitimate lightening of the programme. Delibes' "Cortège de Bacchus" was charmingly rhythmical, full of telling "points" and contrasts, and effective instrumentation of a certain order. Brassy enough it was in all conscience. Bacchus seems to have come home from the lodge accompanied by a full brass band, and seems to be in the same condition himself; an odd interrupted rhythm represents musical hiccoughs; clashes of cymbals and whirls of flutes in the trio represent Mrs. B. and her emphatic—"and striking"—remonstrances—but after all we will not endeavor to supply meanings to M. Delibes' tone pictures.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Production of a New Symphony by Dvorak—Notes and Comments.

The programme given at the third symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture ("Medea").....Cherubini
Recitative and air ("Faust").....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
(New, first time.)
Allegro non tanto—adagio—scherzo (Furiant (Presto))
Finale (Allegro con spirito.)
Notturmo ("Midsummer Night's Dream")

Songs, with piano.....Mendelssohn
(a) "Liebesbotschaft,"
(b) "Rastlose Liebe."

"Cortège de Bacchus" ("Sylvia") (first time)...Delibes

It will be observed that two novelties are included in the list, a fact that added great interest to the entertainment. The Dvorak symphony follows closely the classical models, and in every movement are passages and themes of high merit. Its reception last evening was hearty, and indicated that it has possibilities for popularity in Boston. The opening of the first movement is particularly pleasing, the melody is simple and tuneful, and the orchestration delightfully clear. These characteristics continue throughout all the so-called first part of the movement. In the development or working out of the themes, however, there is often much confusion; many long passages that seem forced upon the work, and the whole movement so prolonged as to become somewhat wearisome. The failure to meet the highest demands of thematic development, however, do not condemn the work. It is full of interest, though an analysis of the first movement is a fair indication of the others. We are inclined to take this composition as a text for a short discourse upon one of the effects in symphonic music, which, properly used, is good, but, overused, is intolerable. We refer to the excessive rumbling on the kettledrums in the forte passages. The effect of the drums is something like that of a good, robust malediction, which, used constantly to express intensity or emphasis, descends to vulgar profanity. Dvorak has overstepped the borders in this symphony, and in many places has produced so much noise that the listener longs for a good, strong chord, deafeningly loud, if need be, but without the rattling of the drums.

The other novelty was finely played, and was an excellent selection with which to end the concert. Delibes has been growing in popularity here ever since the ballet music from "Sylvia" was produced, and this selection from the same work proved well worthy of the composer. The other orchestral numbers were well rendered, and, of course, interesting.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Max Heinrich. He is the possessor of a basso cantante voice, carefully cultivated, but of no more than moderate natural endowments. It is flexible and strong; but the same tone is certainly not always produced on the different vowels, and the medium notes frequently develop a resonance that is nothing short of harshness. The selection from Spohr's Faust is of surpassing beauty, and well calculated to call forth the finest efforts of a basso. Mr. Heinrich sang in excellent taste, and brought out the beauties of the vocal part in a very satisfactory way, although he appeared much better in the songs from Schubert. A word of praise should be bestowed, in passing, upon Mr. Henschel's efforts as accompanist, and another in criticism upon the wretched translations of songs which defaced the programme. Better keep the original German on its page, as in the case of the Faust air, than such clumsy misrepresentations of the poet's fancy as

When on the green bank to slumber resigned,
My love recalling, her head's declined,
Comfort the darling with friendly regard,
He who adores her will not retard.

This is worse than ridiculous, and it is hoped the arranger of programmes "will not retard" to improve the poetry the next time there is occasion to print any, even if he has to hire a rhymester to translate especially for the occasion. The programme announced for next Saturday evening is as follows:

Concert-overture in A.....Rietz
Aria ("Flauto Magico").....Mozart
Symphony in G (Military).....Haydn
Adagio from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria ("Barbiere di Siviglia").....Rossini
Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt
First time.
Soloist: Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton).

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third Programme of the Season's Series at Music Hall.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Max Heinrich baritone, and the selection:

Overture—"Medea".....Cherubini
Recitative and air—"Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
Notturmo—"Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Songs with piano.....Schubert
(a) "Liebesbotschaft," (b) "Rastlose Liebe."
Cortège de Bacchus—"Sylvia".....Delibes

The programme, save in the selection of the symphony, was a happy effort in this line of work, and the effect of the final numbers left a very pleasing memory of the evening's performance. Mr. Heinrich, the soloist, was eminently successful in establishing himself as a favorite with Boston's audiences, and a future appearance here will be pleasantly anticipated. His voice is a singularly pleasing baritone, and its training has been most thorough. In the Spohr selection, the recitative was delivered with grace and artistic elegance of phrasing, and the aria was sung with equally satisfactory results. The Schubert songs, in which he had the assistance of Mr. Henschel as accompanist, were admirable bits of vocal work, and gave great enjoyment. The audience quickly recognized the abilities of the singer, and he was honored with an enthusiastic recall after each number.

The symphony was heard for the first time, and proved a work eminently suited to win the favor of those who take delight in the algebraical forms of musical composition. Aside from the unhealthy craving for novelties which the presentation of such a work goes to satisfy, it is as difficult to understand the reasons for its being included in the scheme of programmes as it is to comprehend the causes which led a portion of the audience to applaud its several movements. The composition is but a little better than so much musical rubbish, and over noisy at that. Save in the scherzo, in which the leading theme is that of a "Furiant," or Slavonic dance, there is hardly a musical idea of any distinct originality or value in the whole work, and the slight glimpses of musical thoughts are well nigh obscured by the noisy and overelaborated orchestration. Such music has nothing to recommend it as a source of enjoyment, and it is extremely difficult to realize that any intelligent musician should care to waste time in its study. The work is in good form, and was given with a degree of care and skill that told of much time wasted in its rehearsal. The beautiful "Notturmo" of Mendelssohn came like a stream of sunlight after a dull November day, and gave new life to the hearer, who had been wearied by the meaningless noise and din of the symphony, and the bright music of the "Sylvia" number quite restored the audience to its good nature and sent its members away from the hall with a disposition to forgive Mr. Henschel for inflicting such a symphony upon them on account of the counterbalancing pleasure caused by Mr. Heinrich's singing and the remaining numbers of the programme.

icient praise. The selection from "Sylvia," which also received its first performance before a Boston audience, on this occasion, proved to be a brilliant work, richly scored and characteristic, with plentiful suggestions of the chronic conditions of the deity whom it celebrated, riotous, tripping and amusing.

Mr. Heinrich sang his selection from Spohr with excellent taste and to good effect; his Schubert songs less well, but nevertheless satisfactorily. His voice is of pleasant quality for the most part, and has a fair degree of strength, but is not of any very remarkable beauty or power, and seems to be of uneven quality, very rich and beautiful tones in one part of his register being succeeded by very dry and rough ones in others. He was very generously applauded, and evidently made a very good impression. The accompaniments to the Schubert songs were played on the piano by Mr. Henschel, who approved himself, as he has often done before, as the inferior of no accompanist in the matters of beauty, taste and judgment.

The next concert introduces Mrs. Lillian Norton Gower as the soloist, and presents the following programme: Concert-overture in A, Rietz; Aria (Flauto Magico), Mozart; Symphony in G (military), Haydn; Adagietto from the Suite op. 101, Raff; Aria (Barbiere di Siviglia), Rossini; Hungarian Rhapsody in D, Liszt (first time).

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The regular concert-goer looked in vain for the contrabasses in their usual position. The orchestra has again been (like a paid bill) reseated, and now in a very sensible manner; the double basses are in the rear. One by one Mr. Henschel has dropped his reforms and innovations, but he is not to be derided for proving the saying that "a wise man changes his mind," etc., but rather to be commended for not proving himself self-opinionated. His conducting this year is better than ever, being more reserved and quite as effective, and his readings show more of study and less of audacity.

The concert began with that ever fresh, symmetrical bit of pure music—the overture to "Medea" by Cherubini. It was well rendered.

A new vocalist, Mr. Max Heinrich, a bass-baritone, in aria from Spohr's sugary—not to say treacly—"Faust," proved himself a singer of exquisite taste and generally good method. He managed his breathing and phrasing very artistically, with the single exception of the cadenza on "erwarmen," which was stiff. In Schubert's "Liebesbrot" and "Rastlose Liebe" with excellent accompaniments by Mr. Henschel, he showed that he really comprehended the poetry of the German lied. The only faults were a throatiness at the passage "Krone des Lebens," and a thinness on the highest tones.

The interest of the concert centred on Dvorak's new symphony, heard here for the first time. It is plainly a lofty and well developed work. It opens with a square chorale like theme, well suited to development and to a full (brass) climax. Both opportunities are used to the best advantage. There is much treatment of figures, but this only heightens the interest. The Adagio comes second to afford a contrast with the force of the first movement. It has long, mournful phrases, leading to some very striking dissonances, which dissolve into calmness and melodic ecstasy on the wood wind in high register, after the manner of high modern composers. It contains some very brusque contrasts. The third movement is a wild and furious one. It might be a Czech festivity, or for the matter of that a Dewrish Dance. Yet the instrumentation is not so bizarre as the sensational composers would have used. An excellent effect is that at the end of the trio—which is chiefly wood wind and very swingy—where the tempo which has been calm for a moment, grows faster and faster, and finally whirls back into the chief theme. The last movement has a noble, martial style, and again becomes broad and chorale-like, has one of the noblest of climaxes. The treatment of the theme in short staccato phrases against running scales, is masterly, as also are the reminiscences of the previous movements. All the movements are well-contrasted, and the work seems pregnant with meaning, but in the absence of any clue we dare not join the ranks of the intention finders.

Mendelssohn's Nocturne was a good and legitimate lightening of the programme. Delibes' "Cortège de Bacchus" was charmingly rhythmical, full of telling "points" and contrasts, and effective instrumentation of a certain order. Brassy enough it was in all conscience. Bacchus seems to have come home from the lodge accompanied by a full brass band, and seems to be in the same condition himself; an odd interrupted rhythm represents musical hiccoughs; clashes of cymbals and whirls of flutes in the trio represent Mrs. B. and her emphatic—"and striking"—remonstrances—but after all we will not endeavor to supply meanings to M. Delibes' tone pictures.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Production of a New Symphony by Dvorak—Notes and Comments.

The programme given at the third symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture ("Medea").....Cherubini
Recitative and air ("Faust").....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
(New, first time.)

Allegro non tanto—adagio—scherzo (Furiant (Presto))
Finale. (Allegro con spirito.)
Notturmo ("Midsummer Night's Dream").....Mendelssohn

Songs, with piano.....Schubert
(a) "Liebesbotschaft,"
(b) "Rastlose Liebe."

"Cortège de Bacchus" ("Sylvia") (first time)...Delibes

It will be observed that two novelties are included in the list, a fact that added great interest to the entertainment. The Dvorak symphony follows closely the classical models, and in every movement are passages and themes of high merit. Its reception last evening was hearty, and indicated that it has possibilities for popularity in Boston. The opening of the first movement is particularly pleasing, the melody is simple and tuneful, and the orchestration delightfully clear. These characteristics continue throughout all the so-called first part of the movement. In the development or working out of the themes, however, there is often much confusion; many long passages that seem forced upon the work, and the whole movement so prolonged as to become somewhat wearisome. The failure to meet the highest demands of thematic development, however, do not condemn the work. It is full of interest, though an analysis of the first movement is a fair indication of the others. We are inclined to take this composition as a text for a short discourse upon one of the effects in symphonic music, which, properly used, is good, but, overused, is intolerable. We refer to the excessive rumbling on the kettledrums in the forte passages. The effect of the drums is something like that of a good, robust malediction, which, used constantly to express intensity or emphasis, descends to vulgar profanity. Dvorak has overstepped the borders in this symphony, and in many places has produced so much noise that the listener longs for a good, strong chord, deafeningly loud, if need be, but without the rattling of the drums.

The other novelty was finely played, and was an excellent selection with which to end the concert. Delibes has been growing in popularity here ever since the ballet music from "Sylvia" was produced, and this selection from the same work proved well worthy of the composer. The other orchestral numbers were well rendered, and, of course, interesting.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Max Heinrich. He is the possessor of a basso cantante voice, carefully cultivated, but of no more than moderate natural endowments. It is flexible and strong; but the same tone is certainly not always produced on the different vowels, and the medium notes frequently develop a resonance that is nothing short of harshness. The selection from Spohr's Faust is of surpassing beauty, and well calculated to call forth the finest efforts of a basso. Mr. Heinrich sang in excellent taste, and brought out the beauties of the vocal part in a very satisfactory way, although he appeared much better in the songs from Schubert. A word of praise should be bestowed, in passing, upon Mr. Henschel's efforts as accompanist, and another in criticism upon the wretched translations of songs which defaced the programme. Better keep the original German on its page, as in the case of the Faust air, than such clumsy misrepresentations of the poet's fancy as

When on the green bank to slumber resigned,
My love recalling, her head's declined.
Comfort the darling with friendly regard,
He who adores her will not retard.

This is worse than ridiculous, and it is hoped the arranger of programmes "will not retard" to improve the poetry the next time there is occasion to print any, even if he has to hire a rhymester to translate especially for the occasion. The programme announced for next Saturday evening is as follows:

Concert-overture in A.....Rietz
Aria ("Flauto Magico").....Mozart
Symphony in G (Military).....Haydn
Adagietto from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria ("Barbiere di Siviglia").....Rossini
Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt
First time.

Soloist: Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton).

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third Programme of the Season's Series at Music Hall.

The third of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Max Heinrich baritone, and the selection:

Overture—"Medea".....Cherubini
Recitative and air—"Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
Notturmo—"Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Songs with piano.....Schubert
(a) "Liebesbotschaft," (b) "Rastlose Liebe."

Cortège de Bacchus—"Sylvia".....Delibes

The programme, save in the selection of the symphony, was a happy effort in this line of work, and the effect of the final numbers left a very pleasing memory of the evening's performance. Mr. Heinrich, the soloist, was eminently successful in establishing himself as a favorite with Boston's audiences, and a future appearance here will be pleasantly anticipated. His voice is a singularly pleasing baritone, and its training has been most thorough. In the Spohr selection, the recitative was delivered with grace and artistic elegance of phrasing, and the aria was sung with equally satisfactory results. The Schubert songs, in which he had the assistance of Mr. Henschel as accompanist, were a admirable bit of vocal work, and gave great enjoyment. The audience quickly recognized the abilities of the singer, and he was honored with an enthusiastic recall after each number.

The symphony was heard for the first time, and proved a work eminently suited to win the favor of those who take delight in the algebraical forms of musical composition. Aside from the unhealthy craving for novelties which the presentation of such a work goes to satisfy, it is as difficult to understand the reasons for its being included in the scheme of programmes as it is to comprehend the causes which led a portion of the audience to applaud its several movements. The composition is but a little better than so much musical rubbish, and over noisy at that. Save in the scherzo, in which the leading theme is that of a "Furiant," or Slavonic dance, there is hardly a musical idea of any distinct originality or value in the whole work, and the slight glimpses of musical thoughts are well nigh obscured by the noisy and overelaborated orchestration. Such music has nothing to recommend it as a source of enjoyment, and it is extremely difficult to realize that any intelligent musician should care to waste time in its study. The work is in good form, and was given with a degree of care and skill that told of much time wasted in its rehearsal. The beautiful "Notturmo" of Mendelssohn came like a stream of sunlight after a dull November day, and gave new life to the hearer, who had been wearied by the meaningless noise and din of the symphony, and the bright music of the "Sylvia" number quite restored the audience to its good nature and sent its members away from the hall with a disposition to forgive Mr. Henschel for inflicting such a symphony upon them on account of the counterbalancing pleasure caused by Mr. Heinrich's singing and the remaining numbers of the programme.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Experience with the latter-day symphonies tends to put the concert-goer into an abnormal attitude when he is called to hear one of them. According to the authorship of the unknown composition, does he prepare a tense attention, almost desperate to discover something which he can understand and remember in the hour of metaphysical rambling which awaits him, or he relaxes every nerve, ready to be swept away on uncontrollable surges of sound. But Mr. Henschel's orchestra had not played twenty bars of Dvorák's symphony in D, given in Boston for the first time on Saturday evening, before the auditor began to fancy that something better and more true was to be vouchsafed. Nor was this fancy vain; for as the symphony moved on, it awakened animating interest, and each movement was followed by prompt and spontaneous applause. It is not a small testimony in favor of the work, that this first performance should have been heard with such ease, and without the often-felt sensation of perplexity at its close. People looked at one another with pleased content in their faces, and exchanged little nods of approval which it would have gratified the author to see. Since the time when Gade's first symphony came so freshly and encouragingly into the musical world, we have scarcely heard a composition of this class which approached more nearly to the manner of the great masters, relying, as it does, on the rational development of its thought by legitimate means, not making tone-pictures or dramatic scenes of its movements, nor hiding the paucity of its thought in verbosity or involution. Not that Dvorák is a new Beethoven, by any means, or that his symphony is perfection. He is often prolix, and seems sometimes not quite to know his own mind, so that after a just conclusion has been reached, he suddenly strikes in with an irrelevant thought, and goes off in search of a new climax, which can differ but little from that he has just overpassed. But, then, Schubert has done the same in the first movement of his C major symphony. And, again, Dvorák seems now and then to start back from his lyre, as if afraid "e'en of the sound himself had made," and he hesitates to restore or to sustain a melody for which he has just prepared the way. His orchestration is wonderfully rich and enjoyable, because the harmonies are close, and each instrument is used according to its kind, the author rarely employing its extreme tones, but making it speak where its voice is fullest and best, and so distributing his phrases that they never seem to fall by chance or for experiment's sake to one or another instrument. The character of each movement is distinctly marked, the themes are evident and appropriate, and their development is generally plain in project, although often involved in polyphonic harmony and broken by characteristic syncopations.

The first movement is an allegro non tanto; it begins piquantly by a series of short tentative phrases, like questions and answers, which pass from the upper to the lower half of the orchestra;

the theme is approached, and the whole band springs in suddenly and grasps it in a stirring fortissimo; at the conclusion of the movement—reached with sundry halts and digressions—the early treatment is recalled, another end is quiet and soft. The adagio which follows has a devotional cast, and its opening sounds like a choral vorspiel as the parts drop down from a unison into their own places in the harmony. A sequence of harsh, strange, dissonant chords, which occurs in this movement as it nears its ending, is another interpolation, the value or use of which is not apparent. The scherzo, which is a presto, takes the form of a farfant, or popular dance, and is of great originality in device and development. It begins with a curious broken rhythm, and is continued with odd and unexpected cross-accent, and an orchestration which is often eccentric, but cannot justly be charged with extravagance, to which the lighter and smoother trio gives relief. The finale, an allegro con spirito, is principally based upon a melody which would appear to be a folk-song. When the full measure of the movement has been reached, it develops into a kind of march, suggesting a wild and magnificent procession, as Dvorák's dances suggest their pictures of quaint steps and figures. The vigor and speed of the movement are unrelaxed, and it leaves a sense of unusual exhilaration and not unworthy excitement when it ends. The playing was fine from beginning to end. Mr. Henschel was in evident sympathy with the work, whose dramatically poetic qualities would naturally appeal to him. Occasionally he made variations from the tempi as he had established them, which, unless the score calls for them, we could not approve,—notably a great relaxation in the allegro and a great acceleration in the adagio. The other orchestral numbers were the nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," which seemed curiously cool and unreal after the symphony, and the "Cortège de Bacchus" (also a novelty) from the "Sylvie" of Delibes. This last proved as charming, in its way, as the "Pizzicati." Not at all reminiscent, it yet sounded at first just as one would expect such a march to sound, but when, a little later, the harp and violins came in with their cloud of crpeggios around the short, sharp chromatic slidings of the melody, all was new and picturesque, and the conclusion, with its tarantella-like whirl, made a brilliant ending to a very delightful concert.

Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist of the evening, and sang the "Love" recitative and air from Spohr's "Faust," and two songs of Schubert, which latter Mr. Henschel accompanied at the pianoforte. Mr. Heinrich's voice, well trained to intonation and execution, and of pleasant timbre, yet lacks—as do so many German voices—evenness of quality, and contrasts nasal and harsh tones with beautifully clear and soft ones. His singing is, in other respects, musicianly and most expressive. It deserved liberal applause, and he received it.

We only express a general sentiment when we thank Mr. Henschel for at last relegating his double-basses to the back row, moving rearward the cellos, and dropping the drums from their lofty perch. Such an improvement! The horns and the wooden wind came out as never before in these concerts, the fundamental bass was never weak or indistinct, and the ensemble had a symmetry which was like a revelation.

Mrs. Gower (Miss Lillian Norton, or Giglio Nordica, according to her Italian stage name) will sing at the next concert, the usual soprano selections from the "Magic Flute" and the "Barber of Seville." The orchestra will play Haydn's "Military" symphony, Rietz's concert overture in A, the adagietto from a suite of Raff, and (for the first time) Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" in D.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A note from Miss Radecki asks us to correct an impression (in which we had shared) that Miss O'Brien was a pupil of hers, when the fact is that they were only fellow-students in music.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was—
Overture to "Medea".....Cherubini
Recitative and air from "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorák
(New. First time.)

Notturmo, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream,"
Mendelssohn
Songs, with pianoforte.....Schubert
(a) Liebesbotschaft.
(b) Rastlose Liebe.

Cortège de Bacchus, from "Sylvia," first time, Delibes
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

A slight, but not unimportant, change was again noticeable in the seating of the orchestra. Four of the eight double-basses were placed in a line at the back of the orchestra (facing the audience), the remaining four being divided into two pairs, one on each side, as before. An evident improvement! Cherubini's wonderful overture to "Medea," which has always seemed to us to dispute with Beethoven's "Coriolan" the claim to being the most essentially tragic of orchestral compositions—that is, tragic in the restricted, antique sense of the word—was played with much fire and decision of accent, and with praiseworthy precision. Yet one missed a certain elegance of phrasing which the beautiful and noble themes seem to invite. The wealth of deep pathos that lies in many portions of this overture has often been more fully revealed. Of Dvorák's new symphony we can say no more than of other large works heard only a single time. The impression it made upon us was exceedingly vague, saving that the fiery rhythm of the third movement, "Furiant," with its unbridled impetuosity, betrayed the composer's Magyar extraction plainly enough. Much of the work was exciting, while not a little seemed strangely beautiful, but, with the best will in the world, we were able to carry very little of it away with us; and its construction and coherence still seem wholly problematical. For one thing, the constant very high writing for the violins soon proved so fatiguing to the ear as to make the work very hard to listen to. Yet one could not but feel that one was in the presence of the work of a man who had something to say, and that, little of it as might be understood at the first hearing, the full meaning was worth looking for, and that the composition would amply repay careful study. We sincerely hope to hear it again; it certainly whetted one's curiosity to hear the composer's "Stabat Mater," of which such glowing accounts come from across the water, and which the Cecilia is to give at one of its concerts this winter. Mendelssohn's charming Notturmo was, upon the whole, somewhat roughly handled. The "Cortège de Bacchus" from "Sylvia" is decidedly the most Offenbachian composition we have ever heard at a symphony concert, and goes far to prove that M. Delibes's system of writing score after score for small boulevard theatres, while waiting for an opening at the Grand Opera, is not without its dangers to a composer of high aspirations. The great baritone air from Spohr's "Faust" made an immediate impression by its great and manifold beauties. It is indeed a wholly noble piece of writing, and well calculated to make one feel that, in too carelessly consigning Spohr to oblivion, the world has been a loser. Mr. Heinrich sang the air with much depth of feeling and with an amount of artistic insight that made one regret the inadequacy of his technical proficiency as a singer. Such fine intellectual and artistic gifts as Mr. Heinrich's cannot show themselves in their full splendor when the singer has not absolute and facile command over his voice. The first of the pair of Schubert's songs was delightfully sung; the second by no means so effectively.

The next programme is—

Concert overture in A.....Rietz
Aria from "Il Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
Adagietto from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian rhapsody in D.....Liszt

Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) will be the singer. The orchestra will give concerts in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on the evenings of Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 14 and March 20. Season tickets will be for sale at the University Bookstore tomorrow morning.

Notes. Traveller

The third of the symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, and attracted a very large and fashionable audience. The concert was unquestionably the best of the season so far, and the orchestra played in a most superior manner. The instrumental numbers consisted of Cherubini's overture, "Medea"; Dvorák's Symphony in D, op. 60, for the first time; Mendelssohn's Notturmo, "Midsummer Night's Dream"; and Delibes, "Cortège de Bacchus Sylvia," for the first time. Two new works were given, but by far the greatest amount of interest was centred on the Symphony of Dvorák, a work which is admirably constructed and abounds in passages of rare beauty and great merit. There were five movements, allegro non tante, adagio, scherzo, furiant, and allegro con spirito. The whole work is one of great interest throughout, and its first movement, which is a very pleasing one, may be taken as an indication of the whole. Its melody is very harmonious and delicate, its theme simple but effective, and hence will become very popular. It was listened to with the closest attention, afforded the utmost satisfaction, and the applause was unstinted. While all the movements were remarkably fine, perhaps the first was the most warmly commended, but the whole symphony will be gladly welcomed as a valuable addition to any programme on which it may be placed. The selection from "Sylvie," which was also given for the first time in this city, was well received. It is a rich and brilliant movement, the music characteristic of the "monarch of the vine, plump Bacchus with pink eyes," and full of revelry. The other familiar numbers afforded much pleasure, while all were exquisitely interpreted under the direction of Mr. Henschel. The soloist on the occasion was Mr. Max Heinrich, who has a barytone voice of a pleasing quality, of considerable quantity and a good degree of cultivation. His numbers included a recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust," and two songs by Schubert, with piano accompaniments charmingly played by Mr. Henschel. The aria from "Faust" was one of great beauty and was finely sung, but it struck us that Mr. Heinrich was at his best in the Schubert selections, which were given with much taste and artistic feeling. The fourth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, with the following programme: Concert overture in A, Rietz; Aria ("Flauto Magico"), Mozart; Symphony in G (Military), Haydn; Adagietto from the Suite on 101, Raff; Aria ("Barbiere di Siviglia"), Rossini; Hungarian Rhapsody in D, Liszt, first time; Soloist, Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton).

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Experience with the latter-day symphonies tends to put the concert-goer into an abnormal attitude when he is called to hear one of them. According to the authorship of the unknown composition, does he prepare a tense attention, almost desperate to discover something which he can understand and remember in the hour of metaphysical rambling which awaits him, or he relaxes every nerve, ready to be swept away on uncontrollable surges of sound. But Mr. Henschel's orchestra had not played twenty bars of Dvorák's symphony in D, given in Boston for the first time on Saturday evening, before the auditor began to fancy that something better and more true was to be vouchsafed. Nor was this fancy vain; for as the symphony moved on, it awakened animating interest, and each movement was followed by prompt and spontaneous applause. It is not a small testimony in favor of the work, that this first performance should have been heard with such ease, and without the often-felt sensation of perplexity at its close. People looked at one another with pleased content in their faces, and exchanged little nods of approval which it would have gratified the author to see. Since the time when Gade's first symphony came so freshly and encouragingly into the musical world, we have scarcely heard a composition of this class which approached more nearly to the manner of the great masters, relying, as it does, on the rational development of its thought by legitimate means, not making tone-pictures or dramatic scenes of its movements, nor hiding the paucity of its thought in verbosity or involution. Not that Dvorák is a new Beethoven, by any means, or that his symphony is perfection. He is often prolix, and seems sometimes not quite to know his own mind, so that after a just conclusion has been reached, he suddenly strikes in with an irrelevant thought, and goes off in search of a new climax, which can differ but little from that he has just overpassed. But, then, Schubert has done the same in the first movement of his C major symphony. And, again, Dvorák seems now and then to start back from his lyre, as if afraid "e'en of the sound himself had made," and he hesitates to restore or to sustain a melody for which he has just prepared the way. His orchestration is wonderfully rich and enjoyable, because the harmonies are close, and each instrument is used according to its kind, the author rarely employing its extreme tones, but making it speak where its voice is fullest and best, and so distributing his phrases that they never seem to fall by chance or for experiment's sake to one or another instrument. The character of each movement is distinctly marked, the themes are evident and appropriate, and their development is generally plain in project, although often involved in polyphonic harmony and broken by characteristic syncopations.

The first movement is an allegro non tanto; it begins piquantly by a series of short tentative phrases, like questions and answers, which pass from the upper to the lower half of the orchestra;

the theme is approached, and the whole band spring in suddenly and grasp it in a stirring fortissimo; at the conclusion of the movement—reached with sundry halts and digressions—the early treatment is recalled, another end is quiet and soft. The adagio which follows has a devotional cast, and its opening sounds like a choral vorspiel as the parts drop down from a unison into their own places in the harmony. A sequence of harsh, strange, dissonant chords, which occurs in this movement as it nears its ending, is another interpolation, the value or use of which is not apparent. The scherzo, which is a presto, takes the form of a furiant, or popular dance, and is of great originality in device and development. It begins with a curious broken rhythm, and is continued with odd and unexpected cross-accent, and an orchestration which is often eccentric, but cannot justly be charged with extravagance, to which the lighter and smoother trio gives relief. The finale, an allegro con spirito, is principally based upon a melody which would appear to be a folk-song. When the full measure of the movement has been reached, it develops into a kind of march, suggesting a wild and magnificent procession, as Dvorák's dances suggest their pictures of quaint steps and figures. The vigor and speed of the movement are unrelaxed, and it leaves a sense of unusual exhilaration and not unworthy excitement when it ends. The playing was fine from beginning to end. Mr. Henschel was in evident sympathy with the work, whose dramatically poetic qualities would naturally appeal to him. Occasionally he made variations from the tempi as he had established them, which, unless the score calls for them, we could not approve,—notably a great relaxation in the allegro and a great acceleration in the adagio. The other orchestral numbers were the nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," which seemed curiously cool and unreal after the symphony, and the "Cortège de Bacchus" (also a novelty) from the "Sylvie" of Delibes. This last proved as charming, in its way, as the "Pizzicati." Not at all reminiscent, it yet sounded at first just as one would expect such a march to sound, but when, a little later, the harp and violins came in with their cloud of crpeggios around the short, sharp chromatic slidings of the melody, all was new and picturesque, and the conclusion, with its tarantella-like whirl, made a brilliant ending to a very delightful concert.

Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist of the evening, and sang the "Love" recitative and air from Spohr's "Faust," and two songs of Schubert, which latter Mr. Henschel accompanied at the pianoforte. Mr. Heinrich's voice, well trained to intonation and execution, and of pleasant timbre, yet lacks—as do so many German voices—evenness of quality, and contrasts nasal and harsh tones with beautifully clear and soft ones. His singing is, in other respects, musicianly and most expressive. It deserved liberal applause, and he received it.

We only express a general sentiment when we thank Mr. Henschel for at last relegating his double-basses to the back row, moving rearward the cellos, and dropping the drums from their lofty perch. Such an improvement! The horns and the wooden wind came out as never before in these concerts, the fundamental bass was never weak or indistinct, and the ensemble had a symmetry which was like a revelation.

Mrs. Gower (Miss Lillian Norton, or Giglio Nordica, according to her Italian stage name) will sing at the next concert, the usual soprano selections from the "Magic Flute" and the "Barber of Seville." The orchestra will play Haydn's "Military" symphony, Rietz's concert overture in A, the adagietto from a suite of Raff, and (for the first time) Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" in D.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

A note from Miss Radecki asks us to correct an impression (in which we had shared) that Miss O'Brien was a pupil of hers, when the fact is that they were only fellow-students in music.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was—

Overture to "Medea".....Cherubini
Recitative and air from "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorák
(New, first time.)

Notturmo, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream,"
Mendelssohn
Songs, with pianoforte.....Schubert
(a) Liebesbotschaft.
(b) Rastlose Liebe.

Cortège de Bacchus, from "Sylvia," first time, Delibes
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

A slight, but not unimportant, change was again noticeable in the seating of the orchestra. Four of the eight double-basses were placed in a line at the back of the orchestra (facing the audience), the remaining four being divided into two pairs, one on each side, as before. An evident improvement! Cherubini's wonderful overture to "Medea," which has always seemed to us to dispute with Beethoven's "Coriolan" the claim to being the most essentially tragic of orchestral compositions—that is, tragic in the restricted, antique sense of the word—was played with much fire and decision of accent, and with praiseworthy precision. Yet one missed a certain elegance of phrasing which the beautiful and noble themes seem to invite. The wealth of deep pathos that lies in many portions of this overture has often been more fully revealed. Of Dvorák's new symphony we can say no more than of other large works heard only a single time. The impression it made upon us was exceedingly vague, saving that the fiery rhythm of the third movement, "Furiant," with its unbridled impetuosity, betrayed the composer's Magyar extraction plainly enough. Much of the work was exciting, while not a little seemed strangely beautiful, but, with the best will in the world, we were able to carry very little of it away with us; and its construction and coherence still seem wholly problematical. For one thing, the constant very high writing for the violins soon proved so fatiguing to the ear as to make the work very hard to listen to. Yet one could not but feel that one was in the presence of the work of a man who had something to say, and that, little of it as might be understood at the first hearing, the full meaning was worth looking for, and that the composition would amply repay careful study. We sincerely hope to hear it again; it certainly whetted one's curiosity to hear the composer's "Stabat Mater," of which such glowing accounts come from across the water, and which the Cecilia is to give at one of its concerts this winter. Mendelssohn's charming Notturmo was, upon the whole, somewhat roughly handled. The "Cortège de Bacchus" from "Sylvia" is decidedly the most Offenbachian composition we have ever heard at a symphony concert, and goes far to prove that M. Delibes's system of writing score after score for small boulevard theatres, while waiting for an opening at the Grand Opera, is not without its dangers to a composer of high aspirations. The great baritone air from Spohr's "Faust" made an immediate impression by its great and manifold beauties. It is indeed a wholly noble piece of writing, and well calculated to make one feel that, in too carelessly consigning Spohr to oblivion, the world has been a loser. Mr. Heinrich sang the air with much depth of feeling and with an amount of artistic insight that made one regret the inadequacy of his technical proficiency as a singer. Such fine intellectual and artistic gifts as Mr. Heinrich's cannot show themselves in their full splendor when the singer has not absolute and facile command over his voice. The first of the pair of Schubert's songs was delightfully sung; the second by no means so effectively.

The next programme is—

Concert overture in A.....Rietz
Aria from "Il Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
Adagietto from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian rhapsody in D.....Liszt

Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) will be the singer. The orchestra will give concerts in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on the evenings of Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Feb. 14 and March 20. Season tickets will be for sale at the University Bookstore tomorrow morning.

Notes. Traveller.

The third of the symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, and attracted a very large and fashionable audience. The concert was unquestionably the best of the season so far, and the orchestra played in a most superior manner. The instrumental numbers consisted of Cherubini's overture, "Medea"; Dvorák's Symphony in D, op. 60, for the first time; Mendelssohn's Notturmo, "Midsummer Night's Dream"; and Delibes, "Cortège de Bacchus Sylvia," for the first time. Two new works were given, but by far the greatest amount of interest was centred on the Symphony of Dvorák, a work which is admirably constructed and abounds in passages of rare beauty and great merit. There were five movements, allegro non tante, adagio, scherzo, furiant, and allegro con spirito. The whole work is one of great interest throughout, and its first movement, which is a very pleasing one, may be taken as an indication of the whole. Its melody is very harmonious and delicate, its theme simple but effective, and hence will become very popular. It was listened to with the closest attention, afforded the utmost satisfaction, and the applause was unstinted. While all the movements were remarkably fine, perhaps the first was the most warmly commended, but the whole symphony will be gladly welcomed as a valuable addition to any programme on which it may be placed. The selection from "Sylvie," which was also given for the first time in this city, was well received. It is a rich and brilliant movement, the music characteristic of the "monarch of the vine, plump Bacchus with pink eyes," and full of revelry. The other familiar numbers afforded much pleasure, while all were exquisitely interpreted under the direction of Mr. Henschel. The soloist on the occasion was Mr. Max Heinrich, who has a barytone voice of a pleasing quality, of considerable quantity and a good degree of cultivation. His numbers included a recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust," and two songs by Schubert, with piano accompaniments charmingly played by Mr. Henschel. The aria from "Faust" was one of great beauty and was finely sung, but it struck us that Mr. Heinrich was at his best in the Schubert selections, which were given with much taste and artistic feeling. The fourth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, with the following programme: Concert overture in A, Rietz; Aria ("Flauto Magico"), Mozart; Symphony in G, (Military), Haydn; Adagietto from the Suite on 101, Raff; Aria ("Barbiere di Siviglia"), Rossini; Hungarian Rhapsody in D, Liszt, first time; Soloist, Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton).

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Histrionic and Harmonic Happenings of the Hour.

Third Concert by the Symphony Orchestra.

A feeling of uncertainty was, we think, in the minds of the major part of the audience, the residuum of the third concert by the Symphony Orchestra. Writing "as one of the scribes" and not "as one having authority," we must say that the new symphony in D, by Dvorak, left us in a curious frame of mind. The new symphonies have been such in their nature that the listener to one of them, at its first production, either makes ready for close and unremitting study or abandons himself to a sensuous enjoyment of musical sound. Close study of this symphony is, during the first movement, especially, tiresome and unsatisfactory, for the work of the composer seems vague and unformed, and elusive. The work had this pleasing characteristic, that it increased in attractiveness as it proceeded, and by the time the third movement had been finished, the audience had grown into great sympathy with the composer. The first movement, allegro non tanto, is characterized by a series of short phrases which pass from one half of the orchestra to the other like responsive speeches. The following adagio is extremely devotional in its character, its chords changing from unison to part music, reminding one somewhat of a chorale. A number of harsh dissonances, here introduced, do not carry their explanation with them. The scherzo, which is presto takes the form of a folk-song and is charmingly original. Its broken rhythm and odd and unforeseen accentuation make the elaborate orchestration extremely pleasant, and one wishes to close his eyes and see the picture with his mental faculties. The final movement, allegro con spirito, is, perhaps, the finest of all. It develops into a march that presents to the mind a picture of wild and gorgeous figures in procession, and at its end leaves a sense of exhilaration and excitement. The individual movements appeared to us unusually long; the first movement, with its uncertainty and suggestion of repetition and tautology, seemed almost interminable. We were glad to note, notwithstanding this feeling of fatigue, a desire on the part of most of the audience, even the individual members least favorably impressed with the work, to hear it again, for further study. The nocturne from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's Dream," following the symphony, gave a pleasing sense of rest and peace, after the much-drumming of the preceding number. The "Cortege de Bacchus," from Leo Delibes' "Sylvia" received its first interpretation on this occasion. It is a charming composition and made a fitting ending to this, in many respects, the most delightful concert of the short season. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist of the evening, singing the "Love" recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust" and two Schubert songs, the latter with piano accompaniment. Mr. Heinrich's voice, a basso cantante, has many fine, sweet tones, but, as well, many others that are quite as harsh. His phrases were unusually long, his breath being expended over more space than any of our recent artists have covered. The "Faust" number was especially pleasing. Mrs. Gower (Miss Lillian Norton), will sing, at the next concert, soprano selections from the "Magic Flute," and the "Barber of Seville." The orchestral numbers will be Reitz's "Concert Overture" in A, Haydn's (military) Symphony in G, the adagietto from the suite op. 101, of Raff, and (for the first time), the Hungarian Rhapsody in D, by Liszt. Mr. Henschel is to be thanked and congratulated for the change in the arrangement of his orchestra. By dropping the drums, putting the double-basses in the rear rank, and moving the cellos to the rearward, he has wonderfully improved the ensemble.

PASSING HARMONIES.

The third, fourth, fifth and sixth concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been given since the last RECORD was issued.

The third program was as follows:

Overture to "Medea".....Cherubini
Recitative and air from "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
(New. First time.)
Notturmo, from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Mendelssohn
Songs, with pianoforte.....Schubert
(a) Liebesbotschaft.
(b) Rastlose Liebe.
Cortege de Bacchus, from "Sylvia" first time, Delibes
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

A change was again made in the arrangement of the orchestra, four of the eight double basses being placed in a line at the back of the orchestra (facing the audience) the other four being divided into pairs, one on each side, as before.

The change was a decided improvement.

Cherubini's Overture was grandly interpreted. The impression made by Dvorak's new symphony was not particularly pleasing, but a second hearing may be more satisfying.

Delibes' work is of the opera bouffe school, and was entirely out of place in a program of this character.

Mr. Heinrich sang Spohr's air with much artistic feeling.

68

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

CONCERT OVERTURE in A. op. 7. RIETZ.

ARIA. (Flauto Magico.) MOZART.

SYMPHONY in G. (Military.) HAYDN.

Adagio: Allegro.—Allegretto.—Menuetto. (Moderato.)
Finale. (Presto.)

ADAGIETTO from the Suite op. 101. RAFF.

ARIA. (Barbiere di Siviglia.) ROSSINI.

HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY in D. LISZT.
(FIRST TIME.)

SOLOIST:

MRS. FREDERIC ALLEN GOWER.

(MISS LILLIAN NORTON.)

69

ARIA. (Flauto Magico.)

ENGLISH VERSION.

QUEEN OF NIGHT. The pangs of hell are raging in my bosom;
Death and destruction wildly flame around!
Go forth and bear my vengeance to Sarastro,
Or as my daughter thou shalt be disowned.
I cast thee off forever,
The ties of love I sever,
I spurn thee and renounce thee,
If thou darest to brave my wrath.

ARIA. (Barbiere di Siviglia.)

ENGLISH VERSION.

ANDANTE. There's a voice that I enshrine
In my heart, and none must know;
Ah, Lindor, that voice is thine,
'Tis for thee my heart doth glow.
Yes, Lindoro shall be mine,
I have sworn it for weal or woe.
My intent I'll not resign,
Though my guardian should say no,
He my love need not divine
Till my hand I may bestow.

ALLEGRO. I am all gentleness, I'm all devotion,
Humble, obedient, all soft emotion;
I can be ruled with ease, nor guidance spurn,
But if you cross my will,
Or, what I do, take ill,
Like any viper I will turn.
A thousand tricks I'll play,
But I will have my way—
This all must learn.

MOZART.

ROSSINI.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fourth Programme of the Season's Series at Music Hall.

The fourth of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton), and the programme as follows:

Concert overture in A, op. 7.....Rietz
Aria "Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G, "Military".....Haydn
Adagio from the Suite, op. 101.....Raff
Aria "Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt

The leading event of the evening was the re-appearance of Mrs. Gower, who has not sung in Boston for many years, and has during her absence gained reputation and honors abroad and won a generous recognition of her vocal abilities from the patrons of the Grand Opera in Paris. The lady and her many friends in the immense audience attending have cause to feel an honest pride in the success attending her efforts, and the enthusiastic applause which rewarded each of her numbers and recalled her again and again at their conclusion was fully justified by the meritorious work of the singer. The "Queen of the Night" aria from Mozart's opera displayed the purity and reliability of the artist's vocal gifts, as the trying measures of the composition were sung with perfect ease and in the most enjoyable fashion, every note being given with delightful truthfulness, the entire results showing an admirable comprehension of the beauties of the selection. The "Una voce" gave further evidence of the artist's abilities, as it displayed the sympathetic quality of her voice to good advantage, and proved the singer to be an adept in the technique of her art. Mrs. Gower's voice has a more than usual range for one of such purity and brilliancy, and its development shows that it has been skilfully trained, while her method is most satisfying, all her tones being given with the greatest ease. Such an artist is an acquisition to the concert stage, and it is to be regretted that other opportunities for a hearing of the lady may not be afforded the public. The orchestral work of the evening was of such general excellence that little adverse criticism could justly be made upon the presentation of this part of the programme. It was, however, impossible not to note one peculiarity in the effect the selections made upon the audience, judging from the applause given. It would appear from this very unreliable test that the sentiment of those present was in favor of all the abstruse complications and incomprehensible writings of the modern composers, rather than the charming and ever pleasing melodies of Haydn. It would be difficult to select a more thoroughly tuneful composition than the evening's symphony, and during its several movements the ear was delighted with the purest musical thoughts made apparent to all hearers by the simplest and most eloquent language, yet the appreciation shown by the audience was entirely lacking in enthusiasm. It is easy to see that if the bizarre effects and the noise and din of such works as Rietz' overture and the Liszt rhapsody are now needed to call out the applause of this audience, that Gilmore's guns and anvils will have to be brought forward in the future to make any marked impression upon the patrons of these concerts. The many tuneful and skilfully treated themes of the overture were well nigh forgotten in the din and racket of the finale of the composition; and much the same result was achieved by the ending of the Liszt number, the larger part of this work, though, being enjoyed, in spite of the extravagances of the composer, by reason of its ever changing but always melodious themes. The Raff selection was wisely made, as it is an ample amount of such a composition, the slight idea of its opening measures being entirely lost in the over elaboration with which it is treated. Oddly enough, this number of the programme appeared to give almost unqualified pleasure to the audience.

MUSICAL. GARDNER

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was a very large attendance, probably induced by the first appearance of Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) since her return from abroad. The reception that attended Mrs. Gower was of the most cordial description. She sang The Queen of Night's song from "The Magic Flute," and "Una voce poco fa," from "The Barber of Seville." The lady has a cold and wholly unsympathetic voice of great compass, but which has not had the most judicious training. She executes with considerable facility, but in a frigid and not over clear manner, except in staccato passages, which she gives with a very clean cut and often brilliant effect. The notes in her middle register are badly produced, and in rapid bravura phrases her delivery is blurred, and notes are run into each other in a style far from artistic. Her trill is not only very bad, but is untuneful as well, and her phrasing is without grace or method. She is excellent in some few tricks of technique, but is lacking in breadth, power and refinement of expression. In the Mozart air, which, after all, is of little value musically, and makes no great demand upon an artist save in the tax it levies on exceptional notes in the upper register, Mrs. Gower did ample justice to the staccato phrases. In all other respects she failed to produce any effect, and of force in expression there was not a trace throughout. It was a piece of undramatic vocal fireworks, without fire or impressiveness. In holding the last note too long she came in conflict with the harmonies in the orchestra. In the Rossini aria Mrs. Gower was equally erratic. The florid passages were too frequently injured by clumsy execution, and the playful grace and airy delicacy of the last movement were lost in the heavy and mechanical manner in which it was rendered. In fact, we cannot remember when an artist of whom flattering hopes were entertained proved a greater disappointment. That Mrs. Gower has rare natural capacities as a vocalist cannot with any justice be denied. Had she been better taught, she possesses elements to have developed into a singer of rare powers. As it is, unpleasing as it may be to write the words, she is a mistake. We must not omit to add that a large number of her hearers thought otherwise; for she was rapturously applauded and was recalled with the most demonstrative enthusiasm after each selection. The concert opened with Rietz's fine concert overture in A, op. 7, which was admirably played. Haydn's Symphony in G, to which the name "Military" is attached, ended the first part. Its first three movements are quaint, but charming, nevertheless, in their grace, their naturalness, and their melodiousness. The finale is a masterpiece of the first water, and shows the composer at his best. It has an exquisite beauty and freshness, and would do honor to any composer. The whole work was finely interpreted, and with an admirable feeling for its style and character. Raff's beautiful Adagio from his Suite, op. 101, was also performed in a refined and sympathetic manner. The concert concluded with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D, which was played for the first time here. Like all the works of its class from the same hand it is abundant in spirit and originality, and stirring in effect. Here again the orchestra acquitted itself in a most creditable and praiseworthy style.

The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, op. 69, Hiller; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner; a group of piano solos, and Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony. Mr. Arthur Foote is to be the soloist.

The largest audience of the season thus far greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening. The extra numbers were brought out by the appearance of Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) as the soloist of the evening. The following programme was rendered:

Concert overture in A, op. 7.....Rietz
Aria, "Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
Adagio: Allegro—Allegretto—Mennetto (Moderato.)
Finale (Presto.)
Adagietto from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria, "Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt
(First time)

The overture is, musically, a most pleasing composition, melodious and simple, and yet with an individuality in the treatment of each instrumental part that adds to it an intellectual charm. As a piece of execution, the rendition last evening was of the highest order; and it was in many respects the most satisfactory work the orchestra has done. The fine passages for the wind instruments were played with rare delicacy and in exact tune, and in certain cantabile phrases for the strings there was a perfect union of movement, tone and expression that told of high discipline and masterly leadership. The same results, mechanical and otherwise, hardly followed in some of the other numbers. There was a lack of precision in tone, noticeable in the accompaniment to the Russian aria, and a frequent unevenness in bowing that have not been characteristic of the orchestra in the previous concerts. Beyond these slight defects the rendition of the entire programme was most satisfactory. The novelty of the evening was another of those seeming incongruous compositions that Liszt has so often produced. It is full of beauties, and when there is melody it is simple, at times almost commonplace; when there is not melody there are sometimes eccentric noises, and at others eccentric pauses. As a whole, it is well worth attention, and should be heard again.

All the orchestral numbers were received with unusual favor, especially the middle movements of the symphony, but the chief interest centred upon the efforts of Mrs. Gower. It was her first appearance in this country since her return from her European successes, and it is said to be her only appearance during her visit. She was warmly welcomed, and created great enthusiasm by her singing. Her voice is full and powerful, and so well cultivated that she carries the same quality of tone without a break throughout her entire compass. The strength and breadth of her upper notes were refreshing to hear, and at the same time there was not a harsh tone on any note. Such power, sweetness and flexibility is extremely rare, and Mrs. Gower richly merited the many recalls she received. Her triumph was complete and no one wondered at the reports of her conquest of Paris. It would be a great pleasure to hear her in some other style of music than the florid airs of a school of opera that is steadily passing away. A voice with such characteristics must be capable of rendering a great variety of music, and we are inclined to think that her greatest success would come in a style whose demands were not so great for brilliancy of execution. For though no flaws are to be picked with her method, her natural endowments point to a different field of vocal work as the one most appropriate for her.

The programme announced for next Friday and Saturday is as follows:

Overture (Egmont).....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69.....Hiller
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner

Plans 1910.
(a) Prelude in C major. (Well tempered Clavichord.).....Bach
(b) Gavotte in B minor.....Bach-Saint Saens
(c) Etude in D flat major.....Liszt
Symphony in D minor. (Reformation.) Mendelssohn
No. 5, op. 102.
Luther's choral "Ein' feste Burg"
Soloist—Mr. Arthur Foote.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ordinary observer must have thought that Miss Lillian Norton gave a concert assisted by the Boston Orchestra, last night. The entire attention seemed fixed upon the young singer who has represented America in European Opera houses, and the vast audience which filled the hall to overflowing was certainly not attracted by the Haydn Symphony.

Yet the orchestra work was all finely done, and the numbers were of an agreeable lightness, without being trivial in the least. The Haydn Military Symphony was performed in a manner that left little to be desired; its beautiful minuet could not have been better done, and in the first movement the wood wind showed how much it has improved since last season. We were also pleased with the reserve shown in the tempo of the Presto. It was a Haydn presto, a vastly different thing from a Berlioz or Liszt presto. The adagietto from Raff's Suite op. 101 was given with much refinement of shading and steadiness of tone.

Now for the singer. Miss Norton—now Mrs. Gower—has a voice of remarkable brilliancy, and extensive compass. In the aria "Gli Angeli Inferni," the great solo of the Queen of the Night, in Mozart's "Magic Flute," she proved that she had dramatic expression, but rather unequal delivery of tone; a superb staccato, and a very effective deep register, as well as great clearness in the extreme upper notes. At the close of the number, the high note, was not as well sustained as it might have been, but this was the only tangible fault to be found with the difficult aria. In "Una Voce," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville," the floriture were finely rendered, and the notes in deepest register brought out with telling effect. We may add that the fair singer created an enthusiasm that has seldom been equalled in a symphony concert. Recall followed recall, and the audience seemed to desire to abrogate the rule forbidding encores at these concerts. At the next concert, Luther's commemoration will receive homage in tones, by the performance of the Reformation Symphony.

The musical incident of the week was the reappearance to-night at the Symphony concert of Lillian Norton Gower, the "Mme. Nordica" of the Paris Opera. Mrs. Gower made her debut here about five years ago, then a poor and almost friendless girl. She returns with a European fame and a millionaire husband, young Mr. Gower, formerly of Providence, the European agent of the Bell telephone.

Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, before a very large audience, which was attracted mainly, no doubt, by the announcement that Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) would make on this occasion her first public appearance since her return from her successful professional residence abroad. Her singing was evidently looked upon as the one event of the evening, and the instrumental numbers seemed even to be regarded with a sort of toleration, which was by no means just to them or creditable to a musical audience. The playing of Rietz's Concert Overture in A, op. 7, Haydn's "Military" Symphony, the adagietto from a suite of Raff's, op. 101, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D, was all very fine, the performance of the beautiful symphony, in particular, being remarkable for its delicacy and appreciation. It was, however, very quietly received, although duly applauded in that polite and indulgent way which is almost as bad as no applause at all. Mrs. Gower, however, gained what the orchestra lost, and created tremendous enthusiasm by her singing of the famous Queen of the Night's solo from the "Magic Flute" and "Una Voce" from the "Barber of Seville"—trite selections both, but well adapted to the singer's brilliant technical powers. Her voice proved to be well adapted to such efforts, being of great compass and power and fairly clear and flexible, but without any marked sympathetic quality or expression. On the whole, she proved to be somewhat of a disappointment to expectations that may have been raised too high by the reports of her successes in Paris.

The concert next Saturday night will be devoted to the following programme, with Mr. Arthur Foote as soloist: Overture (Egmont), Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69, Hiller; Kaisermarsch, Wagner; piano solo (a) prelude in C major, Bach; (b) Gavotte in B minor, Bach-Saint Saens; (c) Etude in D flat major, Liszt; symphony in D minor (Reformation) Mendelssohn, No. 5, op. 102.

The fourth of the Symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday, and the largest audience of the season, thus far, was attracted. The instrumental numbers in the programme were played in a most superior manner by the orchestra under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, and they consisted of Rietz's Concert Overture in A, op. 7; Haydn's Military Symphony; the adagietto, from a suite by Raff, op. 101; and the Hungarian Rhapsody in D, by Liszt. All these numbers were performed in the most perfect manner, especially so the Symphony, yet they did not awaken that amount of enthusiasm which they should. The audience was evidently, in a great measure, reserving its applause for Mrs. Gower (Lillian Norton), whose delightful voice has not been heard in concert in this city for a number of seasons. Since her absence she has improved in every respect, her voice being fuller and richer, more flexible and more brilliant. She gave as her numbers the solo of The Queen of Night, from "The Magic Flute," and "Una voce poco fa," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville," both with marvellous effect, and to the complete satisfaction of the audience, who applauded her again and again. The whole concert was a most interesting one, and made a very enjoyable evening's entertainment. The fifth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, with Mr. Arthur Foote as the soloist, the full programme being, Overture (Egmont), Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69, Hiller; Kaisermarsch, Wagner; piano solo (a) prelude in C major, Bach; (b) Gavotte in B minor, Bach-Saint Saens; (c) Etude in D flat major, Liszt; symphony in D minor (Reformation) Mendelssohn, No. 5, op. 102.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The chief interest of Saturday evening's symphony concert attached to the appearance, after several years of absence, of Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower, who has been hitherto known as Miss Lillian Norton, or by her stage pseudonym of Giglio Nordica. Many friends of the lady were in the audience, and she was not only warmly welcomed but twice recalled after each of her selections with every indication of much popular approval. Certainly Mrs. Gower has an instant claim upon the favor of an audience. Her presence and bearing are so fine, her face and expression so winning, that an entente cordiale is established even before she begins to sing. But the impression which follows and is derived from her singing, is not so simple a one, and partakes of disappointment at the discrepancy between the singer's natural powers and the results which she has accomplished with them. Whether, by the choice of a different department of art, she might have accomplished better things, it is not now easy to guess; but what she did on this occasion could not have satisfied any exacting taste. Mrs. Gower's voice is clear, resonant, even, and full of vitality; it has occasional hardness in the middle and lower registers, but this may not be an inherent quality, but only an expression of that frequent disposition of sopranos to give power to these tones, even at the expense of their true characteristics. Her execution is strangely unequal; she can give a series of staccato notes with precision and distinctness, and she strikes difficult intervals truly; but her descending scales and her gruppetti are blurred and indefinite. Her first number was the Queen of Night's stormy air from the "Magic Flute," which she sang with great spirit and determination, although somewhat roughly at times, and with undeniable justness and effect in the imperative arpeggios and repeated notes. Though cold, the delivery was declamatory and direct, and suggested that the singer's best success would probably be in broad and forcible music, wherein little finesse should be needed. Mrs. Gower's second selection—the Una voce poco fa, from the "Barber of Seville"—confirmed this idea. Accepting the fact that Rossini's air is nowadays lost in the bravura which has been heaped upon his floridity, this great air of Rosina always makes one absolute demand upon the artist,—that all its ornamentation shall seem to stream spontaneously from her lips, and shall never impede the flow of the sentiment, but really heighten its varied dramatic effect. The moment the air is sung,—on the stage or off of it,—like a solfeggio of Panzeron or Bordogni, it has no longer any reason for being. And as Mrs. Gower sang, it became just such an exercise. The words were beautifully spoken, the themes and variations performed; but the evanescent play of Rosina's fancy, flashing from the assertion of devoted gentleness and affection to warnings of a viper's swift returnings, and to playful threats of trick upon trick, was not there. The vocalization was decided and well meant, but marked by the faults we have mentioned already, and just falling short of that indescribable completeness and proportion which make up a finished style, while a New England girl's calm propositions took the place of the Spanish

The largest audience of the season thus far greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening. The extra numbers were brought out by the appearance of Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) as the soloist of the evening. The following programme was rendered:

Concert overture in A, op. 7.....Rietz
Aria, "Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G (Military).....Haydn
Adagio: Allegro—Allegretto—Vennetto (Moderato.)
Finale: Presto.
Adagietto from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria, "Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt
(First time)

The overture is, musically, a most pleasing composition, melodious and simple, and yet with an individuality in the treatment of each instrumental part that adds to it an intellectual charm. As a piece of execution, the rendition last evening was of the highest order; and it was in many respects the most satisfactory work the orchestra has done. The fine passages for the wind instruments were played with rare delicacy and in exact time, and in certain cantabile phrases for the strings there was a perfect union of movement, tone and expression that told of high discipline and masterly leadership. The same results, mechanical and otherwise, hardly followed in some of the other numbers. There was a lack of precision in tone, noticeable in the accompaniment to the Russian aria, and a frequent unevenness in bowing that have not been characteristic of the orchestra in the previous concerts. Beyond these slight defects the rendition of the entire programme was most satisfactory. The novelty of the evening was another of those seeming incongruous compositions that Liszt has so often produced. It is full of beauties, and when there is melody it is simple, at times almost commonplace; when there is not melody there are sometimes eccentric noises, and at others eccentric pauses. As a whole, it is well worth attention, and should be heard again.

All the orchestral numbers were received with unusual favor, especially the middle movements of the symphony, but the chief interest centred upon the efforts of Mrs. Gower. It was her first appearance in this country since her return from her European successes, and it is said to be her only appearance during her visit. She was warmly welcomed, and created great enthusiasm by her singing. Her voice is full and powerful, and so well cultivated that she carries the same quality of tone without a break throughout her entire compass. The strength and breadth of her upper notes were refreshing to hear, and at the same time there was not a harsh tone on any note. Such power, sweetness and flexibility is extremely rare, and Mrs. Gower richly merited the many recalls she received. Her triumph was complete and no one wondered at the reports of her conquest of Paris. It would be a great pleasure to hear her in some other style of music than the florid airs of a school of opera that is steadily passing away. A voice with such characteristics must be capable of rendering a great variety of music, and we are inclined to think that her greatest success would come in a style whose demands were not so great for brilliancy of execution. For though no flaws are to be picked with her method, her natural endowments point to a different field of vocal work as the one most appropriate for her.

The programme announced for next Friday and Saturday is as follows:

Overture, (Egmont).....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69.
Hiller
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner

Piano solo.
(a) Prelude in C major. (Well tempered Clavichord.).....Bach
(b) Gavotte in B minor.....Bach-Saint Saens
(c) Etude in D flat major.....Liszt
Symphony in D minor. (Reformation.) Mendelssohn
No. 5, op. 102.
Luther's choral "Ein' Feste Burg"
Soloist—Mr. Arthur Foote.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ordinary observer must have thought that Miss Lillian Norton gave a concert assisted by the Boston Orchestra, last night. The entire attention seemed fixed upon the young singer who has represented America in European Opera houses, and the vast audience which filled the hall to overflowing was certainly not attracted by the Haydn Symphony.

Yet the orchestra work was all finely done, and the numbers were of an agreeable lightness, without being trivial in the least. The Haydn Military Symphony was performed in a manner that left little to be desired; its beautiful minuet could not have been better done, and in the first movement the wood wind showed how much it has improved since last season. We were also pleased with the reserve shown in the tempo of the Presto. It was a Haydn presto, a vastly different thing from a Berlioz or Liszt presto. The adagietto from Raff's Suite op. 101 was given with much refinement of shading and steadiness of tone.

Now for the singer. Miss Norton—now Mrs. Gower—has a voice of remarkable brilliancy, and extensive compass. In the aria "Gli Angeli Inferni," the great solo of the Queen of the Night, in Mozart's "Magic Flute," she proved that she had dramatic expression, but rather unequal delivery of tone; a superb staccato, and a very effective deep register, as well as great clearness in the extreme upper notes. At the close of the number, the high note, was not as well sustained as it might have been, but this was the only tangible fault to be found with the difficult aria. In "Una Voce," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville," the floriture were finely rendered, and the notes in deepest register brought out with telling effect. We may add that the fair singer created an enthusiasm that has seldom been equalled in a symphony concert. Recall followed recall, and the audience seemed to desire to abrogate the rule forbidding encores at these concerts. At the next concert, Luther's commemoration will receive homage in tones, by the performance of the Reformation Symphony.

The musical incident of the week was the reappearance to-night at the Symphony concert of Lillian Norton Gower, the "Mme. Nordica" of the Paris Opera. Mrs. Gower made her debut here about five years ago, then a poor and almost friendless girl. She returns with a European fame and a millionaire husband, young Mr. Gower, formerly of Providence, the European agent of the Bell telephone.

Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, Saturday evening, before a very large audience, which was attracted mainly, no doubt, by the announcement that Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) would make on this occasion her first public appearance since her return from her successful professional residence abroad. Her singing was evidently looked upon as the one event of the evening, and the instrumental numbers seemed even to be regarded with a sort of toleration, which was by no means just to them or creditable to a musical audience. The playing of Rietz's Concert Overture in A, op. 7, Haydn's "Military" Symphony, the adagietto from a suite of Raff's, op. 101, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody in D, was all very fine, the performance of the beautiful symphony, in particular, being remarkable for its delicacy and appreciation. It was, however, very quietly received, although duly applauded in that polite and indulgent way which is almost as bad as no applause at all. Mrs. Gower, however, gained what the orchestra lost, and created tremendous enthusiasm by her singing of the famous Queen of the Night's solo from the "Magic Flute" and "Una Voce" from the "Barber of Seville"—trite selections both, but well adapted to the singer's brilliant technical powers. Her voice proved to be well adapted to such efforts, being of great compass and power and fairly clear and flexible, but without any marked sympathetic quality or expression. On the whole, she proved to be somewhat of a disappointment to expectations that may have been raised too high by the reports of her successes in Paris.

The concert next Saturday night will be devoted to the following programme, with Mr. Arthur Foote as soloist: Overture (Egmont), Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69, Hiller; Kaisermarsch, Wagner; piano solo (a) prelude in C major, Bach; (b) Gavotte in B minor, Bach-Saint Saens; (c) Etude in D flat major, Liszt; symphony in D minor (Reformation) Mendelssohn, No. 5, op. 102.

The fourth of the Symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday, and the largest audience of the season, thus far, was attracted. The instrumental numbers in the programme were played in a most superior manner by the orchestra under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, and they consisted of Rietz's Concert Overture in A, op. 7; Haydn's Military Symphony; the adagietto, from a suite by Raff, op. 101; and the Hungarian Rhapsody in D, by Liszt. All these numbers were performed in the most perfect manner, especially so the Symphony, yet they did not awaken that amount of enthusiasm which they should. The audience was evidently, in a great measure, reserving its applause for Mrs. Gower (Lillian Norton), whose delightful voice has not been heard in concert in this city for a number of seasons. Since her absence she has improved in every respect, her voice being fuller and richer, more flexible and more brilliant. She gave as her numbers the solo of The Queen of Night, from "The Magic Flute," and "Una voce poco fa," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville," both with marvellous effect, and to the complete satisfaction of the audience, who applauded her again and again. The whole concert was a most interesting one, and made a very enjoyable evening's entertainment. The fifth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, with Mr. Arthur Foote as the soloist, the full programme being, Overture (Egmont), Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69, Hiller; Kaiser marsch, Wagner; piano solo (a) prelude in C major, Bach; (b) Gavotte in B minor, Bach-Saint Saens; (c) Etude in D flat major, Liszt; symphony in D minor (Reformation) Mendelssohn, No. 5, op. 102.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The chief interest of Saturday evening's symphony concert attached to the appearance, after several years of absence, of Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower, who has been hitherto known as Miss Lillian Norton, or by her stage pseudonym of Giglio Nordica. Many friends of the lady were in the audience, and she was not only warmly welcomed but twice recalled after each of her selections with every indication of much popular approval. Certainly Mrs. Gower has an instant claim upon the favor of an audience. Her presence and bearing are so fine, her face and expression so winning, that an entente cordiale is established even before she begins to sing. But the impression which follows and is derived from her singing, is not so simple a one, and partakes of disappointment at the discrepancy between the singer's natural powers and the results which she has accomplished with them. Whether, by the choice of a different department of art, she might have accomplished better things, it is not now easy to guess; but what she did on this occasion could not have satisfied any exacting taste. Mrs. Gower's voice is clear, resonant, even, and full of vitality; it has occasional hardness in the middle and lower registers, but this may not be an inherent quality, but only an expression of that frequent disposition of sopranos to give power to these tones, even at the expense of their true characteristics. Her execution is strangely unequal; she can give a series of staccato notes with precision and distinctness, and she strikes difficult intervals truly; but her descending scales and her gruppetti are blurred and indefinite. Her first number was the Queen of Night's stormy air from the "Magic Flute," which she sang with great spirit and determination, although somewhat roughly at times, and with undeniable justness and effect in the imperative arpeggios and repeated notes. Though cold, the delivery was declamatory and direct, and suggested that the singer's best success would probably be in broad and forcible music, wherein little finesse should be needed. Mrs. Gower's second selection—the Una voce poco fa, from the "Barber of Seville"—confirmed this idea. Accepting the fact that Rossini's air is nowadays lost in the bravura which has been heaped upon his floridity, this great air of Rosina always makes one absolute demand upon the artist,—that all its ornamentation shall seem to stream spontaneously from her lips, and shall never impede the flow of the sentiment, but really heighten its varied dramatic effect. The moment the air is sung,—on the stage or off of it,—like a solfeggio of Panzeron or Bordeni, it has no longer any reason for being. And as Mrs. Gower sang, it became just such an exercise. The words were beautifully spoken, the themes and variations performed; but the evanescent play of Rosina's fancy, flashing from the assertion of devoted gentleness and affection to warnings of a viper's swift returnings, and to playful threats of trick upon trick, was not there. The vocalization was decided and well meant, but marked by the faults we have mentioned already, and just falling short of that indescribable completeness and proportion which make up a finished style, while a New England girl's calm propositions took the place of the Spanish insiden's coquettish self-assertion. But we shall hope to hear Mrs. Gower again, and in music in which her hearty honesty of effort and her vocal style will come more nearly into unison, that we may supplement the exceptions which a critic has no right to suppress with the praise which he is ever glad to bestow.

The orchestral work was admirably performed throughout. The new arrangement of the players is most satisfactory, alike when an obbligato is to be heard from a single instrument, and when all the forces are united in a powerful ensemble. We cannot help thinking that the working-power and the malleability—so to speak—of the orchestra are thus really increased. The violins can play more intelligently with no double-basses thundering in their ears, while the brass no longer pours its volume straight into the face of the audience over the heads of the other players. Be this as it may, the orchestra was, on this occasion, in closest sympathy with the conductor. There was a great deal of very delicate piano playing; the long crescendos—especially in the overture—were developed with smooth and almost insensible gradations; the single themes were clearly voiced; the attacks were good, after the long pauses in the symphony, and the sudden variations of time in the "Rhapsody" were unhesitatingly met. The orchestral numbers were: Rietz's concert overture in A, beginning with the great chords of the brass instruments, which reappear again at the close; Haydn's "military" symphony, whose ever fresh and cheerful melodiousness evidently pleased the audience, although it did not stimulate them to loud applause,—which, indeed, it is not calculated to do; the dreamy adagietto from Raff's suite, opus 101, which has so much the sound of an aubade in its first phrasings of the oboe and the horn; and, finally, Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" in D, given for the first time, which is "everything by turns, and nothing long," but which, in spite of its vagaries and its rushing finale, can scarcely be called extravagant. Mr. Henschel led this with quick perception and with tempered fire, but he did not persuade us to think with him in his relaxation of time in the allegretto of the symphony.

Luther will be remembered in the make-up of the next programme, which will include Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony, and the choral Ein Feste Burg. Mr. Arthur Foote will be the soloist, and will play Hiller's pianoforte concerto in F minor, and smaller pieces by Bach, St. Saëns and Liszt. The orchestra will also play the "Egmont" overture and Wagner's "Emperor's March."

Musical.

THE FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—That the fourth of the only series of classical concerts now being given in Boston had an exceptional attraction to commend it at Music Hall on Saturday evening was suggested by the presence of a very exceptional audience in size and brilliancy. This attendance reminded one of some of the immense assemblages that last year and year before last attended the Boston Symphony concerts, when it was supereminently au fait to do so. The soloist at the last concert was Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower, popularly known as Miss Lillian Norton. It was undoubtedly owing to a patriotic desire to hear her that the audience so notably contrasted in size, with any previous symphony concert audience of the season. As for the instrumental portion of the programme, it should be placed on a retired list, to remain there for all eternity, so far as any probable popularity in it was suggested. The once always welcome military symphony, Haydn's in G, which in the dark ages of the Harvard musical concerts, was always scoffed at by a very consequential set of advanced thinkers about music, few, now-a-days, really care to hear performed. To speak disrespectfully of this symphony is remote from our intention. The work is at least entitled to that eccentric kind of veneration which a classic old age will invariably infuse; but prithee, in what honest language can one eulogize it? True, Haydn wrote in that beautiful simplicity yet strictness of form, the like of which modern musicians have learned to admire to a greater degree in Mozart's music. There is hardly a symphonic work in existence by the last named composer (and some of his symphonies have been destroyed), that one would not prefer to hear to the so called military symphony. Note also the absurdity of the misnomer inexcusable even for the time in which it was written. Its most attractive themes are simply genial, and in this respect one listens to the opening allegro only to be reminded of its puerile flippancy. In no part of the work is there the majestic treatment with which even old father Haydn might reasonably have been expected to endow it. In regard to the orchestration, any child in music could foretell at a third or fourth measure in advance just what combinations of wood, wind or brass might be expected from the dear old composer. The orchestral technique of the performance was highly commendable, yet it was made evident from the reading, that the conductor had no more real admiration for the antique quaintness pervading the work than had probably ninety-nine one hundredths of his admiring auditors. He had opened the concert with a well-considered, a thoroughly artistic interpretation of the Rietz concert overture in A major, and it had evidently exhausted his conceptive resources; though for precision, accuracy, unity of attack, and superb quality of wood and wind; also, for a remarkably good ensemble of stringed instruments, commend us the Boston Symphony orchestra. Another work on the programme was an "Adagietto" from Raff's Suite, opus 101. We will take it for granted that the piece itself is an "adagietto," though the conductor did not seem particularly desirous of illustrating the propriety of the term.

Let us now speak of the principal event of the concert, the singing by Mrs. Gower of the "Queen of the Night" song from Mozart's Flauto Magico and of "Una voce poco fa," by Rossini. Mrs. Gower created a number of very decided impressions by her performance. She showed an abundance of musical talent in one direction, and a very mediocre supply of it in another. The six or seven higher notes of her voice diatonically compassed, are extremely brilliant; at least one of these notes, her E flat in alt, is phenomenal; it has never been equalled here in its capacity for a broad, full forte, and as she uses it with its natural effect, it fairly thrills and startles one into an unbounded admiration of it. Every tone she sings, though liquid and beautiful in itself, is cold, uncalculating and unsympathetic in its inception; it is methodically thrown out, as it were, to fit its proper place; its rich material, so far as we could discover, is displayed without the slightest particle of innate musical feeling. We have been referring especially to the higher notes of her voice, which she presents with a method that is unqualifiedly superb; it is an unimpeachable method, and the fruit of it is in its all-absorbing effect. Regarded as a whole it was perhaps the most brilliant rendering of Mozart's "Queen of the Night" song that from a voice every individual tone of which may have ever been heard in this city, and this, too, not inappropriately be likened to the frigid ornaments of an iceberg. In the lower range of her vocalism, however, the tones are warmer, yet still not warm. This slight improvement in their emotional quality was somewhat noticeable when she sang "Una voce poco fa." It was far from being such a successful rendering of this aria as has often been heard from the lamented Adelaide Phillips, yet considering that in the present instance it emanated from a voice that is naturally a high soprano, it deserves to be chronicled as an immensely creditable performance. The execution, being mostly confined to the mezzo and lower, and hence less natural range of her voice, was of course less pliant; there was more tonal effort, and less reliability of attack; but the phrasing was artistic to a fault, and the conception was not without nobility, even though it was unimpressive of any warmth. After all, is not the criticism that Mrs. Gower sang coldly, entitled to a qualification? It was her first appearance since her return, and no one knows the pulsations of anxiety that may have thwarted her best efforts to sing con amore. Her stage-presence is very naive and charming, and her success with the audience was one of the most cordially enthusiastic that it were possible to record of any artiste.

The concluding performance of the concert was Liszt's Rhapsody in D, one of the most bombastic and highfalutine works of its class. It was admirably performed. Mr. Arthur Foote plays at the concert to-night, and if we are not greatly mistaken, it is his first appearance as pianist in one of the Boston symphony concerts.

Histrionic and Harmonic Happenings of the Hour.

Fourth Concert by the Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a perfect gem, view it as one may, and it is difficult to imagine any improvement in it. The music was of the sort that appeals to one's homelike feelings, not such as to compel a strained attention, but to which one easily gave his thought, and in peace and comfort possessed his soul. The melodic character of the compositions rendered, doubtless had much to do with this feeling, though that would hardly explain the feeling of bodily lightness and of ecstasy that accompanied homeward many of the audience. The chief attraction of the evening, to judge merely from the applause granted, lay in the appearing of Mrs. Frederic Allen Gower (Lillian Norton). Many reasons could be found for her great popularity, but to search far is unnecessary; the deepest reasons lie near at hand. Mrs. Gower's voice has much improved since her last appearance here; in fullness and richness, in brilliancy of tone and execution, in all that goes to make a great singer, her voice, always of great beauty, has bettered itself. Mrs. Gower appeared twice: in the former number, "Gli Angeli Inferni," the Queen of Night's solo, from Mozart's "Magic Flute," the flexibility and richness of her voice were finely displayed, the rich tones of the lower register coming out with especial beauty. The second number was "Una voce poco fa" from "The Barber of Seville." The brilliant floriture were rendered in a style that was absolutely magnetic and the audience, prejudiced in favor of the fair singer by her New England birth, and pleased, moreover, by her grace, was quite carried away. Mrs. Gower was recalled thrice. The orchestral numbers were quite as attractive. The overture (Concert, in A, op. 7, Rietz) was a charming bit of art, both as regards composition and performance, and was a fit prelude to the treat which followed. The Haydn Symphony in G, (military), the next succeeding orchestral number, did not receive the applause it deserved, and, we think, should not have,—a Milesianism that we shall proceed to explain. It seems to us that no greater tribute of respect and admiration is possible, than reverent silence. When one is most moved, one is most silent, (a remark not true of many shallow minds), and we think we could feel that the lack of applause on last Saturday evening was not at all of the cold and severely critical sort. The symphony is, applauded or not, a beautiful creation; to criticise as between the separate movements is hard; perhaps the menuetto and the finale (presto) most pleased us, with their airy, graceful delicacy. The Adagietto from Raff's suite op. 101, reminds one of Milton's "linked sweetness long drawn out;" the one fault with the composition lies in this,—that it's not long enough. It was, if anything, too sweet, the melody being absolutely cloying in its richness. But, then, an over-feast of this kind is only too unusual. The final number (Hungarian Rhapsody in D, Liszt) was a fitting end, its wild melody followed by strains of wilder harmony, making an attractive mingling. Mr. Arthur Foote will be the soloist at the next concert, when will be presented the following programme: Overture (Egmont), Beethoven; Concerto for piano-forte in F sharp minor, op. 69, Hiller; Kaiser-march, Wagner; Piano Solo—(a) Prelude in C major, (Well-tempered Clavichord), Bach; (b) Gavotte in B minor, Bach-Saint Saëns; (c) Etude in D flat major, Liszt; Symphony in D minor (Reformation), Mendelssohn; Luther's Choral, "Ein Feste Burg."

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Concert Overture in A.....Rietz
Aria, "Gli angeli d'inferno," from "Il Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
Adagietto from Suite in C.....Raff
Aria, "Una voce poco fa," from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt
Mrs. Frederick Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) was the singer.

The orchestra played exceptionally well throughout the concert. The delightful Haydn symphony—known as the "Military Symphony" from its bass-drum, cymbals and triangle—was played with the utmost grace of phrasing, and with an attention to delicate effects of light and shade which, while it gave every dainty detail in the score its true significance, never seemed merely finical; the true proportion between isolated effects and the general outlines of the whole was preserved in the most artistic manner. Never has a symphony been played here in which both conductor and orchestra were more surely in sympathy with the composer. Not less artist like was the performance of the lovely Raff Adagietto. Mrs. Gower made an instantaneous capture of her audience's favor. Not a little interest was felt beforehand in this lady's appearance, from the various, often conflicting, accounts which have come from across the water during the last year or two of her successes (under the nom de guerre of Giglio Nordica) in Italy and France; and this feeling of curiosity was by no means confined to the singer's personal friends, nor to those of her former teacher, Mr. John O'Neill. Her return to Boston really partook of the character of an event of general musical interest. As we have already hinted, the impression she produced upon the audience on Saturday evening was immediate and unusually strong; such enthusiasm as her singing created is not often seen here. Her voice is strong, of uncommon compass and of the very purest soprano quality. Like most "flute" voices, it is somewhat lacking in intrinsic emotional force, except in the lower register; the total absence of reediness from its tone makes it lack what the French call timbre. But its perfect purity, sweetness and flute-like character render it absolutely pleasant to the ear. Next to the beauty of her voice, Mrs. Gower's style of singing is eminently calculated to arouse enthusiasm. She is not free from faults; her execution of rapid passages is by no means unexceptionable; at times it even borders on the slovenly. Her staccato singing is really wonderful, but her singing of legato runs is by no means a masterpiece of technique. But this technical failing is offset by a brilliancy of manner which almost disarms criticism. She has unlearned all her American formality, and sings with an abandon, a vivacity of manner, which is evidently a second nature with her. She sings with absolute ease, and rides over long florid phrases with perfect security in her own powers. If now and then she makes a slip, one feels as if it were an accident which she neither foresaw nor feared. She does not appear to be thinking of technical matters, but of the musical impression

she wishes to produce. Her personal charm is immense, and she knows how to infuse this charm into her singing. Upon the whole, it may be said that the delightful impression she made is worth making, even at the expense of a few technical inaccuracies. Not that the latter are either to be forgotten or forgiven, but that Mrs. Gower's merits are so exceptional that it is well worth while to endure her faults if only to enjoy her excellences wholly and heartily.

The programme of the fifth concert, to be given next Saturday evening, is printed at length in the advertisement. The first concert in the course at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening.

The fourth program as follows:

Concert overture in A.....Rietz
Aria from "Il Flauto Magico".....Mozart
Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
Adagietto from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
Aria from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
Hungarian rhapsody in D.....Liszt

Mrs. Lillian Norton-Gower was the singer.

The instrumental numbers were played with general good effect, the symphony being especially well interpreted.

Mrs. Gower was not especially fortunate in her selections, her method being less adapted to the florid school of composition, yet she exhibited so much richness and fulness of tone, so artistic a method and so intelligent a conception that it went far to compensate for any slight defect noticeable in execution. The artist may well be congratulated upon her success in obtaining such positive demonstrations of pleasure from so critical an assemblage.

AUX ARTS a warning not to run unloving coquette, and makes loving disciples." For the eloquent defense of that long advocated, and which Gounod's maxims: "There Art is an expression, and you believe?" to produce any opera by Mackenzie himself is engaged of Sharon," and as he will at a work as a new English from relegated it to the spring velties next season at Drury new opera by Villiers Stan- and a new opera by Goring ba" was produced so late in reasonably expect a "run" t had a great and unex- en the orchestra, under the formed in Vienna a mass in which, previously unknown, ber 17.

ce last ative of

There

and beethoven

Hiller

Wagner

Bach

int-Saëns

Liszt

ndelssohn

a slight

n the in-

at. The brilliant

there was

and very st of the

he piano-

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
 Concert Overture in A.....Rietz
 Aria, "Gli angeli d'inferno," from "Il Flauto Magico".....Mozart
 Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
 Adagio from Suite in C.....Raff
 Aria, "Una voce poco fa," from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
 Hungarian Rhapsody in D.....Liszt
 Mrs. Frederick Gower (Miss Lillian Norton) was the singer.

The orchestra played exceptionally well throughout the concert. The delightful Haydn symphony—known as the "Military Symphony" from its bass-drum, cymbals and triangle—was played with the utmost grace of phrasing, and with an attention to delicate effects of light and shade which, while it gave every dainty detail in the score its true significance, never seemed merely finical; the true proportion between isolated effects and the general outlines of the whole was preserved in the most artistic manner. Never has a symphony been played here in which both conductor and orchestra were more surely in sympathy with the composer. Not less artist like was the performance of the lovely Raff Adagio. Mrs. Gower made an instantaneous capture of her audience's favor. Not a little interest was felt beforehand in this lady's appearance, from the various, often conflicting, accounts which have come from across the water during the last year or two of her successes (under the nom de guerre of Giglio Nordica) in Italy and France; and this feeling of curiosity was by no means confined to the singer's personal friends, nor to those of her former teacher, Mr. John O'Neill. Her return to Boston really partook of the character of an event of general interest. As we have already hinted, the impression she produced upon the audience on Saturday evening was immediate and unusual; such enthusiasm as her singing often seen here. Her voice is strong, common compass and of the very high quality. Like most "flute" voices, it lacks in intrinsic emotional force the lower register; the total absence from its tone makes it lack what the timbre. But its perfect purity, its flute-like character render it absolutely to the ear. Next to the beauty of her Gower's style of singing is eminent to arouse enthusiasm. She is not free her execution of rapid passages is unexceptionable; at times it even becomes slovenly. Her staccato singing is useful, but her singing of legato runs is a masterpiece of technique. But failing is offset by a brilliant manner which almost disarms criticism. She has unlearned all her American and sings with an abandon, a vivacity which is evidently a second nature. She sings with absolute ease, and rides over phrases with perfect security in her. If now and then she make a slip, one were an accident which she neither feared. She does not appear to be technical matters, but of the musical impression

she wishes to produce. Her personal charm is immense, and she knows how to infuse this charm into her singing. Upon the whole, it may be said that the delightful impression she made is worth making, even at the expense of a few technical inaccuracies. Not that the latter are either to be forgotten nor forgiven, but that Mrs. Gower's merits are so exceptional that it is well worth while to endure her faults if only to enjoy her excellences wholly and heartily.

The programme of the fifth concert, to be given next Saturday evening, is printed at length in the advertisement. The first concert in the course at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening.

The fourth program as follows:

Concert Overture in A.....Rietz
 Aria from "Il Flauto Magico".....Mozart
 Symphony in G (military).....Haydn
 Adagio from the Suite op. 101.....Raff
 Aria from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini
 Hungarian rhapsody in D.....Liszt

Mrs. Lillian Norton-Gower was the singer.

The instrumental numbers were played with general good effect, the symphony being especially well interpreted.

Mrs. Gower was not especially fortunate in her selections, her method being less adapted to the florid school of composition, yet she exhibited so much richness and fulness of tone; so artistic a method and so intelligent a conception that it went far to compensate for any slight defect noticeable in execution. The artist may well be congratulated upon her success in obtaining such positive demonstrations of pleasure from so critical an assemblage.

Boston Correspondence.

Boston, November 17.

THE fifth of the symphony concerts took place last Saturday evening, the programme being commemorative of Martin Luther's birth. The selections were as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
 Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69.....Hiller
 Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
 Piano solo—
 (a) Prelude in C major, "Well-tempered Clavichord".....Bach
 (b) Gavot in B minor.....Bach—Saint-Saëns
 (c) Etude in D flat major.....Liszt
 Symphony in D minor, "Reformation".....Mendelssohn
 Luther's Choral, "Ein Feste Burg."

The symphony was very well rendered as a whole, a slight weakness of the swelled notes of the wind instruments in the introduction being the only noticeable fault of any account. The choir-boys singing of the choral was poor. In the brilliant Kaisermarsch and the noble overture of "Egmont" there was nothing to be desired, both works being excellently and very effectively performed. Mr. Arthur Foote was the soloist of the evening, and gave a thoroughly correct rendering of the pianoforte works.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Egmont.) BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in F sharp minor. op 69. HILLER.
Allegro quasi una fantasia. Andante espressivo.
Finale. (Allegro con fuoco).—

KAISERMARSCH. WAGNER.

PIANO SOLO.

(a) PRELUDE in C major. (Well tempered Clavichord.) BACH.

(b) GAVOTTE in B minor. BACH-SAINT SAËNS.

(c) ETUDE in D flat major. LISZT.

SYMPHONY in D minor. (Reformation.) MENDELSSOHN.

No. 5, op. 107.

Andante; Allegro con fuoco.—Allegro vivace.—
Andante.—Andante con moto; Allegro vivace; Allegro maestoso.—

LUTHER'S CHORAL "EIN' FESTE BURG."

SOLOIST:

MR. ARTHUR FOOTE.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

•1483• NOVEMBER X. •1883•

Martinus Luther

Boston Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10TH, 1883.

IN commemoration of the 400th Anniversary of the Birth-day of the audience is most earnestly and respectfully requested to join in the singing of his choral

LUTHER

“EIN’ FESTE BURG”

the melody and an English translation of which are given on the opposite page.

“A STRONGHOLD SURE”

{ A strong - hold sure our God re-
In need His help our free - dom

{ mains, A shield and hope un - fail - - - ing.
gains, O'er all we fear pre - vail - - - ing

Our old ma - lig - nant foe Would fain work us woe; With craft and great might He doth a - gainst us fight; . . On earth is not one like . . him.

God's word shall still in strength abide,

Yet they no thanks shall merit;

For He is ever at our side

Both by His gifts and spirit.

And should they take our life,

Wealth, name, child, and wife,

Tho' these were all gone,

Yet will they nought have won,—

God's kingdom ours remaineth.

OF THE OLDEST KNOWN MANUSCRIPT OF 1530.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

at best, was too hackneyed to offer any temptation to a concert-giver, and Raff's overture on the same theme made no very favorable impression when it was heard last year. Upon the whole, given the material Mr. Henschel had to select from, his choice must be called intelligent and musicianly. The chorale itself might have been given in a more worthy shape, and although the audience partially availed itself of Mr. Henschel's invitation to join in the singing, it made a rather lame close to the concert. We should have preferred to hear the Wagner march last; this magnificent work, which introduces the first two lines of the chorale, is eminently fitted for a closing number. In the middle of a programme, it bursts forth a thought too loudly. The Mendelssohn symphony (written especially for performance at the Centenary Festival of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, which was to be celebrated throughout Germany on June 25, 1830), and the last movement of which is based upon "Ein feste Burg," was first given in Boston at one of the earlier Triennial Festivals of the Handel and Haydn Society. The impression it made then was none of the strongest, although the Scherzo was recognized as a pure gem, at once. Last Saturday evening we were quite agreeably disappointed in it; it had been in our

The fifth concert in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorative of Martin Luther's birth, was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before a large audience, and, with the exception of the choir boys' singing of the Reformer's famous hymn, which was very bad, was exceedingly well carried out. It opened with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," which was excellently performed, and the other orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" and Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony." The soloist of the concert was Mr. Arthur Foote, who played with orchestra Ferdinand Hiller's F-minor concerto and the following pianoforte solos: Prelude in C-major (Well-tempered Clavier), Bach; Gavotte in B-minor, Bach-Saint-Saens; and Liszt's Etude in D-flat major. Next Saturday evening Miss Hattie Louise Summs and Mr. M. Loeffler will be the soloists, with a programme as follows: Prelude, Bruch; Aria, Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, Op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for violin, Op. 35, B. Goddard; Songs with piano: "Kammarinskaia," Glinka.

FAC-SIMILE

OF THE OLDEST KNOWN MANUSCRIPT OF

Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, I in gute richte und richte schilt uns alle, und alle nicht, die uns hat beschützt
 Und wer die Welt viel tenfeln, und auch die geistliche
 Gerechtigkeit und so sehr, so soll uns das gelingen
 Das ist die feste Burg, mit dem heiligen Geist, der uns beschützt und uns von aller Sünde schützt, das ist
 Und wer die Welt viel tenfeln, und auch die geistliche
 Gerechtigkeit und so sehr, so soll uns das gelingen

THE CHORAL. "EIN FESTE BURG."

1530.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
 Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
 Concerto in F-sharp minor for pianoforte.....Hiller
 Kaiser-Marsch.....Wagner
 Pianoforte solos:
 a. Prelude in C.....Bach
 b. Gavotte in B minor.....Bach-Saint-Saens
 c. Study in D-flat.....Liszt
 Symphony No. 5, in D minor (Reformation).....Mendelssohn
 Chorale: "Ein feste Burg."

Mr. Arthur Foote was the pianist, and the closing chorale was sung by a choir of boys from the churches of the Advent and the Messiah.

The concert assumed something of a special character from its paying homage to the memory of Martin Luther, on the occasion of the four-hundredth anniversary of his birth. That a concert given on the very day of the anniversary could not well omit some reference to the great reformer whose name has been for centuries so intimately connected with the art of music was evident enough. Unfortunately, although there is no lack of music in which the great Lutheran chorale, "Ein feste Burg," plays a prominent part, and which would therefore be appropriate for performance on such an occasion, this music is, for the most part, of not the very highest character. Most of the compositions that have in any way been based upon "Ein feste Burg" have been "occasional" works, especially written for commemorative festivals, and the quality of such work is proverbial. By far the most important work founded upon this chorale, Bach's great cantata, had been already chosen for performance by the Handel and Haydn Society, and although Mr. Henschel at one time had the idea of giving it too, his abandonment of the idea was altogether wise. Nicolai's Festival overture, a second-rate composition at best, was too hackneyed to offer any temptation to a concert-giver, and Raff's overture on the same theme made no very favorable impression when it was heard last year. Upon the whole, given the material Mr. Henschel had to select from, his choice must be called intelligent and musicianly. The chorale itself might have been given in a more worthy shape, and although the audience partially availed itself of Mr. Henschel's invitation to join in the singing, it made a rather lame close to the concert. We should have preferred to hear the Wagner march last; this magnificent work, which introduces the first two lines of the chorale, is eminently fitted for a closing number. In the middle of a programme, it bursts forth a thought too loudly. The Mendelssohn symphony (written especially for performance at the Tercentenary Festival of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, which was to be celebrated throughout Germany on June 25, 1830), and the last movement of which is based upon "Ein feste Burg," was first given in Boston at one of the earlier Triennial Festivals of the Handel and Haydn Society. The impression it made then was none of the strongest, although the Scherzo was recognized as a pure gem, at once. Last Saturday evening we were quite agreeably disappointed in it; it had been in our memory as an almost wholly tiresome work, and we found it, if not inspiring or inspired in the highest sense of the word, at least interesting and enjoyable. The playing of the orchestra was in general excellent, and the performance of the "Egmont" overture especially fine. The playing was a thought coarser, if quite as spirited, in the Kaiser-Marsch; but we must again put in our humble protest against the hideous clashing of those wretched tin plates which still have the face to call themselves cymbals. In parts of the symphony, notably in the Andante, some of the wind instruments were badly out of tune. Mr. Arthur Foote went beyond the hopes of even his most hopeful friends in his playing of the Hiller concerto. As a pianist, Mr. Foote eminently belongs to the class of what have, with some fitness, been called intellectual players. His most prominent merits have been, and still are, the conscientiousness with which he studies a composition, and the firm grasp he shows of all its formal and emotional contents. He knows really how to make a composition his own; how to master all its problems. Added to this, he has abundant fire and nervous vigor. What he lacks is a certain incisive clearness of touch—which is a purely physical matter, and no more to be criticised than the quality of a singer's voice, and that peculiar something which is called native charm and grace. On the present occasion, however, while showing his fine intellectual conception and sure technical mastery in a more brilliant light than ever before, he showed at least an appreciation of that subtle, quasi-feminine element in the music which charms and fascinates. In that other, more virile, element, which excites and inspires, he was always easily at home. His playing of the Liszt study showed especially how he is learning the power of that influence which the sun exerted in the fable, in its rivalry with the storm. Mr. Foote's reception by the audience was the most enthusiastic.

The next programme is:

Prelude (Loreley).....Bruch
 Aria (My heart ever faithful).....Bach
 Symphony in D No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
 Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35.....B. Goddard
 (First time.)

Songs with Piano:
 Kamarinskaja (Fantasy on two Russian National Songs).....Glinka

Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth concert in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commemorative of Martin Luther's birth, was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before a large audience, and, with the exception of the choir boys' singing of the Reformer's famous hymn, which was very bad, was exceedingly well carried out. It opened with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," which was excellently performed, and the other orchestral numbers were Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" and Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony." The soloist of the concert was Mr. Arthur Foote, who played with orchestra Ferdinand Hiller's F-minor concerto and the following pianoforte solos: Prelude in C-major (Well-tempered Clavichord), Bach; Gavotte in B-minor, Bach-Saint-Saens; and Liszt's Etude in D-flat major. Next Saturday evening Miss Hattie Louise Simms and Mr. M. Loeffler will be the soloists, with a programme as follows: Prelude, Bruch; Aria, Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, Op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for violin, Op. 35, B. Goddard; Songs with piano; "Kamarinskaja," Glinka.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We can see no particular reason for so modifying the programme of a symphony concert as to make it an item in the commemoration of Martin Luther's birthday. There is not that intimate relation between Luther and music—or between Luther and Boston, for the matter of that—to fully justify it. Luther's influence upon the world was, first and last, a religious one, and it is only with a choral or a hymn that any thought of him as a poet or a musician can be connected. The discourse, the essay, and the concert of sacred music, offer fitting opportunity for remembering him; and they are sufficient. However, this is chiefly a matter of taste, and we might perhaps have thought little or nothing of it had the programme been improved by its modification. But it was certainly weakened by two out of three special selections. The final number was the choral, "Ein feste Burg," for the presenting of which some extra preparation had been made. A card-board sheet, accompanying each programme, bore a head of Luther, a copy of an early MS. of the choral, the music with Mr. Dwight's translation, and an earnest invitation to the audience to join in singing it; the boy choirs of the Advent, the Messiah, and some other churches, were united on the platform to lead off. When the time came a good many people stood up,—although it would probably have puzzled them to tell why,—but almost nobody sang, so that, instead of a broad, massive, and possibly thrilling effect, there was only the thin sound of the boy-voices contending against the full volume of the orchestra. Again, Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," which had been put at the end of the first part, is not a dignified nor a valuable composition. It is interesting in a way, as showing how its author could take a couple of simple-minded themes and beguile them into all sorts of extraordinary forms of combination. Not unpleasing or unexhilarating to the ear, it constantly exasperates the listener, who can never feel quite sure whether it is a fantasy on the choral, or upon an idea borrowed from some "Lohengrin"-like Brantzug; but he is still very sure that in spite of its skill and force, there is far more sound than sense in it. The symphony was Mendelssohn's "Reformation," in D minor, wherein also the choral figures largely. As we have said on other occasions, this is not the most interesting symphony in the world; but it sounded unusually well after the "Kaisermarsch," its reverent and consistent treatment of the great theme being raised by contrast with the noisy vagaries of Wagner's handling.

But let us hasten to say that we must not be understood as qualifying the performance of the programme in thus questioning its material. On the contrary, the orchestral work was remarkably well done. Mr. Henschel took great pains all the way through, and was followed sympathetically by the orchestra. The opening movement of the symphony was beautifully balanced, the few imperative phrases of the brass instruments contrasting well with the softness of the strings, but not crushing them into insignificance. The rapid counterpoint of the double-basses was exceedingly clear, and the present position of the players caused it to bear its just relation to the rest of the harmony. The "Kaisermarsch" offered many chances for overdoing, but they were ignored, and, although there was large volume, there was nothing harsh or coarse. The concert began with the overture to "Egmont," which was the number least well performed. The short responses of the wooden wind in the earlier part were indeed wooden; they were as dry and formless, as if the players were reading them at first sight; the strings, on the other hand, forced their tone somewhat in the finale, and it was cutting in spite of its fullness.

The soloist was Mr. Arthur Foote, whose principal selection was Hiller's F sharp minor concerto, a work which begins with a rather uninteresting allegro quasi una fantasia, in which fantasy predominates, if vagueness be significant of anything like fancy; follows on with an andante, which is reflective rather than deep, and ends with an allegro con fuoco that lies midway between the grotesque and the playful. Mr. Foote played the concerto with calm accuracy and discreet gravity, nor did he allow the finale to transcend the limits of a self-respecting allegro con brio. He is so good a musician, his taste is so nice, and his readings so scholarly, that it is much to be regretted that he is not less academic. His touch is often as infelicitous as his execution is fine, and does justice neither to himself nor to the instrument he uses. He was at his best in the andante, whose full opening chords were sweetly and proportionately struck. Later in the evening he played a Bach prelude with quiet distinctness; the favorite B minor gavotte of Bach rather dryly, but with evenness in those left-hand octaves which, in spite of their apparent simplicity, give so much trouble to the majority of players; and that long D flat major study of Liszt, in which the melody and accompaniment are constantly divided between the hands,—this last with ease and finish. The orchestral accompaniment to the concerto is little more than a colored background; but this color was delicately supplied, and the support of the horns and wooden wind in the andante was particularly grateful.

At the next concert Miss Simms will sing, Mr. Loeffler will play a concerto for violin by Goddard, and the orchestra will play Beethoven's second symphony, the prelude to Bruch's "Loreley" and "Kamarinskaja" (a fantasy on two Russian songs), by Glinka.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Music Appropriate to the Commemoration of Luther—Mr. Foote's Appearance as the Piano Soloist.

Mr. Henschel presented the following programme at the fifth symphony concert Saturday evening:

Overture, Egmont..... Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69..... Hiller

Allegro quasi una fantasia. Andante espressivo.
Finale. (Allegro con fuoco).

Kaisermarsch..... Wagner
Piano Solo.

(a) Prelude in C major. (Well tempered Clavichord)..... Bach
(b) Gavotte in B minor..... Bach-Saint Saens
(c) Etude in D flat major..... Liszt
Symphony in D minor. (Reformation)..... Mendelssohn
No. 5, op. 107.

Andante; Allegro con fuoco—Allegro vivace.
Andante; Andante con moto; Allegro vivace;
Allegro maestoso.

Luther's Choral "Ein Feste Burg."

The orchestral numbers were in general rendered finely, particularly the first and second movements of the Reformation symphony, and the Kaisermarsch. At times there was in other portions of the concert a rasping and grating of the strings that was far from pleasant. The overture to Egmont is very popular with patrons of symphony concerts, and was received last evening most heartily. It was played with great spirit and impetuosity, and though the general effect was stirring, and calculated to rouse enthusiasm, some of the finer effects were almost wholly slid. This was especially the case towards the end, where the excitement of leader and players seemed to mount to the highest pitch, and perfect accuracy was sacrificed to the spirit of the moment. We believe it to be the generally accepted theory that the best effect is obtained from a large body of strings by insisting that all players in the same part shall bow alike. The most finely cultivated ears easily detect the difference in tone between the upward and downward strokes of the bow. Perfect unison of tone and expression cannot, therefore, be attained if half the players bow one way and the other half the other. In general, the violinists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are very accurate in this respect, but sometimes, and they were numerous last night, the bows go every which way. It was formerly a frequent cause for comment that in the 'cell there were four distinct styles of bowing. The lack of unity appears almost wholly in rapid passages, and should not be a difficult fault to correct.

In contrast to the masterpieces on the programme, Mr. Arthur Foote played the Hiller concerto in a generally inoffensive manner. This is Mr. Foote's first appearance at the Symphony orchestra, and if he had wished to impress Boston with his ability as a musician and virtuoso, he might easily have chosen a better and nobler work to interpret. Each movement is full of catchy melodies, and the whole work is pretty, but light and trivial. The finale might well be substituted for a gypsy dance in a comic opera. The rendition by the soloist was varied enough as regards dynamic shading, although there was every now and then a radical disagreement between his interpretation and that of the orchestra, but there was no character, no individuality shown in the treatment of the piano. Mr. Foote's technique is good, and he was very well received by the audience, winning the customary recall. In his second appearance he committed the unpardonable blunder of sentimentalizing over Bach. The stern old master would never have recognized his prelude as it was given last night. The writer of the "well-tempered Clavichord" knew little of the lights and shades produced on the modern piano, and in transferring his works to this instrument care should be taken not to surround them with the atmosphere of romance and sentimentalism. The charm of Bach's compositions for the clavichord lies not in their catchy airs, not in their soothing effect, nor in their merit as pastimes, but in their devotion to form and uncompromising adherence to what the master believed to be truest and purest in his art. In this spirit they should be interpreted, not in the weak style suggestive of a lovesick minstrel sighing to a do-nothing mistress whose only aim in life is to be amused. No composer ever touched more deeply into human emotions than John Sebastian Bach, and none has surpassed him in the comprehension of all emotions, but he never dreamed of melting people with inaudible pianissimos, or interesting them with figures played so extremely legato as to sound mixed and characterless. Mr. Foote should either cultivate his appreciation of Bach or confine himself to the insipid compositions for the drawing-room.

A most pleasing feature of the concert was the singing of "Ein Feste Burg," Luther's grand old choral, at the close of the symphony. A large choir of boys sang the melody with the accompaniment of the full orchestra, and the entire audience rose and joined in the song.

At the next concert the following programme will be given:

Prelude (Loreley)..... Bruch
Aria (My Heart Ever Faithful)..... Bach
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36..... Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Larghetto—Scherzo (Allegro)—Allegro molto.

Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 38.... B. Goddard
(First time.)

Allegretto moderato; Retitativo; Adagio—Cantata—Allegro molto.

Songs with piano.

Kamarinskaja (Fantasy on two Russian national songs)..... Glinka
Soloists: Miss Hattie Louise Simms, Mr. M. Loeffler.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

Without dwelling too significantly upon the plaintive language concerning the saddest words of tongue or pen, we would state that the fifth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening might have been made one of the most notable occasions of the kind on local record. The sincerity of the attempt, however, was more conspicuous than its accomplishment. The programme was admirable in point of suggestiveness, the orchestra appeared at their best, and the conductor himself was in his most musical mood. Yet, having been worked up to a high pitch of expectancy regarding an adequate observance of Luther's birthday, it was gangrenating in the extreme that the concert should have ended with one of the silliest and most puerile vocal performances of "Ein Feste Burg" that has ever been heard in this city. The better portion of this remarkable finale to an otherwise exceptionally good concert was contributed by a small and inexpensive choir of boys. Considerable expense, however, had been lavished on the programmes, which included a very striking likeness of Martin Luther, a fac-simile of the oldest known manuscript of "Ein Feste Burg," and one or two very harmless suggestions to the audience, the fulfilment of which was significantly expressed by its difficulty. The wood engraving of Luther on the programmes was almost sufficient to render them of perennial importance. Verily we cannot believe that the great apostle of religious reform was such a lascivious-looking object to behold as this programme-likeness of him would suggest; or else, placing full reliance upon the engraver's fidelity to the historical portrait of him, we should be compelled to believe that the reported character of "Luther's Table Talk" has not been commensurately placed on record by his maligners. The concert opened with a very expressive and effective rendering of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," the violins, violas, cellos and basses all doing far more than the wood and wind department in the tone-coloring of the performance. The soloist of the concert was Mr. Arthur Foote, who played with orchestra Ferdinand Hiller's F-minor concerto and the following group of piano-forte soli: Prelude in C-major (Well tempered Clavichord), Bach; Gavotte in B-minor, Bach—Saint-Saens; and Liszt's Etude in D-flat major. Mr. Foote's playing merits a very creditable recognition. It was not one of those interpretations that blaze up and consume art rules, composer's intent, tradition, precedent, and, last, too often the discriminating capabilities of an audience. The music of the concerto, with its simple desire to focus all attention of the public on skillful music, was presented by Mr. Foote in a very refined and masterly manner. True our praise must confine itself to the artistic excellence of the interpretation; but though the tone was often weak, and lacking the vitality that was so much to be desired, the runs were very clearly made, the phrasing as perfect as could have been desired, and there was every indication that one of the most intelligent studies of the work imaginable had been made. Mr. Foote could hardly have wished to have heard the accompaniments to the concerto given with more unerring accuracy, or a more unanimous wish to bring out its full significance. The finale, however, an allegro con fuoco, was performed in a very moderate and ineffective tempo: and here it must be confessed Mr.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We can see no particular reason for so modifying the programme of a symphony concert as to make it an item in the commemoration of Martin Luther's birthday. There is not that intimate relation between Luther and music—or between Luther and Boston, for the matter of that—to fully justify it. Luther's influence upon the world was, first and last, a religious one, and it is only with a choral or a hymn that any thought of him as a poet or a musician can be connected. The discourse, the essay, and the concert of sacred music, offer fitting opportunity for remembering him; and they are sufficient. However, this is chiefly a matter of taste, and we might perhaps have thought little or nothing of it had the programme been improved by its modification. But it was certainly weakened by two out of three special selections. The final number was the choral, "Ein feste Burg," for the presenting of which some extra preparation had been made. A card-board sheet, accompanying each programme, bore a head of Luther, a copy of an early MS. of the choral, the music with Mr. Dwight's translation, and an earnest invitation to the audience to join in singing it; the boy choirs of the Advent, the Messiah, and some other churches, were united on the platform to lead off. When the time came a good many people stood up,—although it would probably have puzzled them to tell why,—but almost nobody sang, so that, instead of a broad, massive, and possibly thrilling effect, there was only the thin sound of the boy-voices contending against the full volume of the orchestra. Again, Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," which had been put at the end of the first part, is not a dignified nor a valuable composition. It is interesting in a way, as showing how its author could take a couple of simple-minded themes and bejuggle them into all sorts of extraordinary forms of combination. Not unpleasing or unexhilarating to the ear, it constantly exasperates the listener, who can never feel quite sure whether it is a fantasy on the choral, or upon an idea borrowed from some "Lohengrin"-like Brantzug; but he is still very sure that in spite of its skill and force, there is far more sound than sense in it. The symphony was Mendelssohn's "Reformation," in D minor, wherein also the choral figures largely. As we have said on other occasions, this is not the most interesting symphony in the world; but it sounded unusually well after the "Kaisermarsch," its reverent and consistent treatment of the great theme being raised by contrast with the noisy vagaries of Wagner's handling.

But let us hasten to say that we must not be understood as qualifying the performance of the programme in thus questioning its material. On the contrary, the orchestral work was remarkably well done. Mr. Henschel took great pains all the way through, and was followed sympathetically by the orchestra. The opening movement of the symphony was beautifully balanced, the few imperative phrases of the brass instruments contrasting well with the softness of the strings, but not crushing them into insignificance. The rapid counterpoint of the double-basses was exceedingly clear, and the present position of the players caused it to bear its just relation to the rest of the harmony. The "Kaisermarsch" offered many chances for overdoing, but they were ignored, and, although there was large volume, there was nothing harsh or coarse. The concert began with the overture to "Egmont," which was the number least well performed. The short responses of the wooden wind in the earlier part were indeed wooden; they were as dry and formless, as if the players were reading them at first sight; the strings, on the other hand, forced their tone somewhat in the finale, and it was cutting in spite of its fullness.

The soloist was Mr. Arthur Foote, whose principal selection was Hiller's F sharp minor concerto, a work which begins with a rather uninteresting allegro quasi una fantasia, in which fantasy predominates, if vagueness be significant of anything like fancy; follows on with an andante, which is reflective rather than deep, and ends with an allegro con fuoco that lies midway between the grotesque and the playful. Mr. Foote played the concerto with calm accuracy and discreet gravity, nor did he allow the finale to transcend the limits of a self-respecting allegro con brio. He is so good a musician, his taste is so nice, and his readings so scholarly, that it is much to be regretted that he is not less academic. His touch is often as infelicitous as his execution is fine, and does justice neither to himself nor to the instrument he uses. He was at his best in the andante, whose full opening chords were sweetly and proportionately struck. Later in the evening he played a Bach prelude with quiet distinctness; the favorite B minor gavotte of Bach rather dryly, but with evenness in those left-hand octaves which, in spite of their apparent simplicity, give so much trouble to the majority of players; and that long D flat major study of Liszt, in which the melody and accompaniment are constantly divided between the hands,—this last with ease and finish. The orchestral accompaniment to the concerto is little more than a colored background; but this color was delicately supplied, and the support of the horns and wooden wind in the andante was particularly grateful.

At the next concert Miss Simms will sing, Mr. Loeffler will play a concerto for violin by Goddard, and the orchestra will play Beethoven's second symphony, the prelude to Bruch's "Loreley" and "Kamarinskaja" (a fantasy on two Russian songs), by Glinka.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Music Appropriate to the Commemoration of Luther—Mr. Foote's Appearance as the Piano Soloist.

Mr. Henschel presented the following programme at the fifth symphony concert Saturday evening:

Overture, Egmont..... Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69..... Hiller

Allegro quasi una fantasia. Andante espressivo.
Finale. (Allegro con fuoco).

Kaisermarsch..... Wagner
Piano Solo.

(a) Prelude in C major. (Well tempered Clavichord.)..... Bach

(b) Gavotte in B minor..... Bach-Saint Saens

(c) Etude in D flat major..... Liszt

Symphony in D minor. (Reformation)... Mendelssohn
No. 5, op. 107.

Andante; Allegro con fuoco—Allegro vivace.
Andante; Andante con moto; Allegro vivace;
Allegro maestoso.

Luther's Choral "Ein feste Burg."

The orchestral numbers were in general rendered finely, particularly the first and second movements of the Reformation symphony, and the Kaisermarsch. At times there was in other portions of the concert a rasping and grating of the strings that was far from pleasant. The overture to Egmont is very popular with patrons of symphony concerts, and was received last evening most heartily. It was played with great spirit and impetuosity, and though the general effect was stirring, and calculated to rouse enthusiasm, some of the finer effects were almost wholly slided. This was especially the case towards the end, where the excitement of leader and players seemed to mount to the highest pitch, and perfect accuracy was sacrificed to the spirit of the moment. We believe it to be the generally accepted theory that the best effect is obtained from a large body of strings by insisting that all players in the same part shall bow alike. The most finely cultivated ears easily detect the difference in tone between the upward and downward strokes of the bow. Perfect unison of tone and expression cannot, therefore, be attained if half the players bow one way and the other half the other. In general, the violinists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are very accurate in this respect, but sometimes, and they were numerous last night, the bows go every which way. It was formerly a frequent cause for comment that in the 'celli there were four distinct styles of bowing. The lack of unity appears almost wholly in rapid passages, and should not be a difficult fault to correct.

In contrast to the masterpieces on the programme, Mr. Arthur Foote played the Hiller concerto in a generally inoffensive manner. This is Mr. Foote's first appearance at the Symphony orchestra, and if he had wished to impress Boston with his ability as a musician and virtuoso, he might easily have chosen a better and nobler work to interpret. Each movement is full of catchy melodies, and the whole work is pretty, but light and trivial. The finale might well be substituted for a gypsy dance in a comic opera. The rendition by the soloist was varied enough as regards dynamic shading, although there was every now and then a radical disagreement between his interpretation and that of the orchestra, but there was no character, no individuality shown in the treatment of the piano. Mr. Foote's technique is good, and he was very well received by the audience, winning the customary recall. In his second appearance he committed the unpardonable blunder of sentimentalizing over Bach. The stern old master would never have recognized his prelude as it was given last night. The writer of the "well-tempered Clavichord" knew little of the lights and shades produced on the modern piano, and in transferring his works to this instrument care should be taken not to surround them with the atmosphere of romance and sentimentalism. The charm of Bach's compositions for the clavichord lies not in their catchy airs, not in their soothing effect, nor in their merit as pastimes, but in their devotion to form and uncompromising adherence to what the master believed to be truest and purest in his art. In this spirit they should be interpreted, not in the weak style suggestive of a lovesick minstrel sighing to a do-nothing mistress whose only aim in life is to be amused. No composer ever touched more deeply into human emotions than John Sebastian Bach, and none has surpassed him in the comprehension of all emotions, but he never dreamed of melting people with inaudible pianissimos, or interesting them with figures played so extremely legato as to sound mixed and characterless. Mr. Foote should either cultivate his appreciation of Bach or confine himself to the insipid compositions for the drawing-room.

A most pleasing feature of the concert was the singing of "Ein feste Burg," Luther's grand old choral, at the close of the symphony. A large choir of boys sang the melody with the accompaniment of the full orchestra, and the entire audience rose and joined in the song.

At the next concert the following programme will be given:

Prelude (Loreley)..... Bruch
Aria (My Heart Ever Faithful)..... Bach
Symphony in D. No. 2, op. 36..... Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Larghetto—Scherzo (Allegro)—Allegro molto.

Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35.... B. Goddard
(First time.)

Allegretto moderato; Retitativo; Adagio—Canzonetta—Allegro molto.

Songs with piano.

Kamarinskaja (Fantasy on two Russian national songs)..... Glinka
Soloists: Miss Hattie Louise Simms, Mr. M. Loeffler.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

Without dwelling too significantly upon the plaintive language concerning the saddest words of tongue or pen, we would state that the fifth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening might have been made one of the most notable occasions of the kind on local record. The sincerity of the attempt, however, was more conspicuous than its accomplishment. The programme was admirable in point of suggestiveness, the orchestra appeared at their best, and the conductor himself was in his most musical mood. Yet, having been worked up to a high pitch of expectancy regarding an adequate observance of Luther's birthday, it was gangrenating in the extreme that the concert should have ended with one of the silliest and most puerile vocal performances of "Ein feste Burg" that has ever been heard in this city. The better portion of this remarkable finale to an otherwise exceptionally good concert was contributed by a small and inexpensive choir of boys. Considerable expense, however, had been lavished on the programmes, which included a very striking likeness of Martin Luther, a fac-simile of the oldest known manuscript of "Ein feste Burg," and one or two very harmless suggestions to the audience, the fulfilment of which was significantly expressed by its difficulty. The wood engraving of Luther on the programmes was almost sufficient to render them of perennial importance. Verily we cannot believe that the great apostle of religious reform was such a lascivious-looking object to behold as this programme-likeness of him would suggest; or else, placing full reliance upon the engraver's fidelity to the historical portrait of him, we should be compelled to believe that the reported character of "Luther's Table Talk" has not been commensurately placed on record by his maligners. The concert opened with a very expressive and effective rendering of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," the violins, violas, cellos and basses all doing far more than the wood and wind department in the tone-coloring of the performance. The soloist of the concert was Mr. Arthur Foote, who played with orchestra Ferdinand Hiller's F-minor concerto and the following group of piano-forte soli: Prelude in C-major (Well tempered Clavichord), Bach; Gavotte in B-minor, Bach—Saint-Saens; and Liszt's Etude in D-flat major. Mr. Foote's playing merits a very creditable recognition. It was not one of those interpretations that blaze up and consume art rules, composer's intent, tradition, precedent, and, last, too often the discriminating capabilities of an audience. The music of the concerto, with its simple desire to focus all attention of the public on skillful music, was presented by Mr. Foote in a very refined and masterly manner. True our praise must confine itself to the artistic excellence of the interpretation; but though the tone was often weak, and lacking the vitality that was so much to be desired, the runs were very clearly made, the phrasing as perfect as could have been desired, and there was every indication that one of the most intelligent studies of the work imaginable had been made. Mr. Foote could hardly have wished to have heard the accompaniments to the concerto given with more unerring accuracy, or a more unanimous wish to bring out its full significance. The finale, however, an allegro con fuoco, was performed in a very moderate and ineffective tempo: and here it must be confessed Mr.

90

Foot's performance was a very mediocre response to the brilliancy and fire that were required. His solo playing of the Bach and Liszt selections was admirable, though the Bach gavotte was not given out with any adequate freedom and elasticity of style. Mr. Foote was well received and deservedly applauded for his very creditable accomplishment of a most exacting task.

Why and wherefore Wagner's Kaiser Marsch was intruded upon the programme we cannot imagine. It contains nothing more commendable than a stupid travesty upon Luther's Choral sandwiched in between some very insipid specimens of Wagnerian counterpoint, which invariably violates all rule. Its diabolical yells of orchestration were enough to drive one frantic, and it may not inappropriately be characterised as the devil's own compliment to the most famous of Luther's hymns. The concert concluded with a fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony." Next Saturday evening Miss Hattie Louise Simms and Mr. M. Loefler will be the soloists, with a programme as follows: Prelude, Bruch; Aria, Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2 Op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for violin, Op. 35, B. Goddard; Songs with piano; "Kamarinskaja," Glinka.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was largely a commemorative one, and was a fitting tribute to the memory of Martin Luther. The chief piece of the evening was the "Reformation Symphony" by Mendelssohn. Unfortunately this work is weakest in the very movement which has for its subject the great hymn of Luther (which, by the way, was probably not composed by Luther at all), and does not compare with the lofty treatment of the same theme in Raff's overture, "Ein Feste Burg." We believe it would have been judicious to have begun the concert with this overture—originally composed as the introduction to a drama dealing with events of the thirty years war—spite of the fact that this would have repeated the theme several times during the evening, as it appeared not only in the Symphony, but in Wagner's Kaiser Marsch, and was sung at the close of the concert by a choir of boys, assisted by such of the audience as accepted the invitation to join in. In fact the concert was largely made up of "Ein Feste Burg," and Raff's overture would only have added one more and a most interesting arrangement. The difference in treatment and the interest attaching to the comparison of the two composers at the same task would have prevented monotony. The overture was, however, the ever fresh and noble "Egmont," by Beethoven, performed in a broad and effective manner. The Symphony also suffered no detriment at the hands of the orchestra, save that the swelled notes of the wind instruments in the introduction were badly done. The Wagner selection was perfectly rendered, its lofty treatment of themes, and its broad rhythm being well brought out.

Mr. Arthur Foote was the pianist of the evening, and although there was some trace of nervousness in the execution of the Hiller concerto, and a rather dry rendering of the Liszt etude, there was an intellectual grasp in his playing which calls for praise. The last movement in the concerto was noticeable for good shading and refined expression, and the Bach and St. Saëns numbers were altogether excellent. A word must be said about the souvenir cards which were in excellent taste and form a pleasing memento of the evening.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The fifth of the present season's programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, George Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Arthur Foote, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in F sharp minor, op. 69, Hiller
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
Piano solo:
(a) Prelude in C major, "Well-tempered Clavier".....Bach
(b) Gavotte in B minor.....Bach-Saint-Saëns
(c) Etude in D flat major.....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, "Reformation".....Mendelssohn
Luther's choral, "Ein' Feste Burg."

The symphony and the Luther choral were the numbers chosen as a homage to Luther, in commemoration of the 400th anniversary of his birth, and the grand old choral was sung by the united choirs of the Church of the Advent, Church of the Messiah, Church of Our Saviour, Longwood; St. Stephen's Church, Lynn, and boy choir from Chelsea, many of the audience joining. These were the leading events of the programme, and in their presentation the musical forces employed were used with fine effect, the several movements being given an admirable reading, and the choral being sung with all the grandeur called for by its measures. Mr. Foote's reception proved his personal popularity with the audience, but his artistic success was not altogether satisfactory. In the concerto his playing gave the constant impression that every measure had been carefully studied and considered, so that, while an absolutely correct presentation of the pianoforte score was given, there was little enjoyment to the listener. The player's methodical characteristics were similarly shown in the solo numbers, which were the efforts of a painstaking, conscientious student, rather than such an interpretation as would be given by an artist inspired by the composition. The brilliant but noisy "Kaisermarsch" and the "Egmont" overture were well presented, and the audience was nearly as large as that of the preceding week. A souvenir programme, printed upon tinted Bristol board was distributed to the audience. The title page had a cabinet size lithographic reproduction of a portrait of Martin Luther, with a fac-simile signature, and the last page of the cover had a fac-simile of the oldest known manuscript of the choral "Ein' feste Burg," dated 1530. On the inside page the music of Luther's choral was printed, with the words by John S. Dwight.

Musical.

THE FIFTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—It was a very appropriate tribute to celebrate the four hundredth birthday of Martin Luther at the fifth symphony concert in Music Hall last Saturday evening. Students of history who have read in German the Catholic version of the great reformer's "Table Talk" could best appreciate the fidelity to his character of the wood-engraving as stamped upon the symphony concert programme. It is sincerely to be hoped that the present circulation of such a likeness was not out of spite to one of the most conspicuous reformers of the age.

In nearly every respect the programme was worthy of being listened to by a crowded house; but there were many vacant seats. It is high time that the good people of Boston should revive their interest in these Boston symphony concerts; also that the Gazette, the Advertiser, and the HOME JOURNAL should in every possible way attempt to avert the inevitable destiny of a waning enterprise. Mr. Higginson's return from Europe is greatly to be desired. His former presence was magnetic in its influence upon the patronage of his enterprise. Is it not time for a symphonic novelty of some kind? Naught but novelty can in any adequate degree attract a crowd to symphony concerts. To return to the programme, it was so well chosen that it affords us great pleasure to reproduce it. It was as follows:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto in F-sharp minor for pianoforte.....Hiller
Kaiser-Marsch.....Wagner
Pianoforte solos:

a. Prelude in C.....Bach
b. Gavotte in B minor.....Bach-Saint-Saëns
c. Study in D flat.....Liszt
Symphony No. 5, in D minor (Reformation) Mendelssohn

Chorale: "Ein' feste Burg".....

Mr. Arthur Foote was the soloist, and for the singing of "Ein' Feste Burg" at the close of the concert, there was a boy choir. No artist or musician in the audience could have listened to Mr. Foote's performance of the concerto, without respecting him for his interpretation of the work. We intend no disrespect to the interpreter on this occasion in referring to him as one of the most worthy representatives of a modern Athens school of pianoforte playing. Such a school as in the second generation of its existence Mr. Foote represents is to our mind one of the most fallacious and empirical pianoforte schools that was ever invented. We simply refer to its system of technique, so-called, though we cheerfully acknowledge the excellence of almost any other element in connection with it. A tree is known by its fruits; a school by its pupils. In recent years we may have been thought ugly in our treatment of this modern Athens school, and there are any number of mischief-makers on the one hand and thin-skinned individuals on the other who would now misinterpret as sarcastic the only compliment we can honestly pay it. The fact is we are simply and unmaliciously sincere. We cheerfully acknowledge, therefore, that the founder of this school with but two other pianists that we know of in this city, is well-nigh incomparably excellent in his ability to read some of the most difficult of classic and modern pianoforte music at first sight; and that what he has done for Boston musically, has been done in the artistic spirit to a degree that entitles him to an exceptionally honorable treatment in our local musical history. Then again, he and his pupils have well-merited records as gentlemen of culture, and fairness in the treatment of others, that might well be emulated by about a half a dozen would-be rivals; rivals who will be just niggardly and contemptible enough to make use of any honest criticism against him as an advertisement for themselves. We regret this; but as we are not responsible for it, as we are very remote from being in the position of either defending plaintiffs or of upbraiding criminals, we may yet proceed with the indictment. The indictment is based on the following code of principles: (1) that any system of pianoforte technique is unsound, unartistic, impure and execrable, that tends to weaken rather than to strengthen the fingers of the hand that are most naturally weak; (2) that is more dependent upon mannerism for its popular success than upon any legitimately artistic effects; and (3) that produces a so-called technique that is not only rigid in its outlook, but that is suggestively corpse-like in its effect upon the keyboard. The three counts in the indictments of this school we believe to be the only ones that are susceptible of proof, and last Saturday evening it seemed to us as though the pianist at the Boston Symphony concert was being made the victim of a self convicting evidence as to the soundness of these counts. Very many notes struck by him with the third and fourth fingers of either the right or left hand were plainly to be distinguished in the tone that was produced. He illustrated, and no doubt with an alluring effect upon nine-tenths of his audience, some of the most stylish mannerisms of the school to which he belongs; and last, but not least, his execution of the mere notes of the concerto was almost wholly lacking the elasticity that should have belonged to it. This being the truth, and nothing but the truth—told, we trust, after the manner of a gentleman, and based upon an adequate knowledge of the subject, we will proceed to tell the whole truth. Let us note, then, that we were charmingly impressed by the sincerity of the performance; that the interpretation, while it was far more scholastic than scholarly, was nevertheless based upon the very best of models; and, thirdly, the extreme technical difficulties of the concerto were mastered to a very precise degree. The interpretation of the Allegro quasi una Fantasia was a very broad and earnest one; the andante expression was poetically conceived, yet in a strictly tonal sense the performance of this movement was puerile; and the finale movement had little more to commend it than the culture of its inception, in that the technical performance was by no means vigorous and incisive. Mr. Foote also played the above named Bach-Saint Saëns and Liszt selections, with a very commendable effect, that is to say, if one is not hypercritical as to the use of terms. He was very cordially received and applauded by the audience, and this very just recognition of his ability as a musician was unquestionably his due. The overture was finely performed by the orchestra, and so was every other selection on the above recorded programme, the individual selections of which are too well known to our Boston public to require any analytical reference in the present notice. The choir of boys sang "Ein' Feste Burg" in tune, and the audience not only sang it out of tune, but in every conceivable sort of time; in other words it was a tempo rubato with variations on the audience's part. What a pity that the beautiful Raff overture, founded on Ein' Feste Burg, and given last year by the Philharmonics, could not have been heard at this concert.

91

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Histrionic and Harmonic Happenings of the Hour.

Review of

The Fifth Symphony Concert.

Mr. Henschel's patriotic affection for the great reformer led him into a mistake in arranging the programme presented at this concert. In the first place, as one admirable critic has pointed out, there is no close connection between Martin Luther and music; his influence first and last, was altogether religious, not at all musical, and only with a choral or a hymn can any thought of him as a musician be connected. Luther's memory seemed to have an evil influence on the concert; the final number, Luther's "Ein feste Burg," was near being the death of the concert. When the time came, the audience rose, (probably because it seemed like being in church) and—did not sing as they were requested; the result was somewhat discouraging. Instead of the grand, broad effect which Mr. Henschel no doubt awaited, there was only the thin tone of the boys' voices, vainly struggling against the full tone of the instruments. Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," the final number of the first part, is of no special importance. Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony in D minor, was the piece de resistance of the evening; in it also, the choral predominates, and to better advantage than in Wagner's composition, the thoughtful handling of the former being in marked contrast with the noisy fancifulness of the latter composer. The orchestral work was exceptionally fine throughout. The "Kaisermarsch" (somebody spoke of it, in the lobby, as the "Käsermarsch," a sort of unintentional irreverence we were not prepared for) offered many opportunities for noise, which were magnificently ignored. The overture was the beautiful "Egmont" overture, and was the most poorly played of all the numbers. The soloist was Mr. Arthur Foote, whose playing was extremely scholarly, almost schoolish. The concerto (Hiller, F-sharp, minor) was played with accuracy and gravity. His execution is fine, although his touch sometimes fails to please. The left-hand octaves in the Balgavotte, though apparently simple, are puzzling to most players, but were well done by Mr. Foote. The orchestral accompaniment to the concerto was fairly played. At the next concert Miss Simms will sing, Mr. Loeffler will play a concerto for violin by Goddard, and the orchestra will play Beethoven's second symphony, the prelude to Max Bruch's Lorelei, and a fantasy with an unpronounceable Russian name, by Glinka.

A LUTHER CELEBRATION would be incomplete without the aid of music. The great Reformer once wrote "I would that all the arts, music especially, were in the service of Him who created and gave them," and no one needs to be told how faithfully Luther carried out this idea in his adaptation of a church service which should fit the needs of the people. The world is indebted to Luther for the chorals which for more than three centuries have served as musical and verbal expressions of the sturdy, self-reliant, Saxon nature of the early Reformers. Where is the hymn that breathes a stronger personal trust in the Almighty and a more earnest personal defiance to the powers of darkness than "Ein feste Burg?" Every word is a blow, the effect of which is emphasized when the tune to which it was adapted by Luther, some 350 years ago, is sung. It is this choral which Sebastian Bach, the master for all time of Protestant church music, took as the basis of the cantata which will be given under its English title—"A Stronghold Sure"—at the Luther Memorial Concert, by the Handel and Haydn Society, next Sunday evening. Each wrote this cantata for a celebration of the Reformation in 1730 or 1739. The other work selected for this concert has also a peculiar fitness. Mendelssohn wrote "A Hymn of Praise" especially for the celebration at Leipzig, in 1840, of the four hundredth anniversary of the invention of printing. What student of history needs to be told that the Reformation was the logical result of that invention? The night was departing and the day was returning when the cheapening of books was begun by the first job-printers. The light had largely gained when, a century later, the first Protestants asserted man's personal responsibility to his Maker. It is merely a coincidence, perhaps, but it is a happy one, that Luther's pious wish concerning the arts was written by Mendelssohn at the head of the score of "A Hymn of Praise."

The fifth concert had the following for its program:

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Concerto in F-sharp minor for pianoforte.....Hiller
Kaiser-Marsch.....Wagner
Pianoforte solos:
a. Prelude in C.....Bach
b. Gavotte in B minor.....Bach-Saint Saens
c. Study in D-flat.....Liszt
Symphony No. 5, in D minor (Reformation)
Mendelssohn

Chorale: "Ein feste Burg".....

Mr. Arthur Foote was the pianist.

This was a Martin Luther memorial concert, and was mainly very enjoyable.

The audience was requested to join in the singing of the "Ein feste Burg," but as the conductor did not give the signal to begin the response was not very effective.

Mr. Foote was heartily received, and played with vigor and a most intellectual grasp of the composer's ideas.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE. (Loreley.) BRUCH.
ARIA. (My heart ever faithful.) BACH.
SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 36. BEETHOVEN.
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.—
Scherzo (Allegro).—Allegro molto.—

CONCERTO ROMANTIQUE FOR VIOLIN, op. 35. B. GODARD.
(FIRST TIME.)
Allegretto moderato; Recitativo: Adagio.—
Canzonetta.—Allegro molto.—

THREE SONGS FROM TENNYSON'S CYCLUS
"THE WINDOW; or the Songs of the Wrens." . . . SULLIVAN.

KAMARINSKAJA. (Fantasy on two Russian National Songs.) GLINKA.

SOLOISTS:

MISS HATTIE LOUISE SIMMS.

MR. M. LOEFFLER.

ARIA.

J. S. BACH.

My heart ever faithful,
Sing praises, be joyful,
Thy Jesus is near.
Away with complaining,
Faith ever maintaining,
My Jesus is here.

THREE SONGS from Tennyson's Cyclus
"The Window; or the Songs of the Wrens."

SULLIVAN.

- (a.) Vine, vine and eglantine,
Clasp her window, trail and twine.
Rose, rose and clematis,
Trail and twine and clasp and kiss.
Kiss, kiss and make her a bower
All of flowers, and drop me a flower.

Vine, vine and eglantine,
Cannot a flower, a flower be mine?
Rose, rose and clematis,
Drop me a flower, a flower to kiss.
Kiss, kiss and out of her bower,
All of flowers, dropt a flower.

- (b.) Where is another sweet as my sweet?
Such another beneath the sky?
Fine little hands, fine little feet,
Fine little heart and dewy blue eye.
Shall I write to her, shall I go?
Ask her to marry me by and by?
Somebody said that she'd say no,
But somebody knows that she'll say ay.

Ah, my lady if asked to her face,
Might say no, for she is but shy;
Fly little letter, apace, apace,
Down to the light in the valley, fly.
Fly to the light in the valley below,
Tell my wish to her dewy blue eye,
For somebody said that she'd say no,
But she won't say no,
And I tell you why—
She will say ay!

- (c.) Two little hands that meet,
Claspt on her seal, my sweet,
Must I take you and break you?
Two little hands that meet?

I must take you and break you,
And loving hands must part;
Take, take, break, break,
Break;—you may break my heart!
Faint heart never won,
Break, break and all's done.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of Saturday evening was not particularly interesting or very satisfying. And yet there were some most pleasant elements in the programme—well chosen and well performed. The work of the orchestra is now so thoroughly a unit, and there is so little to criticise in this respect, that the listener's attention is less distracted from the music itself, and he begins almost insensibly to require more there, as he had previously demanded more consistent execution.

The central number of the programme was the symphony—Beethoven's second. The reading was a delightful one; Mr. Henschel held a steady hand, and in the playing there were many moments of extreme nicety and grace, especially in the first movement and again in the last, where the little sudden sforzandi of the violins,—as if they were trying in vain to take away the theme from the wind instruments,—were perfect touches. It is in no invidious spirit of carping that we say that we wish that something of the Italian nature could be imparted to the German, when such music as the allegro con brio and the scherzo of this symphony are to be played. Beethoven, like Shakespeare, can be taken too seriously, and there are scores of measures here which should do nothing other than dance along. The scherzo is compact of little bits which are full of laughter, and every now and then a short up-rolling of the bases caves in like a suppressed guffaw. Beautiful and smooth as this evening's playing was, it lacked just that quality of mirth; the bows rather pulled their music out than coaxed it, and all the other instruments followed suit with a gravity which was none the less grave because it was delicately shaded. And so, though we had no fault to find and were grateful for the pleasure of the time, we could not help feeling the wish which, now that we have uttered it, may go its way to the limbo of impossible desires. The other orchestral numbers were,—for the opening of the concert, Bruch's "Loreley" prelude and Glinka's fantasy on a pair of Russian airs, "Kamarinskaja." In the prelude Bruch comes close to Wagner in the mellifluous richness of his orchestration, and certainly manifests more variety and decision of thought than the latter is wont to do in such pieces; although it is still to be admitted that the character of the music would suit as well with almost any fairy legend of a dreamy, placid sort. The fantasy begins briefly with a short melody of serious cast, and then shifts abruptly to a species of ballabile which goes on in an apparently endless iteration, to which "Hull's Victory" or "Fisher's Hornpipe," similarly distributed through a grand orchestra, would seem inspiration itself. The playing of these selections was unexceptionably good, and there was the best of taste in the melody for the first string of the violins in the prelude and in the taking up of the tune by the clarinet in the Glinka.

The soloists of the evening were two—Miss Hattie Louise Simms, the New York soprano, and Mr. M. Löffler, who usually sits at the first desk with Mr. Listemann. Miss Simms sang Bach's "My heart ever faithful," and three songs from Sullivan's setting of Tennyson's cyclus, "The Window," which was printed two or three years ago. The lady's singing was less good and satisfying then when she made her debut here a couple of seasons ago, in an Apollo concert. Her voice, naturally pure and rich, has gained in fullness, but her discipline of it and her style have apparently not kept pace with this growth. Her phrasing of the Sullivan airs, which are too thin and trivial to amount to anything unless treated with the complete artist's command of the malizie and the finesse of song, was not sufficiently strong and broad to raise them above the level of good parlor singing, and one sustained note was queerly displaced in pitch by an uncertain production of its tone. The Bach aria is a crucial test for any soprano, and Miss Simms shall have sympathy and not one word of blame for her small success in a song which even Parepa could hardly make uniformly sweet. The distribution of the melody constantly brings the strong and weak parts of the voice into contrast almost in the same bar, and unites in one phrase groups of notes which are far apart in vocal character. Miss Simms sang with intelligence and interest, and we feel sure that with a different selection of music she would have appeared to better advantage. Mr. Löffler, who made his first appearance as a solo player, and who was therefore somewhat nervous, had taken a "romantic" concerto for violin by B. Godard, opus 35, now given for the first time here. The three movements are: First, an allegretto moderato of military cast, from which a recitative which does not say much of anything leads to a short and pleasant adagio; second, a canzonet, somewhat in the Neapolitan barcarole vein; and, third, a short, bright allegro molto. The minor mode predominates in all the movements, and the orchestra has little to do but accompany, although a theme is occasionally transferred in part or entire from the solo instrument, as is the case for the violins in the adagio and the wooden wind in the canzonetta. Mr. Löffler's playing was excellent; quiet and equable throughout, although his tone, especially in the allegretto, was far from filling the ear. The concerto seems not written for display, but there was opportunity in it to show a good technique as in the staccati of the second movement, and the free bowing of the third. Mr. Löffler read the concerto "with good accent and good discretion," and was applauded.

Mr. Henschel accompanied the Sullivan songs with his customary grace and care, and the quaint counterpoint of the Bach accompaniment was charmingly brought out by the bassoon and other wooden wind.

At the next concert Schumann's third symphony will be given, together with Spohr's "Jessenoda" overture, and the "Rhine-daughters' song" from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." Madame Schiller will play two solos for pianoforte, one of which will be Chopin's second concerto in F minor, opus 21.

Boston Symphony Concert, Sattle

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before an excellent audience. We have little space at our command to devote to a detailed notice of the performance. The soloists were Mr. M. Loeffler and Miss Hattie Louise Simms. Mr. Loeffler played a concerto for violin by B. Godard, in which he proved himself to be a charming player of fine ability in technique, thoroughly artistic in taste and feeling, with a delightful frankness and freshness of style and a faultless intonation. His method is broad and simple, and he plays with poetic fire, passion and tenderness. If his tone were larger and fuller there would be scarcely a fault to find with his work. As it is, his manner was so modest and conscientious, and his performance so sympathetic and full of charm, that he achieved an instant success and was twice recalled at the end of the concerto, amid great enthusiasm. Upon Miss Simms it is difficult to pass judgment. She has a voice of generally sweet quality, and its lower and its higher notes are of rare beauty; but her style is very cold and amateurish. Perhaps she was not fortunate in her selections. The three songs from Sullivan's setting of Tennyson's "The Window," are very unmeaning and ineffective, and afford but little opportunity for an artist to show to advantage in them. Her other contribution to the concert, Bach's aria, "My heart ever faithful," though tunefully sung, was hard, dry and labored as an interpretation. The orchestral work was very good. The symphony programme was Beethoven's No. 2, which was admirably read. The novelty of the programme was a fantasy on two Russian songs, by Glinka, which at last became almost insufferably tedious by its persistent adherence to the tonic and dominant. The programme for the next concert consists of Spohr's "Jesonda" overture; Chopin's F-minor concerto; Schumann's symphony in E-flat, No. 3, a piano solo, and "The song of the Rhine-Daughters" from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." The soloist is to be Mad. Madeline Schiller.

CONCERTO ROMANTIQUE. Globe

First Performance of Godard's Work at the Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The Symphony concert of last evening gained its chief artistic interest from the presentation for the first time here of Benjamin Godard's "concerto romantique" for the violin, opus 35. It is a work which merits high praise. It belongs to the modern romantic school, but the composer has followed in nobody's wake. It begins with an allegretto movement, founded on a quaint and simple theme, which merges into a recitativo of gloomy weirdness. This again falls into an adagio of deeper, but of not less sterling beauties than those which have preceded it. The canzonetta, which forms the second movement, is the most popular portion of the work, and is an original and delicate bit of melodious music, which pleases everybody. The allegro malto returns to the spirit of the opening movement with an occasional reminiscence of its peculiar themes. The whole work is as far from commonplace as it could well be, and bears all the marks of a master hand. It was received last night with a great deal of enthusiasm. Mr. M. Loeffler, whose place is next to that of Mr. Ljstemann in the orchestra, was the soloist. He gave a careful and painstaking interpretation of the work, to which he had evidently devoted the utmost study and attention. His performance was highly creditable.

We have to thank Mr. Henschel for an unusually clear and brilliant presentation of Beethoven's second symphony. With some few blurs here and there, and some execrable scraping among the strings, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was excellent. Miss Hattie Louise Simms was the vocalist of the evening. She sang an aria from Bach and three songs by Sullivan, and brought to them, particularly the last selections, as we thought, considerably more freshness and enthusiasm than they were worth. When Sullivan is himself he is satisfactory, but when he attempts to don Schubert's cast-off garments he—well, there doesn't seem to be anybody in particular, or in general, who can wear Schubert's mantle. Sullivan certainly cannot. Miss Simms, however, was more than satisfactory and received a recall. The concert began with Bruch's strong prelude, "Loreley," and ended in the rather otherwise "Kamarenskaja," by the Russian composer, Glinka.

An exceptionally fine programme is announced for next week, as follows:

Overture (Jesonda).....Spohr
Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E-flat No. 3, op. 97.....Schumann
Piano solo.....
Song of the Rhine-daughters (Götterdämmerung).....Wagner
Soloist, Mlle. Madeline Schiller.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT. Herald

Sixth of the Season's Programmes at Music Hall.

The sixth of the season's programmes of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Hattie Louise Simms, soprano, and Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist, as soloists. The selections were:

Prelude—"Loreley".....Bruch
Aria—"My heart ever faithful".....Bach
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35.....B. Godard
Three songs from Tennyson's Cycnus.
The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens.....Sullivan
Kamarinskaja. Fantasy on two Russian National Songs.....Glinka

It would be useless to deny that the programmes presented by Mr. Henschel thus far this season have, as a whole, made attendance upon these concerts more a duty than a pleasure; and the empty seats all over the hall, which have been paid for, as well as the constant change in the occupancy of other seats, indicate a very marked falling off in the interest of the class of patrons who have for two seasons been so regularly present at all of these concerts. It will be remembered that Mr. Henschel promised, upon his return from abroad, that the programmes of this season should be of a lighter character than those of the last two years, but his selections thus far have shown no disposition to fulfil this intention; and the programmes presented have been calculated to please but a very limited class. The opening programmes of last season were far more enjoyable than the corresponding ones of the present season, and, if Mr. Henschel will but realize that the forcing process is detrimental in all classes of educational efforts, he will make far better and more reliable progress in cultivating a real appreciation of all that is good in musical composition. Last evening's programme had its fair share of interest, and the numbers contributed by Miss Simms made amends for whatever was uninteresting. Her voice has apparently gained in volume since she was last heard here, but its quality is of the same richness and purity, and the use she makes of her vocal gifts shows the same intelligence and skill as formerly. The enjoyment of hearing this artist is greatly heightened by her simple, direct and honest efforts, all of her singing having an individuality as charming as her personal presence. The beauty of the Bach aria was made doubly enjoyable by the singer's interpretation, and the graceful songs by Sullivan were given with equal success. Miss Simms completely won her audience by the beauties of her vocalization, and was recalled after each number. Mr. Loeffler proved hardly up to the standard expected from the soloists at these concerts, though he labored under a disadvantage in the first movement of the concerto, the dullness and uninteresting character of this part of the work being so apparent that but little pleasure could be gained from it under the most favorable circumstances. In the second movement, a very graceful canzonetta, Mr. Loeffler made a more pleasing effort, his tone being better and his execution more artistic, and the final movement was also well played. The symphony was presented in a masterly fashion, the larghetto in particular being played with fine effect.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sixth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Prelude to "Loreley,".....Bruch.
Air, "My heart ever faithful,".....Bach.
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven.
Concerto Romantique for violin; op. 35.....B. Godard.
(First time.)
Three songs from Tennyson.....Sullivan.
Kamarinskaja.....Glinka.

Miss Hattie Louise Simms was the singer, and Mr. M. Loeffler the violinist.

Bruch's "Loreley" prelude is one of those gorgeous bits of orchestral color, based upon very sensuous, if somewhat vague melodic material, and almost cloyingly rich harmony, that one can hardly listen to without pleasure. It is short, so that its mere sweetness and richness have not time to produce a feeling of over-satiety in the sensuous ear. Yet, at the beginning of a concert, when the listener's perceptive powers are in all their freshness, one naturally looks for music made of sterner stuff. Such things as this prelude, it seems to us, are better adapted to rest the mind after the strain of listening to more taxing matter. Beethoven's D major symphony—the "perfect" symphony—was delightfully played. Especially to be commended was the vigor and crispness with which the violins gave out the grand staccato scale-passages in the first movement; one only wondered that this same effect was not produced with equal decision in certain parts of the Larghetto. Every time one hears this wonderful symphony, one feels afresh how modern composers, with all their glorious conquests in the fields of musical and dramatic expressiveness, and of gorgeous coloring, have yet much to do before they can hope to rival such utter perfection of musical construction. Godard's Romantic Concerto, heard for the first time, proved singularly interesting. If not a work of the heroic stamp, it struck us as standing out from the mass of modern violin concertos by the nowadays uncommon harmony between the character and development of the composer's musical ideas and the instrumental material he has chosen wherewith to present them. In how many modern violin concertos do we not feel instinctively that the choice of a solo violin with orchestral accompaniment was purely wilful on the composer's part. That he had bound himself to write a violin concerto merely for the sake of writing a violin concerto, and not because a solo violin and orchestra were the fittest medium through which to give shape to his inspiration. How often in such cases does the painful suspicion beset us that, after the first few measures, the composer, in his heart of heart, wishes his solo violin to the deuce, that he may be free to make play with his whole orchestra, unencumbered by all consideration for the solo player? But in Godard's work one feels that here, at last, is something that is essentially violin music; that the orchestral accompaniment really delights in aiding and abetting the solo part, and that the composer finds his executive material the most natural and the properest he could have selected for the presentation of his ideas. Of the purely musical value of the composition we are as yet unable to judge, although it struck us as considerable. Certainly the work securely fixes the attention, and does not foil the ear of its legitimate expectations. Mr. Loeffler played it with both vigor and facile precision; with eminent self-concentration. Of elegance and grace we found but little in his play; still less of the element of all others which the concerto, by its title, seems most especially to invite romantic imagination. Yet it was a very solid and praiseworthy performance, and well merited the loud and persistent plaudits which the audience showered upon the young artist. Glinka's queer Kamarinskaja was capitally played and hugely enjoyed by such of the listeners as were possessed of a good sense of humor. Miss Simms, the singer of the evening, again showed what a pure and beautiful soprano voice she has, and also with what facility she sings even very taxing things. The native charm of her presence is also a valuable factor in the effect she produces. Yet, with all these natural advantages, seconded by considerable vocal training, one feels that the horizon of her musical appreciativeness is singularly limited. She sings frankly and simply, but with a curious, innocent superficiality of feeling. One hardly knows whether to be charmed or not at her childlike unconsciousness that the music she sings may have some deeper import than the display of a beautiful voice and a certain general vivacity of sentiment.

The next programme is: Overture to "Jesonda," Spohr; concerto in F minor, No. 2, Chopin; symphony in E-flat, No. 3, Schumann; piano-forte solos; "Song of the Rhine-Daughters," from "Götterdämmerung," Wagner. Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the pianist.

Notes. Travelled

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, another good sized and fashionable audience being in attendance. The programme was as follows: Prelude, "Loreley," Bruch; Aria, "My heart ever faithful," Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35, B. Godard; three songs from Tennyson's Cycnus; "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," Sullivan; Kamarinskaja, fantasy on two Russian National Songs, Glinka. The soloists were Miss Hattie Louise Simms, soprano, and Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist. In general terms it may be said that the concert was the least satisfying of any that has so far been given, but that aside, the orchestra did its work well. The trouble with the programme was that in an instrumental point of view it was too heavy, and almost entirely lacking in that lightness which should be interspersed here and there in order to make a classical concert thoroughly enjoyable. Yet the concert was not without a certain degree of interest. The only new number was the Fantasy of Glinka's, and that possessed so much of sameness that we feel certain that no one will care for a repetition of it. The great pleasure was centred in the efforts of Miss Simms and Mr. Loeffler. The lady rendered Bach's very unmeaning and ineffective, and afford but little opportunity for an artist to show to advantage in them. Her other contribution to the concert, Bach's aria, "My heart ever faithful," though tunelessly sung, was hard, dry and labored as an interpretation. The orchestral work was very good. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 2, which was admirably read. The novelty of the programme was a fantasy on two Russian songs, by Glinka, which at last became almost insufferably tedious by its persistent adherence to the tonic and dominant. The programme for the next concert consists of Spohr's "Jesondia" overture; Chopin's F-minor concerto; Schumann's symphony in E-flat, No. 3, a piano solo, and "The song of the Rhine-Daughters" from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." The soloist is to be Mad. Madeline Schiller.

CONCERTO ROMANTIQUE. Globe

First Performance of Godard's Work at the Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The Symphony concert of last evening gained its chief artistic interest from the presentation for the first time here of Benjamin Godard's "concerto romantique" for the violin, opus 35. It is a work which merits high praise. It belongs to the modern romantic school, but the composer has followed in nobody's wake. It begins with an allegretto movement, founded on a quaint and simple theme, which merges into a recitativo of gloomy weirdness. This again falls into an adagio of deeper, but of not less sterling beauties than those which have preceded it. The canzonetta, which forms the second movement, is the most popular portion of the work, and is an original and delicate bit of melodious music, which pleases everybody. The allegro molto returns to the spirit of the opening movement with an occasional reminiscence of its peculiar themes. The whole work is as far from commonplace as it could well be, and bears all the marks of a master hand. It was received last night with a great deal of enthusiasm. Mr. M. Loeffler, whose place is next to that of Mr. Ljstemann in the orchestra, was the soloist. He gave a careful and painstaking interpretation of the work, to which he had evidently devoted the utmost study and attention. His performance was highly creditable.

We have to thank Mr. Henschel for an unusually clear and brilliant presentation of Beethoven's second symphony. With some few blurs here and there, and some execrable scraping among the strings, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was excellent. Miss Hattie Louise Simms was the vocalist of the evening. She sang an aria from Bach and three songs by Sullivan, and brought to them, particularly the last selections, as we thought, considerably more freshness and enthusiasm than they were worth. When Sullivan is himself he is satisfactory, but when he attempts to don Schubert's cast off garments he—well, the result doesn't seem to be anybody in particular, or in general, who can wear Schubert's mantle. Sullivan certainly cannot. Miss Simms, however, was more than satisfactory and received a recall. The concert began with Bruch's strong prelude, "Loreley," and ended in the rather otherwise "Kamarinskaja," by the Russian composer, Glinka.

An exceptionally fine programme is announced for next week, as follows:

Overture (Jesondia).....Spohr
Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E flat No. 3, op. 97.....Schumann
Piano solo.
Song of the Rhine-daughters (Götterdämmerung).....Wagner
Soloist, Mme. Madeline Schiller.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sixth of the Season's Programmes at Music Hall.

The sixth of the season's programmes of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Hattie Louise Simms, soprano, and Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist, as soloists. The selections were:

Prelude—"Loreley".....Bruch
Aria—"My heart ever faithful".....Bach
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35.....B. Godard
Three songs from Tennyson's Cycles.
"The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens".....Sullivan
Kamarinskaja. Fantasy on two Russian National Songs.....Glinka

It would be useless to deny that the programmes presented by Mr. Henschel thus far this season have, as a whole, made attendance upon these concerts more a duty than a pleasure; and the empty seats all over the hall, which have been paid for, as well as the constant change in the occupancy of other seats, indicate a very marked falling off in the interest of the class of patrons who have for two seasons been so regularly present at all of these concerts. It will be remembered that Mr. Henschel promised, upon his return from abroad, that the programmes of this season should be of a lighter character than those of the last two years, but his selections thus far have shown no disposition to fulfil this intention; and the programmes presented have been calculated to please but a very limited class. The opening programmes of last season were far more enjoyable than the corresponding ones of the present season, and, if Mr. Henschel will but realize that the forcing process is detrimental in all classes of educational efforts, he will make far better and more reliable progress in cultivating a real appreciation of all that is good in musical composition. Last evening's programme had its fair share of interest, and the numbers contributed by Miss Simms made amends for whatever was uninteresting. Her voice has apparently gained in volume since she was last heard here, but its quality is of the same richness and purity, and the use she makes of her vocal gifts shows the same intelligence and skill as formerly. The enjoyment of hearing this artist is greatly heightened by her simple, direct and honest efforts, all of her singing having an individuality as charming as her personal presence. The beauty of the Bach aria was made doubly enjoyable by the singer's interpretation, and the graceful songs by Sullivan were given with equal success. Miss Simms completely won her audience by the beauties of her vocalization, and was recalled after each number. Mr. Loeffler proved hardly up to the standard expected from the soloists at these concerts, though he labored under a disadvantage in the first movement of the concerto, the dulness and uninteresting character of this part of the work being so apparent that but little pleasure could be gained from it under the most favorable circumstances. In the second movement, a very graceful canzonetta, Mr. Loeffler made a more pleasing effort, his tone being better and his execution more artistic, and the final movement was also well played. The symphony was presented in a masterly fashion, the larghetto in particular being played with fine effect.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, '83.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sixth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Prelude to "Loreley".....Bruch.
Aria, "My heart ever faithful".....Bach
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Concerto Romantique for violin; op. 35.....B. Godard
(First time.)
Three songs from Tennyson.....Sullivan
Kamarinskaja.....Glinka

Miss Hattie Louise Simms was the singer, and Mr. M. Loeffler the violinist.

Bruch's "Loreley" prelude is one of those gorgeous bits of orchestral color, based upon very sensuous, if somewhat vague melodic material, and almost cloyingly rich harmony, that one can hardly listen to without pleasure. It is short, so that its mere sweetness and richness have not time to produce a feeling of over-satiety in the sensuous ear. Yet, at the beginning of a concert, when the listener's perceptive powers are in all their freshness, one naturally looks for music made of sterner stuff. Such things as this prelude, it seems to us, are better adapted to rest the mind after the strain of listening to more taxing matter. Beethoven's D major symphony—the "perfect" symphony—was delightfully played. Especially to be commended was the vigor and crispness with which the violins gave out the grand staccato scale-passages in the first movement; one only wondered that this same effect was not produced with equal decision in certain parts of the Larghetto. Every time one hears this wonderful symphony, one feels afresh how modern composers, with all their glorious conquests in the fields of musical and dramatic expressiveness, and of gorgeous coloring, have yet much to do before they can hope to rival such utter perfection of musical construction. Godard's Romantique Concerto, heard for the first time, proved singularly interesting. If not a work of the heroic stamp, it struck us as standing out from the mass of modern violin concertos by the nowadays uncommon harmony between the character and development of the composer's musical ideas and the instrumental material he has chosen wherewith to present them. In how many modern violin concertos do we not feel instinctively that the choice of a solo violin with orchestral accompaniment was purely wilful on the composer's part. That he had bound himself to write a violin concerto merely for the sake of writing a violin concerto, and not because a solo violin and orchestra were the fittest medium through which to give shape to his inspiration. How often in such cases does the painful suspicion beset us that, after the first few measures, the composer, in his heart of heart, wishes his solo violin to the deuce, that he may be free to make play with his whole orchestra, unencumbered by all consideration for the solo player? But in Godard's work one feels that here, at last, is something that is essentially violin music; that the orchestral accompaniment really delights in aiding and abetting the solo part, and that the composer finds his executive material the most natural and the properest he could have selected for the presentation of his ideas. Of the purely musical value of the composition we are as yet unable to judge, although it struck us as considerable. Certainly the work securely fixes the attention, and does not foil the ear of its legitimate expectations. Mr. Loeffler played it with both vigor and facile precision; with eminent self-concentration. Of elegance and grace we found but little in his play; still less of the element of all others which the concerto, by its title, seems most especially to invite romantic imagination. Yet it was a very solid and praiseworthy performance, and well merited the loud and persistent plaudits which the audience showered upon the young artist. Glinka's queer Kamarinskaja was capitally played and hugely enjoyed by such of the listeners as were possessed of a good sense of humor. Miss Simms, the singer of the evening, again showed what a pure and beautiful soprano voice she has, and also with what facility she sings even very taxing things. The native charm of her presence is also a valuable factor in the effect she produces. Yet, with all these natural advantages, seconded by considerable vocal training, one feels that the horizon of her musical appreciativeness is singularly limited. She sings frankly and simply, but with a curious, innocent superficiality of feeling. One hardly knows whether to be charmed or not at her childlike unconsciousness that the music she sings may have some deeper import than the display of a beautiful voice and a certain general vivacity of sentiment.

The next programme is: Overture to "Jesondia," Spohr; concerto in F minor, No. 2, Chopin; symphony in E-flat, No. 3, Schumann; piano-forte solos; "Song of the Rhine-Daughters," from "Götterdämmerung," Wagner. Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the pianist.

Notes. Transcript

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, another good sized and fashionable audience being in attendance. The programme was as follows: Prelude, "Loreley," Bruch; Aria, "My heart ever faithful," Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35, B. Godard; three songs from Tennyson's Cycles; "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," Sullivan; Kamarinskaja, fantasy on two Russian National Songs, Glinka. The soloists were Miss Hattie Louise Simms, soprano, and Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist. In general terms it may be said that the concert was the least satisfying of any that has so far been given, but that aside, the orchestra did its work well. The trouble with the programme was that in an instrumental point of view it was too heavy, and almost entirely lacking in that lightness which should be interspersed here and there in order to make a classical concert thoroughly enjoyable. Yet the concert was not without a certain degree of interest. The only new number was the Fantasy of Glinka's, and that possessed so much of sameness that we feel certain that no one will care for a repetition of it. The great pleasure was centred in the efforts of Miss Simms and Mr. Loeffler. The lady rendered Bach's beautiful aria, "My heart ever faithful," with fine effect, and her rich voice, which has certainly gained in quantity and quality since she was last heard here, rang out most gloriously. She proved herself a skilful and intelligent vocalist, and in the aria, as well as in the charming songs of Sullivan was warmly applauded and complimented with recalls. Mr. Loeffler gave as his solo Godard's Concerto Romantique, op. 35. He made his first appearance in the city as a soloist, and made a good impression as a violinist, playing with much expression and fine execution. It is evident that he is a thoroughly accomplished violinist, and he will be a valuable addition to our solo talent. At the concert on Saturday evening next, the following is to be the programme: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Schumann; piano solo, "Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung"), Wagner. Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the piano soloist. The public rehearsal takes place on Friday afternoon.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert in the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before a fine audience at Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Prelude, "Loreley," Bruch; Aria, "My heart ever faithful," Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35, B. Godard; Three songs from Tennyson's Cylus; "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," Sullivan; Kamarinskaja, Fantasy on two Russian national songs, Glinka. The orchestral portion of the concert calls for no particular mention, otherwise than to say that the work of the musicians was, in general, exceedingly fine. The Beethoven symphony was unusually well played, a marked feature of interest being the very fine work of the strings in the rapid passages of the first movement. The introduction seemed to be played too slowly, but in the scherzo the performance could not well have been bettered. The only novelty in the programme was Glinka's fantasy, which was quite uninteresting and monotonous. The chief feature of the concert was the first appearance in Boston as a violin soloist of Mr. Loeffler, who occupies the position in the Symphony Orchestra second to Mr. Listemann, the leader, and who played for the first time here the concerto mentioned above. It is a very beautiful composition, and was superbly played by Mr. Loeffler, who showed a broad and refined method, remarkable power of execution and unusual power of expression. His tone is very pure if not quite so strong as might be desired, and he is undoubtedly a player of great ability, both in execution and expression. He made a great and instant success and was twice recalled. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Hattie Louise Simms, who displayed a sweet and expressive voice, which she managed in a rather uncultivated way. The selections in which she appeared, however, did not seem adapted to show her powers at their best. The next concert will be devoted to the following programme, with Mme. Madeline Schiller, pianist, as soloist: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Schumann; piano solo, "Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung"), Wagner.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was throughout an enjoyable one, and leaves very little for the critic to criticize, that is as regards performance. The second Beethoven Symphony went without flaw, with a remarkably well-balanced ensemble, the strings doing very artistic work in the rapid figures of the first movement. The tempo of the introduction seemed however a little "draggy," and the Larghetto became rather an andantino. The scherzo—the father of all symphonic scherzos—went admirably.

Miss Simms, the vocalist, sang the most melodious of Bach's arias—"My heart ever faithful"—in a manner which proved that she had been gaining ground since she last sang in Boston. It was a well phrased, clear and well shaded rendering. Only occasionally her pronunciation is vague, and she squeezes the tones on close vowels. She sang three songs from Sullivan's Cylus "Under the Window," with an artistic taste of highest character, but the whole cyclus is only an imitation of German thought, and remains—only an imitation. Heine and Schumann make a better combination than Tennyson and Sullivan. The accompaniment of the first song unconsciously reminded us of that noble beginning of the cyclus "Poets' Love," and weighed by the standard of "Im Wunderschönen Monat Mai" the set is found wanting. A genuine surprise was the performance of Mr. Loeffler the violinist. He played a most brilliant concerto in so easy a manner that half the audience thought it had no difficulty whatever—but enjoyed it amazingly nevertheless. We cannot recall many Boston debuts in which there was such entire absence of nervousness and such absolute and steady musicianship. In double stopping, skipping low passages, bridge tones, in every detail, the performer was more than satisfactory. The only possible fault was a lightness of tone, which may be the fault of the instrument. Mr. Loeffler's playing was not only praiseworthy in its technical details, but was full of expression and feeling. He awakened a most spontaneous enthusiasm. Mr. Henschel was occasionally a trifle slow in the tempo of the orchestral portion of this work, and seemed, in the last movement, to hold the soloist back, which in an allegro molto was unnecessary.

It is stated, upon what is claimed to be excellent authority, that Mr. H. L. Higginson, now abroad, is making strenuous efforts to secure Hans Richter as conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, and that Herr Richter is considering Mr. Higginson's offer very seriously.

SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—If variety was the object in preparing the programme for the sixth symphony concert, the result attained should be acknowledged as one of the very best order. The selections included the Prelude to "Loreley," Bruch; Bach's air, "My Heart is ever faithful"; Beethoven's symphony in D; Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35, B. Godard; Three songs from Tenny-son, Sullivan; and Komarinskaja, Glinka. The soloists were Miss Hattie Louise Simms, soprano, and Herr M. Loeffler, violinist. The concerto by Godard was performed here for the first time. It is evidently the creation of an earnest musical spirit, and in this respect a very welcome exception to more modern works of its class; it also proved interesting from a technical point of view. The main subjects are refined and poetic, the form is masterly, and the scoring full of interest. The concerto was very ably presented by Herr Loeffler, and it would be difficult to refer to his performance except in unqualified terms of praise. As an executant, he showed a rare perfection of left-hand technique, which, though it appeared as the most prominent characteristic of his playing, was not unaccompanied by qualities of a more artistic value. His style of playing is by no means deficient in gracefulness and piquancy, though his manner is so unassuming, so artistic in its very repose, that a contrary impression might naturally have prevailed. It is quite possible that he did not enjoy to the same extent of his auditors the intensely romantic character of the concerto, and that he could not cater to the sentiment of it with a corresponding quality of interpretation. If such were the case, it were unfair to conclude that his style is lacking in warmth, for with the broader and more noble music of the Beethoven concerto he might appear to the highest advantage. He could not have desired a more appreciative recognition than his performance received; and let us add, too, that the popular impression created by him was not only very complimentary, but was richly deserved. The Lorely prelude received in the orchestra's performance its exact complement, namely that most delicate variety of coloring, which could alone do justice to its cloying sweetness.

It cannot be considered that the possession by Miss Simms of a very pleasing soprano voice, so far as its natural quality is concerned, and of a certain acquired freedom in the use of it, sufficient at all events to contrast to the advantage of the favorite soprano of the symphony concert coterie, should satisfactorily account for her appearance in any concert, where only artists of either the highest repute or excellence are supposed to be engaged. The lady's interpretation of the Bach aria was so inadequate and even flippant, that it is difficult to withhold an impeachment of its sincerity. The songs by Sullivan, owing no doubt to the less exacting order of the music, were rendered with better expression; but it must be conceded, to quote the very convenient compliment of a contemporary, that "the native charm of her presence is a valuable factor in the effect she produces." Returning to the strictly orchestral numbers of the programme, the performance of Beethoven's second symphony was delightfully admirable in every movement of it; in brief, it was a very worthy performance of a work that more strikingly illustrates the clearness and firmness of the master-hand that wrote it, than any one of the immortal series of nine to which it belongs.

Music Hall.

1883 - 84.

ONY ORCHE

HEL, CONDUCTOR

NCERT.

BER 10TH, AT 8, P. M.

AMME.

BEETHOVEN.

HILLER.

WAGNER.

harp minor. op 69.

ell tempered Clavichord.) BACH.

BACH-SAINT SAËNS.

LISZT.

MENDELSSOHN.

"EIN' FESTE BURG."

DIST:

UR FOOTE.

developed an artistic nature, ntal in the extreme. In order true musical interpretation, arefully trained, that they may and aesthetically expanded, and emotions of the soul in a judi- When one has become emotion- mprove by hearing others sing; on and on, until one may be e one's soul is imbued with the r because one is an admirer of follow that a correct expres- emotions; but a person thus education, become an artist in To become a true vocal artist, well as the muscles of the body, acher for the first lesson, as for same teacher, from the beginning

RELATION TO PIANO

1894 have this 1850, and and com-

de when

later in develope- under the

is success seven, but ental rep-

when Sir Harmonie he London t he sang his voice passionate nor voice. ving to a o sing any

ke it?" onfidence morrow." h the co- position e up to

beautiful aria, "My heart ever faithful," with fine effect, and her rich voice, which has certainly gained in quantity and quality since she was last heard here, rang out most gloriously. She proved herself a skilful and intelligent vocalist, and in the aria, as well as in the charming songs of Sullivan was warmly applauded and complimented with recalls. Mr. Loeffler gave as his solo Godard's Concerto Romantique, op. 35. He made his first appearance in the city as a soloist, and made a good impression as a violinist, playing with much expression and fine execution. It is evident that he is a thoroughly accomplished violinist, and he will be a valuable addition to our solo talent. At the concert on Saturday evening next, the following is to be the programme: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Schumann; piano solo, "Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung"), Wagner. Mme. Madelaine Schiller will be the piano soloist. The public rehearsal takes place on Friday afternoon.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert in the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before a fine audience at Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Prelude, "Loreley," Bruch; Aria, "My heart ever faithful," Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35, B. Godard; Three songs from Tennyson's Cylus; "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," Sullivan; Kamarinskaja, Fantasy on two Russian national songs, Glinka. The orchestral portion of the concert calls for no particular mention, otherwise than to say that the work of the musicians was, in general, exceedingly fine. The Beethoven symphony was unusually well played, a marked feature of interest being the very fine work of the strings in the rapid passages of the first movement. The introduction seemed to be played too slowly, but in the scherzo the performance could not well have been bettered. The only novelty in the programme was Glinka's fantasy, which was quite uninteresting and monotonous. The chief feature of the concert was the first appearance in Boston as a violin soloist of Mr. Loeffler, who occupies the position in the Symphony Orchestra second to Mr. Listemann, the leader, and who played for the first time here the concerto mentioned above. It is a very beautiful composition, and was superbly played by Mr. Loeffler, who showed a broad and refined method, remarkable power of execution and unusual power of expression. His tone is very pure, if not quite so strong as might be desired, and he is undoubtedly a player of great ability, both in execution and expression. He made a great and instant success and was twice recalled. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Hattie Louise Simms, who displayed a sweet and expressive voice, which she managed in a rather uncultivated way. The selections in which she appeared, however, did not seem adapted to show her powers at their best. The next concert will be devoted to the following programme, with Mme. Madelaine Schiller, pianist, as soloist: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Schumann; piano solo, "Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung"), Wagner.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was throughout an enjoyable one, and leaves very little for the critic to criticise, that is as regards performance. The second Beethoven Symphony went without flaw, with a remarkably well-balanced ensemble, the strings doing very artistic work in the rapid figures of the first movement. The tempo of the introduction seemed however a little "draggy," and the Larghetto became rather an andantino. The scherzo—the father of all symphonic scherzos—went admirably.

Miss Simms, the vocalist, sang the most melodious of Bach's arias—"My heart ever faithful"—in a manner which proved that she had been gaining ground since she last sang in Boston. It was a well phrased, clear and well shaded rendering. Only occasionally her pronunciation is vague, and she squeezes the tones on close vowels. She sang three songs from Sullivan's Cylus "Under the Window," with an artistic taste of highest character, but the whole cyclus is only an imitation of German thought, and remains—only an imitation. Heine and Schumann make a better combination than Tennyson and Sullivan. The accompaniment of the first song unconsciously reminded us of that noble beginning of the cyclus "Poets' Love," and weighed by the standard of "Im Wunderschoenen Monat Mai" the set is found wanting. A genuine surprise was the performance of Mr. Loeffler the violinist. He played a most brilliant concerto in so easy a manner that half the audience thought it had no difficulty whatever—but enjoyed it amazingly nevertheless. We cannot recall many Boston debuts in which there was such entire absence of nervousness and such absolute and steady musicianship. In double stopping, skipping low passages, bridge tones, in every detail, the performer was more than satisfactory. The only possible fault was a tightness of tone, which may be the fault of the instrument. Mr. Loeffler's playing was not only praiseworthy in its technical details, but was full of expression and feeling. He awakened a most spontaneous enthusiasm. Mr. Henschel was occasionally a trifle slow in the tempo of the orchestral portion of this work, and seemed, in the last movement, to hold the soloist back, which in an allegro molto was unnecessary.

It is stated, upon what is claimed to be excellent authority, that Mr. H. L. Higginson, now abroad, is making strenuous efforts to secure Hans Richter as conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, and that Herr Richter is considering Mr. Higginson's offer very seriously.

SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—If variety was the object in preparing the programme for the sixth symphony concert, the result attained should be acknowledged as one of the very best order. The selections included the Prelude to "Loreley," Bruch; Bach's air, "My Heart is ever faithful"; Beethoven's symphony in D; Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35, B. Godard; Three songs from Tenny-son, Sullivan; and Komarinskaja, Glinka. The soloists were Miss Hattie Louise Simms, soprano, and Herr M. Loeffler, violinist. The concerto by Godard was performed here for the first time. It is evidently the creation of an earnest musical spirit, and in this respect a very welcome exception to more modern works of its class; it also proved interesting from a technical point of view. The main subjects are refined and poetic, the form is masterly, and the scoring full of interest. The concerto was very ably presented by Herr Loeffler, and it would be difficult to refer to his performance except in unqualified terms of praise. As an executant, he showed a rare perfection of left-hand technique, which, though it appeared as the most prominent characteristic of his playing, was not unaccompanied by qualities of a more artistic value. His style of playing is by no means deficient in gracefulness and piquancy, though his manner is so unassuming, so artistic in its very repose, that a contrary impression might naturally have prevailed. It is quite possible that he did not enjoy to the same extent of his auditors the intensely romantic character of the concerto, and that he could not cater to the sentiment of it with a corresponding quality of interpretation. If such were the case, it were unfair to conclude that his style is lacking in warmth, for with the broader and more noble music of the Beethoven concerto he might appear to the highest advantage. He could not have desired a more appreciative recognition than his performance received; and let us add, too, that the popular impression created by him was not only very complimentary, but was richly deserved. The Lorely prelude received in the orchestra's performance its exact complement, namely that most delicate variety of coloring, which could alone do justice to its cloying sweetness.

It cannot be considered that the possession by Miss Simms of a very pleasing soprano voice, so far as its natural quality is concerned, and of a certain acquired freedom in the use of it, sufficient at all events to contrast to the advantage of the favorite soprano of the symphony concert coterie, should satisfactorily account for her appearance in any concert, where only artists of either the highest repute or excellence are supposed to be engaged. The lady's interpretation of the Bach aria was so inadequate and even flippant, that it is difficult to withhold an impeachment of its sincerity. The songs by Sullivan, owing no doubt to the less exacting order of the music, were rendered with better expression; but it must be conceded, to quote the very convenient compliment of a contemporary, that "the native charm of her presence is a valuable factor in the effect she produces." Returning to the strictly orchestral numbers of the programme, the performance of Beethoven's second symphony was delightfully admirable in every movement of it; in brief, it was a very worthy performance of a work that more strikingly illustrates the clearness and firmness of the master-hand that wrote it, than any one of the immortal series of nine to which it belongs.

Music Hall.

1883 - 84.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENSEL, CONDUCTOR

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 10TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- 1. BEETHOVEN.
- 2. HILLER.
- 3. WAGNER.

harp minor. op 69.

ell tempered Clavichord.) BACH.

BACH-SAINT SAËNS.

LISZT.

MENDELSSOHN.

"EIN' FESTE BURG."

LIST:

UR FOOTE.

developed an artistic nature, fatal in the extreme. In order true musical interpretation, carefully trained, that they may and æsthetically expanded, and emotions of the soul in a judgment. When one has become emotion-improve by hearing others sing; on and on, until one may be the one's soul is imbued with the because one is an admirer of follow that a correct expression of emotions; but a person thus education, become an artist in To become a true vocal artist, well as the muscles of the body, teacher for the first lesson, as for same teacher, from the beginning

RELATION TO PIANO

have this 1850, and and com-

de when

later in develope- under the

is success seven, but ental rep-

when Sir Harmonie he London t he sang his voice assionate nor voice. ving to a o sing any

ke it?" onfidence morrow." h the co- position e up to

beautiful aria, "My heart ever faithful," with fine effect, and her rich voice, which has certainly gained in quantity and quality since she was last heard here, rang out most gloriously. She proved herself a skilful and intelligent vocalist, and in the aria, as well as in the charming songs of Sullivan was warmly applauded and complimented with recalls. Mr. Loeffler gave as his solo Godard's Concerto Romantique, op. 35. He made his first appearance in the city as a soloist, and made a good impression as a violinist, playing with much expression and a fine execution. It is evident that he is a thoroughly accomplished violinist, and he will be a valuable addition to our solo talent. At the concert on Saturday evening next, the following is to be the programme: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Schumann; piano solo, "Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung"), Wagner. Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the piano soloist. The public rehearsal takes place on Friday afternoon.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert in the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before a fine audience at Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Prelude, "Loreley," Bruch; Aria, "My heart ever faithful," Bach; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven; Concerto Romantique for Violin, op. 35, B. Godard; Three songs from Tennyson's Cylus; "The Window, or the Songs of the Wrens," Sullivan; Kamarinskaja, Fantasy on two Russian national songs, Glinka. The orchestral portion of the concert calls for no particular mention, otherwise than to say that the work of the musicians was, in general, exceedingly fine. The Beethoven symphony was unusually well played, a marked feature of interest being the very fine work of the strings in the rapid passages of the first movement. The introduction seemed to be played too slowly, but in the scherzo the performance could not well have been bettered. The only novelty in the programme was Glinka's fantasy, which was quite uninteresting and monotonous. The chief feature of the concert was the first appearance in Boston as a violin soloist of Mr. Loeffler, who occupies the position in the Symphony Orchestra second to Mr. Listemann, the leader, and who played for the first time here the concerto mentioned above. It is a very beautiful composition, and was superbly played by Mr. Loeffler, who showed a broad and refined method, remarkable power of execution and unusual power of expression. His tone is very pure if not quite so strong as might be desired, and he is undoubtedly a player of great ability, both in execution and expression. He made a great and instant success and was twice recalled. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Hattie Louise Simms, who displayed a sweet and expressive voice, which she managed in a rather uncultivated way. The selections in which she appeared, however, did not seem adapted to show her powers at their best. The next concert will be devoted to the following programme, with Mme. Madeline Schiller, pianist, as soloist: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21, Chopin; symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Schumann; piano solo, "Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung"), Wagner.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was throughout an enjoyable one, and leaves very little for the critic to criticize, that is as regards performance. The second Beethoven Symphony went without flaw, with a remarkably well-balanced ensemble, the strings doing very artistic work in the rapid figures of the first movement. The tempo of the introduction seemed however a little "draggy," and the Larghetto became rather an andantino. The scherzo—the father of all symphonic scherzos—went admirably.

Miss Simms, the vocalist, sang the most melodious of Bach's arias—"My heart ever faithful"—in a manner which proved that she had been gaining ground since she last sang in Boston. It was a well phrased, clear and well shaded rendering. Only occasionally her pronunciation is vague, and she squeezes the tones on close vowels. She sang three songs from Sullivan's Cylus "Under the Window," with an artistic taste of highest character, but the whole cyclus is only an imitation of German thought, and remains—only an imitation. Heine and Schumann make a better combination than Tennyson and Sullivan. The accompaniment of the first song unconsciously reminded us of that noble beginning of the cyclus "Poets' Love," and weighed by the standard of "Im Wunderschönen Monat Mai" the set is found wanting. A genuine surprise was the performance of Mr. Loeffler the violinist. He played a most brilliant concerto in so easy a manner that half the audience thought it had no difficulty whatever—but enjoyed it amazingly nevertheless. We cannot recall many Boston debuts in which there was such entire absence of nervousness and such absolute and steady musicianship. In double stopping, skipping low passages, bridge tones, in every detail, the performer was more than satisfactory. The only possible fault was a lightness of tone, which may be the fault of the instrument. Mr. Loeffler's playing was not only praiseworthy in its technical details, but was full of expression and feeling. He awakened a most spontaneous enthusiasm. Mr. Henschel was occasionally a trifle slow in the tempo of the orchestral portion of this work, and seemed, in the last movement, to hold the soloist back, which in an allegro molto was unnecessary.

It is stated, upon what is claimed to be excellent authority, that Mr. H. L. Higginson, now abroad, is making strenuous efforts to secure Hans Richter as conductor of the Boston Symphony Concerts, and that Herr Richter is considering Mr. Higginson's offer very seriously.

SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—If variety was the object in preparing the programme for the sixth symphony concert, the result attained should be acknowledged as one of the very best order. The selections included the Prelude to "Loreley," Bruch; Bach's air, "My Heart is ever faithful"; Beethoven's symphony in D; Concerto Romantique for violin, op. 35, B. Godard; Three songs from Tenny-son, Sullivan; and Kamarinskaja, Glinka. soloists were Miss Hattie Louise Simms, prano, and Herr M. Loeffler, violinist. concerto by Godard was performed here the first time. It is evidently the creation of an earnest musical spirit, and in this respect a very welcome exception to more modern works of its class; it also proved interesting from a technical point of view. The main subjects are refined and poetic, the form is masterly and the scoring full of interest. The concerto was very ably presented by Herr Loeffler, except in unqualified terms of praise. A executant, he showed a rare perfection of hand technique, which, though it appears the most prominent characteristic of his playing, was not unaccompanied by qualities of more artistic value. His style of playing is no means deficient in gracefulness and piquant, though his manner is so unassuming, so artistic in its very repose, that a contrary impression might naturally have prevailed. It is quite possible that he did not enjoy to the same extent of his auditors the intensely romantic character of the concerto, and that he could cater to the sentiment of it with a corresponding quality of interpretation. If such were the case, it were unfair to conclude that his style lacking in warmth, for with the broader and more noble music of the Beethoven concerto might appear to the highest advantage. could not have desired a more appreciative recognition than his performance received; and we add, too, that the popular impression created by him was not only very complimentary, was richly deserved. The Loreley prelude received in the orchestra's performance its complement, namely that most delicate variety of coloring, which could alone do justice to cloying sweetness.

It cannot be considered that the possession by Miss Simms of a very pleasing soprano voice so far as its natural quality is concerned, and a certain acquired freedom in the use of it, sufficient at all events to contrast to the advantage of the favorite soprano of the symphony concert coterie, should satisfactorily account for her appearance in any concert, where other artists of either the highest repute or excellence are supposed to be engaged. The lady's interpretation of the Bach aria was so inadequate and even flippant, that it is difficult to withhold an impeachment of its sincerity. The solo by Sullivan, owing no doubt to the less exciting order of the music, were rendered with better expression; but it must be conceded that the very convenient compliment of a temporary, that "the native charm of presence is a valuable factor in the effect produces." Returning to the strictly orchestral numbers of the programme, the performance of Beethoven's second symphony was delightfully admirable in every movement of it; brief, it was a very worthy performance of work that more strikingly illustrates the clearness and firmness of the master-hand than wrote it, than any one of the immortal series to which it belongs.

ONE compliment can be very sincerely paid to the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has sternly set his face against the substitutions of other instruments for those called for in the score by the composers. The contra-bassoon (used by Beethoven in the Fifth and Ninth Symphonies); the English horn, used by Berlioz so frequently; the harp, used by all modern composers to some degree,—have not been replaced by more commonly used instruments, but have been present to give the tone color, just as the composer desired it. Even in the matter of reforming the carelessness with which the cornet is substituted for the trumpet, the director has been partially successful; and, if it is impossible to introduce the natural trumpet again, at least the valve trumpet has been present, to give its appropriate color to the lofty passages of some of the older and many of the modern (especially the Wagnerian) symphonies and overtures.

Georg Henschel.

Mr. Georg Henschel, whose portrait we gave this week in our paper, was born at Breslau in 1850, and early made his mark as a singer, pianist and composer.

His first appearance as a pianist was made when a lad of twelve years old.

He studied with Moscheles in Leipzig, later in Berlin, but finally devoted himself to the development of his magnificent voice, studying under the famous Adolphe Schulze.

His first appearance in London, where his success was complete, was at the age of twenty-seven, but previous to that he had achieved a Continental reputation as a singer and composer.

At Exeter Hall, about six years ago, when Sir Michael Costa was director of the Sacred Harmonic Society, his solos were the admiration of the London Musical world, where it was remarked that he sang always with his whole soul, and that his voice though baritone had all the ringing passionate cadence generally only belonging to the tenor voice.

Nor will he sing inferior music. Observing to a friend that he could not reconcile himself to sing any but good music, his friend asked him:

"How if your audiences of today don't like it?"

"Well, then," said Henschel with the confidence of true genius, "they will learn to do so tomorrow."

He is at present engaged, we believe, with the cooperation of Mr. W. D. Howells, in the composition of a comic opera which will doubtless come up to the expectations of the music-loving public.

BOSTON.

Nov. 14th.—We have been commemorating here recently, all the way from A. P. Peck to Martin Luther. All Boston's recent concerts seem to have been devoted to the great Protestant Reformer, and "Ein Feste Burg" has formed the back-bone of all the programmes. The strongest dose of it was administered by Mr. Henschel last Saturday. He gave it with trumpets, he gave it with flutes, he gave it mixed, and he gave it "straight." First it was presented in Wagner's Kaiser Marsch, where it comes in dislocated phrases amid a tornado of sounds that would have made Luther stare with wonder. The long phrases and noble power of the march were well given by the orchestra, although a few breaks in the brass occurred. Then comes the Mendelssohn "Reformation Symphony," with Luther's Chorale, as the chief theme of the finale. This was not quite so well rendered, and especially, the short, swelled notes of the wind instruments in the first movement, were roughly given. I cannot become enthusiastic over this symphony of Mendelssohn's. It seems a real piece d'occasion, and the weakest of all his great works. I, for one, would have liked Raff's overture placed in the same programme (since there was to be so much of the chorale), that two very different styles of development, by two great composers, might have been compared.

The third appearance of the chorale was at the close of the symphony, when a chorus of boys arose and piped it forth rather weakly. The audience had previously been supplied with cards bearing the melody and two verses, and had been invited to join in the chorus. Very few did so. It was such an odd innovation for a symphony concert, that all were rather taken aback, and arose doubtfully, not knowing whether to listen to the number as music or religion. Those who did sing can mystify the public by declaring that they have sung at the Henschel concerts. At this concert Mr. Foote also played Hiller's pianoforte concerto, and a few solos. His performance was marked by intellectuality and reserve, but was at times rather dry. The first Bach prelude, however, was played by him in a manner that brought out all its latent beauty. How much more one appreciates this work after hearing Gounod's "Ave Maria!"

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Jessonda.) SPOHR.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in F minor, No. 2, op. 21. CHOPIN.
Maestoso.—Larghetto.—Allegro vivace.—

SYMPHONY in E flat No. 3, op. 97. SCHUMANN.
I. LEBHAFT. II. SCHERZO (Sehr maessig).
III. NICHT SCHNELL. IV. FEIERLICH. V. LEBHAFT.

PIANO SOLO.

(a) "RICORDANZA." LIZST.
(b) TOCCATA DE CONCERT. DUPONT.

SONG OF THE RHINE-DAUGHTERS. (Goetterdaemmerung.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

MME. MADELINE SCHILLER.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. adv.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann's third symphony—in E flat, opus 97—is undeniably a great work, and in extent exceeds by one movement the normal length of the standard classics. But it is not a work which can hold interest, unless it be in an auditory of students, nor give continuous pleasure in any case. It would seem as if in writing most of these five movements Schumann had felt other than merely musical influences, and as if the light of his inspiration had been clouded and checked by some mood which he could not control. There is an air of gloom and depression about it which it would be difficult to trace to any definite source, and which escapes analysis. But certain it is, that only the scherzo makes or leaves a really agreeable impression. There even seems to be a misnomer in the naming of the last two movements, of which the lebhaft or allegro is much more fiery or confused than that which is so described. The symphonic work of Schumann must, of course, be recognized in such programmes as Mr. Henschel's; but it would surely be better to be content with the better specimens, or to present this duller one only by a selected movement or two. The Wagner selection which ended the concert of Saturday evening—the "Song of the Rhine-Daughters," from the "Götterdämmerung"—was another scarcely felicitous choice. Curiosity to hear something from that much discussed work could hardly have found much reward in this. There were, of course, fulness of sound and grand instrumental combinations; but the sum total amounts to little else, and the effect, even though at first exciting, soon benumbs feeling and deadens interest. But, on the other hand, the opening overture, Spohr's "Jessonda," was purely delightful. In this Spohr is just learned enough for diversity of treatment, and not so learned as to be intricate or whimsical; his music here is rich, but not quite sensuous, and is light and gay, but refined and above triviality. In the earlier part of this overture the orchestra gave some beautiful piano playing, smooth and sweet, but yet with proper gradations for phrase and emphasis. Indeed, their evening's work was all admirable, and only captiousness could weigh heavily upon the little inaccuracies which might be noted here and there.

The soloist of the evening was Madame Madeline Schiller, than whom no pianist—unless it be Professor Baermann—is more warmly and gladly welcomed by a Boston audience. What the characteristics of Madame Schiller's playing are, our musical readers know so well that it would be supererogatory to discuss them minutely now. The perfection of technique is hers; but it is a technique which she seldom, unfortunately, allows her listeners to forget. The spirit of her northern land—we would not discourteously imply that it is of her own northern nature—is in all that she does. Her strength and her brilliancy are of the iceberg, or the glacier, that move indomitably and glitter from afar; her delicacy and trembling softness are of the aurora, whose fair, faint, dissolving rays may even glow with rosy tints, but cannot cast a beam of warmth. We have never heard her when we were so impressed by her wonderful possession of the secrets of pianoforte technique. We have sometimes felt that she tried to wring from the instrument and from her own self an absolute force which they could not possess; but on this occasion she was ever just within the limit of her possibility. The Chopin concerto which she played—in F minor, No. 2, opus 21—is not the most entertaining composition of its kind, and Madame Schiller's performance was not always just to it. The largo was taken up as if it were a full largo, and there were some exaggerations of expression, as if the player were trying to arrive by deliberation and will at readings which feeling would be expected to dictate; but in the opening maestoso the ornamentation was exquisitely subordinated to the main body of the thought, which was lucidly and strongly shown. Madame Schiller did herself least justice in Liszt's Ricordanza, of which she did not make one perfect and symmetrical image, but rather a memory, in which a salient point now and then stood out in a brilliant but still bewildering mist. But few are the pianists who could make each atom of that mist so sparkle with individuality. Dupont's "Toccata de Concert," however, on the other hand, afforded a magnificent display of her skill, especially in octave playing, and was delivered with more animation and freedom than she often displays. But, taken as a whole, her three numbers gave a splendid exposition of what she is as a pianist and of what she can do.

The next concert will begin with Mendelssohn's "Athalia" overture, and send everybody home in good humor with Boieldieu's dear delightful old "Caliph of Bagdad." The symphony will be Beethoven's third—the "Eroica." Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing a scene from Spohr's "Faust," and songs by Wagner, Bennett and Grieg. Mr. William Müller will play a manuscript romance for violoncello by K. Müller-Berghaus.

LAST NIGHT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme Presented at the Sixth Concert in Music Hall.

The seventh symphony concert at Music Hall last evening drew, as usual, a crowded house. Mme. Madeline Schiller was the soloist, and was warmly received by her many admirers. She had selected as her principal number one of Chopin's concertos (No. 2 in F minor). This was an eminently happy choice. Nowhere does this gifted artist appear to better advantage than in her interpretation of the works of Chopin. To the performance of his works she brings a peculiarly sympathetic and artistic understanding, which makes the result a revelation. It is sufficient praise to say that she was at her best last evening, and that the applause which greeted her successful efforts amounted to an ovation. Schumann's great symphony in E flat (No. 3) was the chief orchestral feature of the occasion and was well given throughout. Spohr's pretty overture, "Jessonda," began and Wagner's mystical and striking song of the Rhine daughters from the "Götterdämmerung" concluded the programme. Next week the following will be presented:

Overture (Athalia).....Mendelssohn
Scene and Aria (Faust).....Spohr
Symphony in E flat (Eroica) No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Romance for Violoncello.....K. Müller-Berghaus
(MS. First time.)

Songs with Piano:

(a) Gracie Song.....R. Wagner
(b) To Chloe.....Sterndale Bennett
(c) Forest Wanderings.....Grieg

Overture (Le Calife de Bagdad).....Boieldieu
Soloists: Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mr. Wilhelm Müller.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The financial success of the symphony concerts for the third season appears to be as well assured as it can be at the prices fixed for tickets; that is to say, the sale of season tickets for both the rehearsals and the concerts has been very near the entire capacity of the hall. Whether or not the receipts will balance the expense attending these concerts is, however, a matter of little public interest, in comparison to that felt in the success which shall attend this scheme in developing a popular love for orchestral music, which shall eventually lead to a demand for such entertainments beyond the limits of the usual concert halls, and make orchestral music a standard source of amusement for the people. The general tone of the announcement made by Mr. H. L. Higginson in March, 1881, indicates that his intent in founding a permanent orchestra was to have the best music played at popular prices, as in the cities of continental Europe; and there can be but one opinion as to what music is the best for audiences gathered, as was Mr. Higginson's intent, from the people. As the public pay all that Mr. Higginson charges for his tickets, it appears perfectly proper that the character of the concert should be freely discussed, and opinions expressed as to how fully the programmes selected and presented by Mr. Henschel accomplish the result aimed at by Mr. Higginson in his generous establishment of this series of concerts. If a wealthy man, finding that the educational advantages of his native town were inadequate to the needs of his children, should establish a high school upon an expensive scale, and decline to aid in the maintenance of the primary and grammar schools, his position would not be unlike that in which Mr. Henschel's actions have put Mr. Higginson, assuming that the direction of these concerts and selection of programmes is in the hands of the conductor of the symphony orchestra. It might, in the case cited, be ungrateful to criticize the establishment of the high school, but if, in the effort to gain an entrance to its classes, the children of the town became disgusted with all study because of their ill success, there might be some difficulty in fully appreciating the generosity of the high school founder. Now, this is precisely the effect to be apprehended if Mr. Henschel persists in presenting programmes to please himself and the very limited number of people who have been through the course of musical studies demanded to fit them to find enjoyment in the forms of orchestral music so largely represented on the symphony concert programmes. The general public does not and cannot appreciate the larger part of the selections which are played so finely by this magnificent orchestra, and the growing number of vacant chairs which have been paid for at the Saturday evening concerts is an argument against a continuance of the present programmes, which cannot be put out of sight. To say that the immense audiences attending the rehearsals proves the popularity of the programmes presented goes for nothing, because these audiences are largely made up of young ladies yet in their teens, who listen with attention, and go away wondering what it is all about. No definite plan was before the public when the tickets to the concerts and rehearsals were sold, and fashion had much more to do with the sale of both sets of tickets than the love of music. All familiar with the rehearsal and concert audiences know that the most abstruse compositions, forms of orchestral writing, which defy analysis, save after the most careful study, are applauded to the echo frequently upon a first hearing, and the actual merit of the work has little to do with its appreciation by either of these audiences. It would be absurd to say that there are none among these audiences who share in Mr. Henschel's admiration for the class of works presented, but, if the audiences as a whole, or in any considerable part, can find the pleasure in the programmes which their applause indicates, then, indeed, all the cries of education are at fault, and none but the high schools of the land should be maintained. If the best results are to be achieved by these concerts, if the public of Boston is to be the winner by the bounty of Mr. Higginson, if the rising generation is to become familiar with, and acquire a taste for, the best orchestral music, then a radical change must be made in the make-up of the programmes. Mr. Theodore Thomas gained his popularity, not by his symphony concerts at the New York Academy of Music and Steinway Hall, but by his programmes at the old Central Park beer gardens in that city, and their reproduction throughout this country, 10 or more years ago. He has since been using every effort to force the musical taste in orchestral works beyond its natural development. In Brooklyn the Philharmonic Society has checked his career and reinstated the class of programmes which gained Mr. Thomas his reputation. Cannot Mr. Henschel be led to see the wisdom of a similar course, and present such programmes during the remainder of the season as shall give a large amount of pleasure with such an amount of instruction as can readily be mastered each week by his audiences without weariness?

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following programme being performed:

Overture, "Jesonda".....Spohr
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.....Schumann
Piano solo (a) "Ricordanza".....Liszt
(b) "Toccata de Concerto".....Dupont
"Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung").....Wagner

A rather dull programme, on the whole, as all but one of the present course have been, but capably performed by the orchestra, which has never done better work than it is now doing. Anything more wearisome to sit through than the long and dry Schumann symphony can hardly be discovered. The scherzo and the finale are about all that one can derive any pleasure or instruction from, and the thought of their beauties is almost lost at times in the remembrance of the noisy first movement and the uninspired and uninspiring adagio. The symphony could not have been better played, however, than it was upon this occasion, and the same remark may apply to the bright overture and the Wagner selection. The soloist of the evening was Madame Madeline Schiller, who received a most enthusiastic greeting from the audience. Her playing of the concerto was very fine from a technical point of view, brilliant, confident and exact in nearly all respects, but it seemed to lack expressiveness or feeling, and was a cold-blooded and deliberate effort. The Liszt selection was interesting only for the extraordinary skill with which it was given, and in the Dupont toccata aroused the audience to wild enthusiasm by a remarkable example of bravura playing. At the next concert Mendelssohn's "Athalia" overture, a Scene and Aria from Spohr's "Faust," Beethoven's E flat symphony, a romance for cello by Meuller-Berghaus, a group of songs with piano, and Boieldieu's "Caliph of Bagdad" overture, will be performed, Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. W. Mueller being the soloists.

Journal

MUSIC. Conner

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night opened with the formal but melodious overture to "Jessonda," by Spohr, given with as good effect as the composition allowed. The difference between this selection and the rest of the concert was most marked, for the Schumann E-flat symphony is in the modern school, and the "Song of the Rhine daughters," from Wagner's "Götter-daemmerung," is in that of the future. We can again compliment Mr. Henschel on a good reading, and the orchestra on a good performance. The Wagnerian selection was given in a manner that brought out its dramatic effect and vivid changes of emotion. The Schumann Symphony, the last in chronological order of the composer's great orchestral works, exhibits some traces of the decay which was seizing upon his mind at this time—it was written in 1850—and although it attempts to give a true picture of Cologne, it was received coolly in that city on its first productions. Its two great movements, are the Scherzo, a reminiscence of Rhine life in tones, and the majestic fourth movement which pictures a great religious ceremony in the Cologne Cathedral. As in all Schuman's larger works, there is no attempt made to photograph the scenes. Impressions rather than portraits are what this subjective writer deals with, but even these are far more vague than in the noble B flat symphony, or even that in D minor. But, even if it be not the greatest of Schumann's works, it is still a great composition, and spite of its five movements, has no trace of monotony or tameness. The performance, as intimated, was a good one, the chief flaw being a degree of timidity in the horns, (who, by the way, did good work in the difficult Wagner number) where a few breaks were apparent.

Madame Schiller was the pianist of the occasion. Her playing of Chopin's F minor concertos was full of vivid contrasts, too vivid at times, and displayed a technique before which difficulties vanished. Her work in Liszt's "Ricordanza" was exasperating. That a pianist with so much intellect and such a superior method should reduce a work of this kind to a mere etude of wrist action, a display of accented notes, is to be deplored. In the "Toccata," however, she was fully at home, and, save in the trio, gave a bravura rendering that aroused the audience to wild enthusiasm.

MUSICAL. Gardner

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. A crisp, broad and spirited performance of Spohr's brilliant and always delightful "Jessonda" overture opened the programme. It was followed by Chopin's concerto for piano, No. 2, in F minor, which was played by Madame Madeline Schiller, who was welcomed with sincere pleasure and the utmost heartiness. It need hardly be added that her performance of the work was characterized by the most exquisite finish, brilliancy, delicacy and clearness in every technical essential. The polish throughout was of the highest; the trills were marvellously close and even, and perfect in their rounding off; the runs were almost velvety in their smoothness, and there was not a bar to which full justice was not done by the astonishingly facile and powerful fingers of the artist. With Madame Schiller's reading of the work we were not so well pleased, though it was doubtless self-consistent. Her rubato playing was over-affected and rarely in time. In other words, what was robbed from one part of a bar was not restored, and this fault was so persistent that it greatly marred all effect of rhythm where it was indulged. The sentimental portions of the work were given in a somewhat cold and deliberate way, and were chiefly interpreted through a retarded tempo, which means nothing in itself. The Larghetto was taken at a pace much slower than we ever heard it played in before, and its proper flow and effect were injured thereby, with a result that was almost wearisome. The finale was given with uncommon sweep and vitality, and with a fluent brilliancy and clearness that were delightful. At the end of the concerto the artist was rapturously recalled. The orchestral accompaniment to the work was admirable in every way. Later in the evening Madame Schiller played Liszt's insipid apotheosis of flourish and delicate finger fireworks, and a trashy but showy concerto by Dupont. In both these her beautiful and masterly technique was displayed to the fullest advantage. She was again recalled in the most enthusiastic manner. In her way Madame Schiller is really a remarkable artist. If there were only more true warmth and expressiveness in her style! The symphony was the noisy and generally uninteresting one by Schumann in E flat, op. 97. The lovely scherzo and the finale will always be listened to with pleasure. Not so the boisterous opening and the dry and ugly adagio that precedes the last movement. The work was read and performed in a manner that may be praised without qualification. The whole ended with the song of the Rhine Daughters, from Wagner's "Götterdaemmerung," which is the twin brother to a dozen Wagner pieces which have found places on our concert programmes. It tells a brief and familiar story over and over again, in a prolix and equally familiar manner; but it has a certain suave charm of melody in its quieter moments that cannot be resisted. Here again the orchestra acquitted itself admirably. Mendelssohn's "Athalia" overture, a Scene and Aria from Spohr's "Faust," Beethoven's E flat symphony, a romance for 'cello by Mueller-Berg-haus a group of songs with piano, and Boieldieu's "Caliph of Bagdad" overture, will be performed. Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. W. Mueller are to be the soloists.

The seventh symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday night, with Madame Madeline Schiller as the piano soloist. The programme was made up of Spohr's overture to "Jessonda"; Chopin's concerto for piano in F minor, No. 2, op. 31; Schumann's Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97; piano solos of Liszt and Dupont; and Wagner's Song of the Rhine Daughters (Goetterdaemmerung). The orchestra did some of its very best work on Saturday evening; in fact, worked wonders with a cold and uninspiring programme. It would almost seem that so far nearly all the programmes have been selected with a view mainly to their general dullness, and in this respect they have, to say the least, been fairly successful. The audience needs a lighter class of music than dreary symphonies which contain so much that few can understand and fewer less care for; and the management would find it for their benefit financially, while the enjoyment of the audience would be greatly enhanced, to work a reformation in this respect. Thus there were but two movements of the symphony—the scherzo and the finale—which afforded some considerable amount of enjoyment, while the other three movements were provocative only of yawns. The brightest spot of the evening was the piano playing of Mme. Schiller, who was very warmly received by the audience, but yet she did not play with that exquisite brilliancy that has been noticeable on other occasions. While her work lacked life and feeling in a strong degree, she was yet, however, perfectly artistic and the accomplished instrumentalist. The eighth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Miss Gertrude Franklin, the soprano, and Mr. Wilhelm Mueller, 'celloist, are to be the soloists, and the following is announced as the programme: Mendelssohn's "Athalia" overture; a

SATURDAY'S AMUSEMENTS.

Seventh Programme of the Symphony Concert Series.

The seventh programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening the soloist being Mme. Madeline Schiller, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2, op. 21.....Chopin
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.....Schumann
Piano solo (a) "Ricordanza".....Liszt
(b) Toccata de Concert.....Dupont
"Song of the Rhine Daughters" ("Goetterdaemmerung").....Wagner

Another heavy programme with a few enjoyable features. The popularity of Mme. Schiller apparently increased the attendance somewhat, and the lady was greeted with a very kindly round of applause. It seemed as if this talented artist was not at her best in some way, as her playing lacked the vitality which it usually has, and there was a constant feeling that the effort of the evening was more than Mme. Schiller's strength warranted. The dainty beauty of the larghetto movement of the concerto displayed her merits as a pianist best, but in the opening and closing movements of this work there were many evidences of a lack of sufficient strength to meet the full demands of the score as Mme. Schiller has done in former years. Her solo numbers gave more general satisfaction and enthusiastic recalls rewarded each of this artist's efforts. It is difficult to understand why all symphonies selected for these programmes should be presented in their entirety, whatever the merits of the several movements may be. In that of last evening, for instance, the second and third movements included all of the composer's ideas worth giving a second thought to, and yet the audience was not only compelled to listen to the other three movements, but to exercise its brains the meanwhile in puzzling over the German designations of the several parts when good English words would have made all clear without difficulty. The exquisite beauty of the two enjoyable movements largely compensated for the weariness caused by the balance of the work, but the concert was unnecessarily lengthened without perceptible gain by giving the composition entire. The limited amount of meritorious work in the Spohr overture was given with excellent effect, and indeed the presentation of the programme, as a whole, was admirable. The Wagner selection gave the harpist of the orchestra his stated opportunity, but his contribution to the general noise of this number was well nigh obscured by that of his fellow players. If, now, Mme. Schiller could have been heard in some solos and have played something with Mr. Freygang the harpist, the two movements of the symphony alone given, some bright overture played to open with, some ballet music in place of the uninteresting portion of the symphony, and a march or waltz on the programme, would not the general result of the concert have been more satisfactory to the audience?

Musical.

THE SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Owing to the stupidity shown in the arrangement of the programme, Mme. Schiller's selections excepted, the seventh symphony concert met its deserved fate and encountered a cold reception from the audience. The symphony was Schumann's in E flat, a work which the composer himself never thought highly of, and which is also no novelty here. The scherzo movement and the one marked feirlich are about the best specimens of mastery that the work contains, but neither of these movements is remarkably musical. There is some charming counterpoint in the scherzo, and when, as here, this style of writing seems inspired, and is not simply the result of calculation, one is strikingly reminded of the only justification for its use except by students. In the feirlich movement the music is labored and dreary in effect, a canto fermo being used that is almost entirely obscured by the intricacy of an accompanying net-work of themes. Mme. Schiller's performance of the Chopin E minor concerto was as skilled and refined an exhibition of pianoforte mechanism or of the toned beauty of the instrument as could have been desired; it was note-perfect to a fault. It also seemed so conspicuous as a conscientiously pains-taking performance, that if there were any true Chopin-esque sentiment associated with it, it could only have been experienced by the personal friends and admirers of the performer. The exquisite art shown in the mastery of the numerous technical difficulties in which the work abounds, merits a very warm acknowledgment; every sustained note received a well-considered, indeed a most artistic attention; and the intricate groups of notes so characteristic of the composer's pen, were each in turn presented with exquisite taste and delicacy. But the work was conceived as though a mathematical problem, or one of Bach's fugues, were being solved. The hearer was prevented from experiencing the sentiment of Chopin's music, by what seemed to be on the pianist's part, a too serious effort to impel its appearance. Exactly what sort of a piano composition Liszt's "Ricordanza" really is we could not determine from the performance that was given it. Again Mme. Schiller impressed us by a marvellous command of the key-board at an expense of any nobility that may have been associated with the music she rendered. The experience afforded by her rendering of the Dupont toccata was such as to make a really beautiful and masterly composition seem trivial, by perverting its rhythm and otherwise sacrificing it, to the most rapid and facile active playing that has probably ever been heard in Boston. The remainder of the concert left no particular impression worthy the record.

THE MUSICAL OBSERVER.

The Symphony Concert.

The work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now well advanced in its third season, shows a great improvement on that of the two preceding winters. The nucleus of the orchestra remaining the same, with the same violinist occupying the responsible position of chef d'attaque, and new material having been sparingly added and judiciously dispersed among the original players, the result could hardly fail to be a gain at least in technical uniformity and character. And such is the fact; the sweep and swing of the passages are given with real ensemble of idea and execution, while the solo passages are generally delivered with confidence and individuality. The conductor, too, shows that he has profited by his experience and by the observations of his critics, who have certainly never erred through silence towards him. He has quietly put aside fanciful arrangements of his players, has almost entirely freed himself from the faults of reading for which he was most censured, and without losing anything of his control or of his contagious animation, has shown through his orchestra discretion, taste and feeling. When, therefore, the concerts of the present series are open to criticism, it will generally be, in all probability, on account of some lack of judgment in the composition of the programmes, or because of the inequality or insufficiency of the solo performers.

That Mr. Henschel's very breadth and learning as a many-sided musician may lead him astray in respect to his selections, more than one Saturday evening has shown, and the concert of November 24—the seventh in the series—may be cited as a case in point. To the student of music or the real connoisseur, Schumann's great third symphony is undoubtedly interesting and instructive; and even the less musically learned might enjoy it if it could be commented on and explained to them step by step. The only question which can be made an issue, is, whether works which are difficult of apprehension or abstruse in construction belong properly in concerts which are professedly not for the profounder few, but for the average knowledge and understanding. The gravity of a standard work or the novelty of a new one is a reason for giving it; but there may be twenty reasons against that. Of this particular symphony the scherzo is the most enjoyable movement, although its humor consists rather in quaint and unexpected forms of expression than in any real mirthfulness of mood. There are delightful passages in the opening allegro after the irregularities and syncopations of the earlier bars are passed, and the almost martial rhythm has been established. There is too a grandeur—oppressive and gloomy, it is true—about the fourth movement, whose solemnity is often ascribed to the impression made upon Schumann by some great service in the cathedral of Cologne,—whence the symphony is currently called the “Cologne.” But for all this, and in spite of any playing short of the inspired, a general audience will still find the work dull or obscure.

The smaller orchestral numbers on the programme were Spohr’s “Jessonda” overture and an arrangement of the “Rhine Daughters’ Song” from Wagner “Twilight of the Gods.” This latter did not mean much to the audience, who had no knowledge of the original, and so no associations whereby to judge and relish it. Arrangements from operatic scores require, if they are to be enjoyed for more than the noise they make, to present with unmistakable clearness first the vocality of the scenes they give, and then the support which that voicing receives from accompaniment. But with Wagner the human organ is usually only one element more in a mass of elements; and so the listener can merely get the general effect of his instrumentation without that definiteness of purpose and adaptation of means which alone can produce anything other than the mere sensuous effect upon his nervous system. The delightful overture was enhanced in remembrance because it was simple and straightforward. Clear and sweet in thought, frankly expressed, gracefully adorned with varied but not fantastic ornament,—this overture shows Spohr at his best, giving melody without elaboration and harmony without pedantry.

The solo instrument of this concert was the pianoforte, and Madame Madeline Schiller was the pianist. That the instrument under her hands displayed all its resources of sonorous power or airy lightness of rapid response or long-sustained tone,—in a word, the most complete obedience of mechanism to mind,—scarcely needs to be said. There is nothing of which a pianoforte is capable for which Madame Schiller has not a sufficiently ample and various technique. Strength she has never lacked, and she now appears able so to control that strength that its exercise shall not grate upon the ear; delicate distinctness she never lacked, and that distinctness is now so delicate that no further refinement of it is possible. But this perfect technique has thus far in Madame Schiller’s public performances always resulted in this;—that when she has finished playing one thinks first of her wonderful execution, and only afterwards of the music which she has played and of its meaning. There is often in the artistic nature something which prevents the artist from doing himself entire justice in public. Said Mr. Lang in one of his lectures:—“I don’t know whether my consciousness makes me nervous, or my nervousness makes me conscious; I only know that I am both nervous and conscious, and that it is very uncomfortable.” But if we may fairly judge Madame Schiller by what her fingers say for her, we can only characterize her playing as unfeeling and seemingly the result of a cold determination not spontaneous and not sympathetic. In the largo of the Chopin concerto,—in F minor No. 2 opus 21,—which was her principal number, and which she played slowly enough for a dirge, there were strange heavy emphases on single notes—and so again toward the end of the allegro (which she also retarded at times), which broke in irrelevantly, and disturbed the connection of thought. The meas-toso was the best of the three movements, for while the chief figures of speech were subordinated, they were not so differently valued from the essential points of the musical language as to impair their true relation in the composition. Madame Schiller also played two smaller pieces—Liszt’s “Ricordanza” and Dupont’s “Toccata de Concert.” The first has the fault already observed—that certain notes were made so prominent that they seemed to stand in isolation from all the rest, so that the fantasia had not even the thin coherence with which its author invested it. The difficulties of the execution gave way under Madame Schiller’s hand, and as mere mastery of the key-board the morceau was a triumph only less than that which she won in the other selection, which was a wonderful exhibition of Bravura playing, and was beside, warmed and animated with a fire which would glow more nobly in some better music.

The Herald is never behindhand in originality, but its notice of the Saturday Symphony concert is overflowing with that delightful quality. After expressing the difficulty which he experienced in understanding why all symphonies selected should be given in their entirety—a difficulty which would be somewhat removed perhaps if he had framed a rather clearer idea of the meaning and intention of a symphony—the writer announces with great unction the discovery that of the five numbers of the Schumann E flat Symphony “the second and third included all of the composers ideas worth giving a second thought to.” To those who are familiar with the symphony in question, and who remember the peculiar charm and grandeur of the fourth movement (marked “feierlich” by the composer) which brings back memories of the forest of columns in the nave of Cologne Cathedral, and the dim religious light of the sanctuary beyond; or the fifth and closing movement, where the hearer is carried in feeling along the shores of the sunny Rhine, with the happy band of voyagers whose songs and joyous conversation seem to grow out of its sparkling rhythm; to all, in fact who have any adequate idea of the meaning of the symphony in question, the flavor of originality in our esteemed contemporary’s remarks will be very strong indeed.

But not content with a discovery, our captious critic has furnished us with a suggestion for a new system of musical nomenclature for which we cannot be sufficiently thankful. The poor fellow was, it seems, compelled to “exercise his brains” (miserere, Domine) in puzzling over the German designation of the several parts, when good English words would have made all clear without difficulty!" The italics are ours, also the note of admiration. Fancy a symphony or indeed any musical work marked "not fast" or "after the manner of a religious ceremony". We are afraid we cannot give a prize to the Herald critic this time, though as we suggested before, he is original all the time, distinctly original.

118

Mme. Schiller 8. 2. 1883

As a matter of fact, however, we must give the poor man credit for the very best of intentions. It does seem to us distinctly better that the usual technical terms to which all musicians are accustomed (Italian for the most part, not English, dear Herald.) should be applied to the movements, in place of a less familiar nomenclature, which gains little in descriptive clearness, and loses much from the destruction of existing associations. Musicians know the difference between "andante" and "allegro," and can feel rather than express, the exact conditions of each. "Nicht schnell" and "lebhaft" may mean the same thing, but they not only give us some little exercise in order to ascertain their exact meaning, but somewhat fail to awake the train of thought conveyed by the more usual appellations. And then surely it is a gross incongruity on Mr. Henschel's part to entitle the second movement "scherzo."

The latest concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave us a programme as interesting as any that had gone before it. I do not grow enthusiastic over Schumann's "Cologne Symphony," (but let no one say that it is scarcely worth a scent), as I do over the glorious one in B flat, but it is nevertheless a great work, which has a right on the programmes of the series. It has a historic interest, too, being the last of the composer's great instrumental works, and showing, if only faintly, the beginning of his decay. It marks the Düsseldorf period of the composer's life, when he had gained his love, and the reaction which came (possibly) from his intense emotions, had begun to set in. As a picture of Rhine life it is not very graphic, although Schumann always tried to picture emotions rather than things; yet I believe his song "A Sunday On the Rhine" to give more of the Rhenish gaiety and gemüthlichkeit than even the scherzo of this symphony. If it did not appeal strongly (in its earlier performance) to the inhabitants of the banks of the Rhine, at Cologne, it is not likely to prove a graphic affair to the colder blooded inhabitants of Beacon Street, on the banks of the Charles. The work was well read and well performed, only the horns played timidly at times. They also broke in the beginning of their work in the "Song of the Rhine Maidens," from Wagner's Götterdämmerung, but subsequently did splendid work, although the responsive passages of the two horns in this are florid, when one considers the instruments. How fine this selection was I cannot explain through the post-office. It is melodious, yet full of dramatic effect and emotional contrast. When the American public becomes familiar with Wagner's latest word in the melodic vein, the second act of "Parsifal," they will appreciate the fact that he was far more than the apostle of the trombones.

Mme. Madeline Schiller was the pianist of the concert. She played Chopin's F minor concerto without any morbid sentimentality, and with a thorough appreciation of the author's intention. In Liszt's Ricordanza she seemed to be rather emphatic, but was excellent in the Toccata, by Dupont, in which her technique stood her in good stead. She is a great favorite in Boston, as the increased attendance and lavish applause plainly showed.

The coming week will not be so prolific of concerts as the past one. Even the pianists are not going to give recitals to any alarming extent; and when one thinks of the number of rising piano players in Boston's limits one ought to feel grateful that they temper the wind according to the shorn critic.

L. C. E.

122

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Athalia.) MENDELSSOHN.

SCENA AND ARIA. op. 71. SPOHR.

SYMPHONY in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai).—
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.—

ROMANCE FOR VIOLONCELLO. K. MUELLER-BERGHAUS.
(MS. First time.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.

(a) CRADLE SONG. R. WAGNER.

(b) TO CHLOE. STERNDALÉ BENNETT.

(c) FOREST WANDERINGS. GRIEG.

OVERTURE. (Le Caliphe de Bagdad.) BOIELDIEU.

SOLOISTS:

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

HERR WILHELM MUELLER.

SCENA AND ARIA. SPOHR.

RECITATIVO:

E mi lasci così? Perfido! Ingrato! Questa sperar dovea dell'amor mio mercè! Divisa ognor da quel benchè s'adora vita peggior di morte, misera condurrò. Mi fuggi, ingrato perchè omai più non posso lusingarle tue brame! Anch'io fuggirti, abborrirti dovrei lo so, lo veggio! ma fuggirti non posso e amar ti deggio.

ANDANTE:

Tu m'abbandoni ingrato, a miei sospiri al pianto, resto infelice intanto preda del mio dolor.

ALLEGRO:

Ho cento smanie al core, il mio crudel affanno, perfido Traditore la morte a me darà. Tu m'abbandoni, ingrato a miei sospiri al pianto. Tutti quest' alma amanto soffre d'amor le pene ecco qual frutto ottiene la mia semplicità.

CRADLE SONG. R. WAGNER.

Slumber, sweet child
Thou knowest no sad morrow;
Peaceful and mild,
Thy dreams have no sorrow;
Bright visions are thine,
Thou smilest while sleeping,
Thy mother is weeping,
Sleep Darling of mine.

Sleep, on the breast of thy
Mother forsaken,
Merciless Fate thy
Fond father has taken;
Now lonely I pine!
One joy still I see now,
My hope is in thee now,
Sleep, Darling of mine.

Sleep on without harm,
Secure till the morrow,
Thy angel's fond arm
Shall guard thee from sorrow;
Sweet slumbers be thine!
Laugh on in thy sleeping,
Thy watch I am keeping.

TO CHLOE. (in sickness.) STERNDALÉ BENNETT.

Long, long the night,
And heavy comes the morrow,
While my soul's delight
Is on her bed of sorrow.

Can I cease to mourn,
Can I cease to languish,
While my soul's delight
Is on her couch of anguish?

Hear me powers divine,
Oh! in pity hear me,
Take all else of mine,
But my Chloris spare me!

FOREST WANDERING. ED. GRIEG.

Thou lovely bride, thou darling one,
My treasure, my delight!
Come forth! for clear in azure sky
The moon is shining bright.

Thro' all this peaceful silent night,
Dear love, with thee to rove,
What joy is mine, what blessedness!
O fragrant beechen grove!

The night, o'er all the dreaming world
Glides by on noiseless wing,
Thro' beechen grove stray hand in hand
Where woodland blossoms spring.

Sing nightingale, shine golden moon!
No other prayer is mine,
My lovely bride, my darling one!
My treasure, my delight!

MUSICAL. Journal

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Mendelssohn's "Athalia" overture, which was broadly and impressively interpreted. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," which obtained an exceedingly fine rendering. The opening allegro was beautifully read and finely colored. The marche funebre, though perhaps taken a shade too slow, was given with admirable largeness and propriety of expression. The scherzo was scarcely less excellent in respect to delicacy and precision, the horns in the trio coming out with exceptional clearness. The finale was given somewhat unequally, and with something of cloudiness in effect at times, but the spirit imparted to its performance was both brilliant and interesting. The concert ended with Bolleldieu's naive and pretty overture, "The Caliph of Bagdad," which, despite its quaintness and its ghostly reminiscence of a past in art which can never be revived, charmed by its freshness, its simplicity and its naturalness. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. Wilhelm Mueller.

Miss Franklin sang a concert aria by Spohr which had not been heard here before. It is a highly interesting work in its kind, brilliant and melodious, and with less of the composer's mannerism and chromatic modulation than is usual with him. Now and then it is quite Mozartish in character, especially in the Larghetto. Its beauty and its strength made it well worth the unearthing. Miss Franklin, whose remarkably warm, ripe and sympathetic voice was heard at its very best, sang this work with delightful artistic intelligence, and with rare refinement of style. The opening recitative was declaimed by her with a broad dramatic force and a justness of expression wholly admirable. The delicate and charming slow movement was interpreted with exquisite taste and sensibility of feeling. The spirited and trying finale, with its difficult runs, which were given with pearly clearness and distinctness, received no less justice. As usual, Miss Franklin's intonation was immaculate, and lent a charm of its own to her trilling. Nor was anything lacking in respect to beauty of phrasing, purity of tone, easy fluency, delicacy or power. At the end the young artist was warmly applauded and recalled. Later in the evening she sang a "Cradle Song," by Wagner,—one of the daintiest and most melodious things he ever wrote,—Sterndale Bennett's tender and touching song, "To Chloe," and Grieg's crisp and airy "Forest Wanderings," in which her wide versatility and large and sweet refinement of style were fascinatingly manifested. At the end of this group, deliciously sung, Miss Franklin was again recalled with great heartiness. Decidedly we know of no one on our concert stage who surpasses Miss Franklin as a thoroughly accomplished and artistic singer, and can recall but one who is her peer. It is strange indeed that she should not be heard here oftener. Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments should not be passed by without a tribute of warm admiration for their delicacy. Mr. Mueller's contribution to the concert was a Romance for 'cello by K. Mueller-Berghaus, a work characterized by a flowing melody of rare beauty and dignity. The scoring is for the most part for 'cello, altos and bassoons, the effect of which is rich and of marked originality. Mr. Mueller played it in a broad, simple and singing manner, and with an artistically sympathetic appreciation of its warmth and tenderness. He was cordially applauded for his fine rendering of the work, and recalled. The concert proved a very interesting one from beginning to end. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; Concerto for piano-forte, G-minor, No. 2, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (which was given at the third concert for the first time here), a group of piano solos by Schumann and Chopin, and the ballet music from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." Mme. Helen Hopekirk will be the soloist, and make her first appearance in America on this occasion.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eighth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The eighth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, the soloists being Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, 'celloist. The selections were as follows:

Overture ("Athalia").....Mendelssohn
Scena and aria, op. 71.....Spohr
Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Romance for violoncello.....K. Mueller-Berghaus
Songs with piano:
(a) Cradle song.....R. Wagner
(b) To Chloe.....Sterndale Bennett
(c) Forest Wanderings.....Grieg
Overture ("Le Calife de Bagdad").....Bolleldieu

Mr. Henschel could hardly have selected a more enjoyable programme, and the merit of the performance was quite in keeping with that of the several numbers. The melodious character of all the compositions made the evening one of rare enjoyment, and the concert gave uninterrupted pleasure throughout. The symphony has never had a more satisfactory presentation than on this occasion, there being many notable improvements in the several movements as compared with last season's rendering of the same work. The beauties of the Mendelssohn and Bolleldieu overtures were made doubly enjoyable by the charming playing of the band in these numbers, and the audience arose from the entertainment with a feeling of rest and refreshment. Miss Franklin's success was one of the notable events of the evening, and it was gratifying to see how quickly her vocal merits were recognized and appreciated, as few artists make more conscientious efforts to merit public approval. Her singing of the Wagner and Grieg numbers had an artistic finish and grace in delivery which fairly captivated the listener, and there was an almost equal beauty in her rendering of the song by Bennett. The rare purity, the absolute truthfulness and the sweetness of Miss Franklin's tones in these three compositions, combined with the admirable phrasing and delivery of their measures, fully justified the enthusiasm of the audience in recalling her after her singing. The recitative of the Spohr scena was delivered with excellent taste by Miss Franklin, and in the andante and allegro Miss Franklin displayed merits of a high order, meeting the severe demands of the score with intelligence and skill. The romance for 'cello, written for Herr Wilhelm Mueller by his brother, was heard for the first time, and proved a composition of more than average merit. Its beauties would be more apparent if played by a musician of a less cold nature than the soloist of this occasion, who, however, is to be credited with his best public effort here in this number. The quality of tone produced by Herr Mueller was less objectionable than usual, but there is so little that is sympathetic in his playing that the enjoyment of his otherwise careful and conscientious work is greatly lessened.

SCENA AND ARIA. SPOHR.

RECITATIVO:

E mi lasci così? Perfido! Ingrato! Questa sperar dovea dell'amor mio mercè! Divisa ognor da quel benchè s'adora vita peggior di morte, misera condurrò. Mi fuggi, ingrato perchè omai più non posso lusingarle tue brame! Anch'io fuggirti, abborrirti dovrei loso, lo veggio! ma fuggirti non posso e amar ti deggio.

ANDANTE:

Tu m'abbandoni ingrato, a miei sospiri al pianto, resto infelice intanto preda del mio dolor.

ALLEGRO:

Ho cento smanie al core, il mio crudel affanno, perfido Traditore la morte a me darà. Tu m'abbandoni, ingrato a miei sospiri al pianto. Tutti quest' alma amante soffre d'amor le pene ecco qual frutto ottiene la mia semplicità.

CRADLE SONG. R. WAGNER.

Slumber, sweet child
Thou knowest no sad morrow;
Peaceful and mild,
Thy dreams have no sorrow;
Bright visions are thine,
Thou smilest while sleeping,
Thy mother is weeping,
Sleep Darling of mine.

Sleep, on the breast of thy
Mother forsaken,
Merciless Fate thy
Fond father has taken;
Now lonely I pine!
One joy still I see now,
My hope is in thee now,
Sleep, Darling of mine.

Sleep on without harm,
Secure till the morrow,
Thy angel's fond arm
Shall guard thee from sorrow;
Sweet slumbers be thine!
Laugh on in thy sleeping,
Thy watch I am keeping.

TO CHLOE. (in sickness.) STERNDALÉ BENNETT.

Long, long the night,
And heavy comes the morrow,
While my soul's delight
Is on her bed of sorrow.

Can I cease to mourn,
Can I cease to languish,
While my soul's delight
Is on her couch of anguish?

Hear me powers divine,
Oh! in pity hear me,
Take all else of mine,
But my Chloris spare me!

FOREST WANDERING. ED. GRIEG.

Thou lovely bride, thou darling one,
My treasure, my delight!
Come forth! for clear in azure sky
The moon is shining bright.

Thro' all this peaceful silent night,
Dear love, with thee to rove,
What joy is mine, what blessedness!
O fragrant beechen grove!

The night, o'er all the dreaming world
Glides by on noiseless wing,
Thro' beechen grove stray hand in hand
Where woodland blossoms spring.

Sing nightingale, shine golden moon!
No other prayer is mine,
My lovely bride, my darling one!
My treasure, my delight!

MUSICAL. Gardner

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Mendelssohn's "Athalia" overture, which was broadly and impressively interpreted. The symphony was Beethoven's "Eroica," which obtained an exceedingly fine rendering. The opening allegro was beautifully read and finely colored. The marche funebre, though perhaps taken a shade too slow, was given with admirable largeness and propriety of expression. The scherzo was scarcely less excellent in respect to delicacy and precision, the horns in the trio coming out with exceptional clearness. The finale was given somewhat unequally, and with something of cloudiness in effect at times, but the spirit imparted to its performance was both brilliant and interesting. The concert ended with Bolleldieu's naïve and pretty overture, "The Caliph of Bagdad," which, despite its quaintness and its ghostly reminiscence of a past in art which can never be revived, charmed by its freshness, its simplicity and its naturalness. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. Wilhelm Mueller.

Miss Franklin sang a concert aria by Spohr which had not been heard here before. It is a highly interesting work in its kind, brilliant and melodious, and with less of the composer's mannerism and chromatic modulation than is usual with him. Now and then it is quite Mozartish in character, especially in the Larghetto. Its beauty and its strength made it well worth the unearthly. Miss Franklin, whose remarkably warm, ripe and sympathetic voice was heard at its very best, sang this work with delightful artistic intelligence, and with rare refinement of style. The opening recitative was declaimed by her with a broad dramatic force and a justness of expression wholly admirable. The delicate and charming slow movement was interpreted with exquisite taste and sensibility of feeling. The spirited and trying finale, with its difficult runs, which were given with pearly clearness and distinctness, received no less justice. As usual, Miss Franklin's intonation was immaculate, and lent a charm of its own to her trilling. Nor was anything lacking in respect to beauty of phrasing, purity of tone, easy fluency, delicacy or power. At the end the young artist was warmly applauded and recalled. Later in the evening she sang a "Cradle Song," by Wagner,—one of the daintiest and most melodious things he ever wrote,—Sterndale Bennett's tender and touching song, "To Chloris," and Grieg's crisp and airy "Forest Wanderings," in which her wide versatility and large and sweet refinement of style were fascinatingly manifested. At the end of this group, deliciously sung, Miss Franklin was again recalled with great heartiness. Decidedly we know of no one on our concert stage who surpasses Miss Franklin as a thoroughly accomplished and artistic singer, and can recall but one who's her peer. It is strange indeed that she should not be heard here oftener. Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments should not be passed by without a tribute of warm admiration for their delicacy. Mr. Mueller's contribution to the concert was a Romance for cello by K. Mueller-Berghaus, a work characterized by a flowing melody of rare beauty and dignity. The scoring is for the most part for cello, altos and bassoons, the effect of which is rich and of marked originality. Mr. Mueller played it in a broad, simple and singing manner, and with an artistically sympathetic appreciation of its warmth and tenderness. He was cordially applauded for his fine rendering of the work, and recalled. The concert proved a very interesting one from beginning to end. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; Concerto for piano-forte, G-minor, No. 2, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (which was given at the third concert for the first time here), a group of piano solos by Schumann and Chopin, and the ballet music from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." Mme. Helen Hopekirk will be the soloist, and make her first appearance in America on this occasion.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eighth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The eighth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening, the soloists being Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, cellist. The selections were as follows:

Overture ("Athalia").....Mendelssohn
Scena and aria, op. 71.....Spohr
Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Romance for violoncello.....K. Mueller-Berghaus
Songs with piano:
(a) Cradle song.....R. Wagner
(b) To Chloris.....Sterndale Bennett
(c) Forest Wanderings.....Grieg
Overture ("Le Calife de Bagdad").....Bolleldieu

Mr. Henschel could hardly have selected a more enjoyable programme, and the merit of the performance was quite in keeping with that of the several numbers. The melodious character of all the compositions made the evening one of rare enjoyment, and the concert gave uninterrupted pleasure throughout. The symphony has never had a more satisfactory presentation than on this occasion, there being many notable improvements in the several movements as compared with last season's rendering of the same work. The beauties of the Mendelssohn and Bolleldieu overtures were made doubly enjoyable by the charming playing of the band in these numbers, and the audience arose from the entertainment with a feeling of rest and refreshment. Miss Franklin's success was one of the notable events of the evening, and it was gratifying to see how quickly her vocal merits were recognized and appreciated, as few artists make more conscientious efforts to merit public approval. Her staging of the Wagner and Grieg numbers had an artistic finish and grace in delivery which fairly captivated the listener, and there was an almost equal beauty in her rendering of the song by Bennett. The rare purity, the absolute truthness and the sweetness of Miss Franklin's tones in these three compositions, combined with the admirable phrasing and delivery of their measures, fully justified the enthusiasm of the audience in recalling her after her singing. The recitative of the Spohr scena was delivered with excellent taste by Miss Franklin, and in the andante and allegro Miss Franklin displayed merits of a high order, meeting the severe demands of the score with intelligence and skill. The romance for cello, written for Herr Wilhelm Mueller by his brother, was heard for the first time, and proved a composition of more than average merit. Its beauties would be more apparent if played by a musician of a less cold nature than the soloist of this occasion, who, however, is to be credited with his best public effort here in this number. The quality of tone produced by Herr Mueller was less objectionable than usual, but there is so little that is sympathetic in his playing that the enjoyment of his otherwise careful and conscientious work is greatly lessened.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night was largely composed of what Matthew Arnold might call "sweetness and light." Miss Franklin's selections constituted the sweetness, and the overture to the "Caliph of Bagdad" was decidedly "light." Possibly the latter work was given in response to the wishes of a few very capatious ones, that the programmes might be made less classical in character. If this be the case we cannot congratulate the public on the change, for the rapid measures of Boieldieu's composition came with a most jarring effect after the noble thoughts of the Heroic Symphony. These clamorers for lighter music are chiefly frightened by mere names. To them even Beethoven's Eighth or Haydn's Military Symphony would seem heavy, simply because they fall in the domain of classical music. In fact, with the exception of the first concert, we doubt whether any large amount of the music given this year could be called abstruse or unintelligible.

It is difficult to speak anew of the Beethoven Symphonies on this, their third repetition in regular order, at these concerts. As the second symphony shows us Beethoven breaking the shackles of formalism, by a bolder treatment and the establishment of the scherzo, so this work reveals him to us for the first time absolutely free. The third symphony, in its portrayal of a definite subject—the character of a great hero—opened the way for the sixth, which gave a portrait of definite objects (although Beethoven explicitly denied this at first and stated that it was simply a record of emotions), and this latter opened the way for the entire list of modern programme-music. In this respect the work may stand in chronological order, as it stands first in the originality and beauty of its subjects and their treatment. It marks the commencement of Beethoven's second period, when intellectuality and emotion had already obtained that poise and balance which made the symphonies the masterpieces of the world.

Regarding the performance there is not much to be said already last season the reading given by Mr. Henschel was a step forward from the distortion and irregularity which marked the first performance. The faults of last evening were even fewer than at the last performance. The first movement was taken a little too slow, and the flutes, oboes and clarinets were somewhat slow in their attack of phrases in this portion of the work. The horns were very sure in this part, and also in the wonderful passage in the trio of the scherzo. The cellos did excellently in their very important work of the first movement. The reading of the "Funeral March" was the best Mr. Henschel has yet given. It was broad and noble, not mawkish and over sentimental. The flute and clarinet deserve mention for their excellence in the florid embellishments of the finale. There was a degree of roughness in the first part of the scherzo, in the sforzandi of the strings, and in the tutti. But on the whole the symphony was very effectively rendered.

Mr. Mueller achieved a great success in a "Romanza," a new composition by his brother. His instrument seemed light in tone, but his legato playing, his refined shading, and his freedom from all scratchiness made the rather sentimental piece a welcome number.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang with more artistic effect than we had ever given her credit for. Her songs were chosen with admirable taste, and pleased musician and non-musician alike. In the Spohr aria her broad and powerful voice made an excellent effect. The floriture were given with clearness and flexibility, the trill was free from blur, and only in the chromatic passages was there anything to criticize. Her three songs with accompaniment were given with exquisite taste, especially the Wagnerian slumber song, a bit of beautiful melody, which dates we believe from the Parisian epoch of the composer's existence. We must also commend the daintiness shown in Grieg's graceful "Waldwanderung."

Only the commonplaces of the final, Boieldieu overture, were uninteresting. The chief motive seems to have anticipated the noble melody of "I am the Captain of the Pinafore," by a few generations, and the whole thing compares unfavorably with the pleasant and dashing style of light overtures of Auber or Lortzing.

Notes. Franklin

The eighth of the Symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, and it was certainly the most enjoyable of the series this year. The programme was made up of the Overture ("Athalia"), Mendelssohn; Scene and aria, op. 71, Spohr; Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; Romance for violoncello, K. Mueller-Berghaus; Songs with piano: (a) Cradle song, R. Wagner; (b) To Chloe, Sterndale Bennett; (c) Forest Wanderings, Grieg; Overture, ("Le Caliphe de Bagdad"), Boieldieu. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, 'cellist. The orchestra were in capital condition throughout, and Mr. Henschel held them so well in hand that they played with a precision perhaps never surpassed before. The selections were of the most delightful description, full of melodious harmony, and consequently the more agreeable on that account. It is doubtful if the symphony was ever better played in this city—it may be not so well, and the conclusion of each movement was a signal for the heartiest applause. And so it was with the two overtures. Both are very pleasing, both were skillfully handled, and gave every satisfaction to the audience. Miss Gertrude Franklin in her songs created something of a furor, and met with undeniable success. Her sweet and pure voice was heard to great advantage in each of her three selections, and the artistic finish, the truthfulness and certainty of her tones, and the brilliancy of her execution, won for her much and deserved applause. The three compositions were widely different in their characteristics, but Miss Franklin rendered full justice to them all, and her recall at the close was well merited. Herr Mueller's performance of the romance for the violoncello was a noble one, showing breadth of style, and eliciting the most delicate tones from the instrument. The composition itself, which was heard for the first time here, was a scholarly work, made up of many beauties. Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments were, as is usual with that gentleman, graceful and effective in the extreme. The ninth concert is to be given on Saturday night next. The Dvorak symphony will be repeated, Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, and Gounod's "Queen of Saba" ballet music will be played, and Mme. Helen Hopekirk will make her debut in America, playing Saint-Saëns's second pianoforte concerto, and smaller pieces by Schumann and Chopin.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance on Saturday evening, under Mr. Henschel's baton, of Beethoven's third symphony—the "Eroica"—was a splendid success in all but one or two particulars, of which we shall speak in a moment. The close relationship which has always held together the conductor and the members of this orchestra is never so apparent as in such work as this, where the intrusion of one single player's individuality may subvert a director's purpose and break the consistency of its expression. Throughout the whole symphony complete concord was maintained, and a hundred minor shades of expression and gradations of force were so nicely rendered that they seemed almost to come of themselves. The piano playing was remarkably good for its elasticity and delicate emphasis. The tutti were full without harshness, and the obbligati were distinct without obtrusiveness—notably the horn passages in the scherzo, which are usually wrapped in dull and cloudy obscurity. But we must take issue with Mr. Henschel in regard to two tempi, premising, however, that in one of them his intention was probably less at fault than his feeling, modified by the sound of the music he was leading. In the Breitkopf and Härtel edition of the score, the time assigned to the Marcia funebre is eighty beats to the minute, whereas Mr. Henschel conducted the movement at only sixty. Not a vast variation, after all, and yet enough, we hold, not only to drag out the number some minutes beyond its allotted time, but also to lower the plane of its feeling. In its true time the march is, really, for a hero's obsequies, solemn and sad, and yet grand and triumphant, as though rather conducting his spirit towards its apotheosis than bearing his body to its tomb. The sadness is of a nation or a world bereft; but it must not dim his glory. Play it more slowly, and the element of woe becomes predominant, and only a dirge of domestic grief is heard,—the lamentations of a household, whose own present loss outweighs all future renown and past achievement, as they prepare to put away the beloved face from their sight. And so, instead of elevating and inspiring, the movement must depress the listeners, as it evidently did on this occasion. The other exception we noted relates to the first movement—the allegro con brio—in which the time was considerably relaxed after a few pages, although caught vigorously up again toward the close—an inequality of a sort toward which Mr. Henschel seems involuntarily to lean.

When the last number of the programme was reached, how many in the audience must have gone back in memory to the days of their early dramatic delights when old Tom Comer's orchestra prepared the way for some wonder of the Museum stage by playing the "Caliph of Bagdad" overture! For there was the same old overture again, only with a variety and vitality which that little group of eight or nine players could not even hint at. Slight and thin as Boieldieu's music is, it has a sparkle and is full of glee, and the orchestra played it with real élan as well as grace. The opening overture—a thorough contrast, being Mendelssohn's "Athalia," with its full, sonorous chords—was also played in right perception of its style and spirit.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang most beautifully Wagner's "Cradle Song," which is, for him, a miracle of pure melody; Sterndale Bennett's simply pathetic "To Chloe in Sickness," and Grieg's "Forest Wanderings," in which the buoyant joy of happy love is so perfectly expressed in strains that are irrepressibly gay and yet tenderly caressing. Beauty of tone, symmetry of phrase, and grace of expression were in these songs as Miss Franklin sang them—giving the first in some sweet unknown tongue, from a far Pacific isle, no doubt, whose gently flowing vowels admit no consonants rudely to sunder them. Beside these songs she also sang Spohr's scene and air, E mi lasci così? which expresses the grief and despairing love of Gretchen after Faust's desertion. But this was less well done, although the recitative was strongly phrased and the andante smoothly given. The scene seemed, as a whole, to be just a little beyond Miss Franklin at present; to use a common phrase, it appeared not to "come easy" to her, and the difficult allegro was not clear in execution. Mr. Müller, first violoncellist of the orchestra, also contributed a solo number, which was a slow and noble romance, written by his brother, and arranged with string accompaniment by Berghaus. Mr. Müller played with rich, large tone, and calm gravity of style. Mr. Henschel's pianoforte accompaniments were, as usual, perfect.

At the next concert the Dvorak symphony will be repeated, Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, and Gounod's "Queen of Saba" ballet music will be played, and Mme. Helen Hopekirk will make her debut in America, playing Saint-Saëns's second pianoforte concerto, and smaller pieces by Schumann and Chopin.

Although not in accordance with rule or custom, we must acknowledge the graceful attention of a couple of anonymous correspondents who manifest a quite undeserved anxiety over our assumed ignorance of rudimentary German, as shown in a self-contradictory line in the notice of the seventh symphony concert. We may say that the apparent error is attributable to the omission of a line of MS. in transcribing the "copy" of that notice, and that the sentence should have read,—"more feterlich or solemne, and still more feurig or con fuoco," etc.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eighth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening with the following programme:

Overture to "Athalia".....Mendelssohn
Scene and air from "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
Romance for 'cello.....Mueller-Berghaus
Songs with pianoforte—
a. Cradle Song.....Wagner
b. To Chloe.....Bennett
c. Forest Wanderings.....Grieg
Overture to "Le Caliphe de Bagdad".....Boieldieu
Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Mr. Wilhelm Müller the 'cellist.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night was largely composed of what Matthew Arnold might call "sweetness and light." Miss Franklin's selections constituted the sweetness, and the overture to the "Caliph of Bagdad" was decidedly "light." Possibly the latter work was given in response to the wishes of a few very capatious ones, that the programmes might be made less classical in character. If this be the case we cannot congratulate the public on the change, for the rapid measures of Boieldieu's composition came with a most jarring effect after the noble thoughts of the Heroic Symphony. These clamorers for lighter music are chiefly frightened by mere names. To them even Beethoven's Eighth or Haydn's Military Symphony would seem heavy, simply because they fall in the domain of classical music. In fact, with the exception of the first concert, we doubt whether any large amount of the music given this year could be called abstruse or unintelligible.

It is difficult to speak anew of the Beethoven Symphonies on this, their third repetition in regular order, at these concerts. As the second symphony shows us Beethoven breaking the shackles of formalism, by a bolder treatment and the establishment of the scherzo, so this work reveals him to us for the first time absolutely free. The third symphony, in its portrayal of a definite subject—the character of a great hero—opened the way for the sixth, which gave a portrait of definite objects (although Beethoven explicitly denied this at first and stated that it was simply a record of emotions), and this latter opened the way for the entire list of modern programme-music. In this respect the work may stand in chronological order, as it stands first in the originality and beauty of its subjects and their treatment. It marks the commencement of Beethoven's second period, when intellectuality and emotion had already obtained that poise and balance which made the symphonies the masterpieces of the world.

Regarding the performance there is not much to be said already last season the reading given by Mr. Henschel was a step forward from the distortion and irregularity which marked the first performance. The faults of last evening were even fewer than at the last performance. The first movement was taken a little too slow, and the flutes, oboes and clarinets were somewhat slow in their attack of phrases in this portion of the work. The horns were very sure in this part, and also in the wonderful passage in the trio of the scherzo. The cellos did excellently in their very important work of the first movement. The reading of the "Funeral March" was the best Mr. Henschel has yet given. It was broad and noble, not mawkish and over sentimental. The flute and clarinet deserve mention for their excellence in the florid embellishments of the finale. There was a degree of roughness in the first part of the scherzo, in the sforzandi of the strings, and in the tutti. But on the whole the symphony was very effectively rendered.

Mr. Mueller achieved a great success in a "Romanza," a new composition by his brother. His instrument seemed light in tone, but his legato playing, his refined shading, and his freedom from all scratchiness made the rather sentimental piece a welcome number.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang, with more artistic effect than we had ever given her credit for. Her songs were chosen with admirable taste, and pleased musician and non-musician alike. In the Spohr aria her broad and powerful voice made an excellent effect. The floriture were given with clearness and flexibility, the trill was free from blur, and only in the chromatic passages was there anything to criticize. Her three songs with accompaniment were given with exquisite taste, especially the Wagnerian slumber song, a bit of beautiful melody, which dates we believe from the Parisian epoch of the composer's existence. We must also commend the daintiness shown in Grieg's graceful "Waldwanderung."

Only the commonplaces of the final, Boieldieu overture, were uninteresting. The chief motive seems to have anticipated the noble melody of "I am the Captain of the Pinafore," by a few generations, and the whole thing compares unfavorably with the pleasant and dashing style of light overtures of Auber or Lortzing.

Notes. Journal

The eighth of the Symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, and it was certainly the most enjoyable of the series this year. The programme was made up of the Overture ("Athalia"), Mendelssohn; Scene and aria, op. 71, Spohr; Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; Romance for violoncello, K. Mueller-Berghaus; Songs with piano: (a) Cradle song, R. Wagner; (b) To Chloe, Sterndale Bennett; (c) Forest Wanderings, Grieg; Overture, ("Le Caliphe de Bagdad"), Boieldieu. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, cellist. The orchestra were in capital condition throughout, and Mr. Henschel held them so well in hand that they played with a precision perhaps never surpassed before. The selections were of the most delightful description, full of melodious harmony, and consequently the more agreeable on that account. It is doubtful if the symphony was ever better played in this city—it may be not so well, and the conclusion of each movement was a signal for the heartiest applause. And so it was with the two overtures. Both are very pleasing, both were skillfully handled, and gave every satisfaction to the audience. Miss Gertrude Franklin in her songs created something of a furor, and met with undeniable success. Her sweet and pure voice was heard to great advantage in each of her three selections, and the artistic finish, the truthfulness and certainty of her tones, and the brilliancy of her execution, won for her much and deserved applause. The three compositions were widely different in their characteristics, but Miss Franklin rendered full justice to them all, and her recall at the close was well merited. Herr Mueller's performance of the romance for the violoncello was a noble one, showing breadth of style, and eliciting the most delicate tones from the instrument. The composition itself, which was heard for the first time here, was a scholarly work, made up of many beauties. Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments were, as is usual with that gentleman, graceful and effective in the extreme. The ninth concert is to be given on Saturday night next. The Dvorak symphony will be repeated, Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, and Gounod's "Queen of Saba" ballet music will be played, and Mme. Helen Hopekirk will make her debut in America, playing Saint-Saën's second pianoforte concerto, and smaller pieces by Schumann and Chopin.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance on Saturday evening, under Mr. Henschel's baton, of Beethoven's third symphony—the "Eroica"—was a splendid success in all but one or two particulars, of which we shall speak in a moment. The close relationship which has always held together the conductor and the members of this orchestra is never so apparent as in such work as this, where the intrusion of one single player's individuality may subvert a director's purpose and break the consistency of its expression. Throughout the whole symphony complete concord was maintained, and a hundred minor shades of expression and gradations of force were so nicely rendered that they seemed almost to come of themselves. The piano playing was remarkably good for its elasticity and delicate emphasis. The tutti were full without harshness, and the obbligati were distinct without obtrusiveness—notably the horn passages in the scherzo, which are usually wrapped in dull and cloudy obscurity. But we must take issue with Mr. Henschel in regard to two tempi, premising, however, that in one of them his intention was probably less at fault than his feeling, modified by the sound of the music he was leading. In the Breitkopf and Härtel edition of the score, the time assigned to the Mareia funebre is eighty beats to the minute, whereas Mr. Henschel conducted the movement at only sixty. Not a vast variation, after all, and yet enough, we hold, not only to drag out the number some minutes beyond its allotted time, but also to lower the plane of its feeling. In its true time the march is, really, for a hero's obsequies, solemn and sad, and yet grand and triumphant, as though rather conducting his spirit towards its apotheosis than bearing his body to its tomb. The sadness is of a nation or a world bereft; but it must not dim his glory. Play it more slowly, and the element of woe becomes predominant, and only a dirge of domestic grief is heard,—the lamentations of a household, whose own present loss outweighs all future renown and past achievement, as they prepare to put away the beloved face from their sight. And so, instead of elevating and inspiring, the movement must depress the listeners, as it evidently did on this occasion. The other exception we noted relates to the first movement—the allegro con brio—in which the time was considerably relaxed after a few pages, although caught vigorously up again toward the close—an inequality of a sort toward which Mr. Henschel seems involuntarily to lean.

When the last number of the programme was reached, how many in the audience must have gone back in memory to the days of their early dramatic delights when old Tom Comer's orchestra prepared the way for some wonder of the Museum stage by playing the "Caliph of Bagdad" overture! For there was the same old overture again, only with a variety and vitality which that little group of eight or nine players could not even hint at. Slight and thin as Boieldieu's music is, it has a sparkle and is full of glee, and the orchestra played it with real elan as well as grace. The opening overture—a thorough contrast, being Mendelssohn's "Athalia," with its full, sonorous chords—was also played in right perception of its style and spirit.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang most beautifully Wagner's "Cradle Song," which is, for him, a miracle of pure melody; Sterndale Bennett's simply pathetic "To Chloe in Sickness," and Grieg's "Forest Wanderings," in which the buoyant joy of happy love is so perfectly expressed in strains that are irrepressibly gay and yet tenderly caressing. Beauty of tone, symmetry of phrase, and grace of expression were in these songs as Miss Franklin sang them—giving the first in some sweet unknown tongue, from a far Pacific isle, no doubt, whose gently flowing vowels admit no consonants rudely to sunder them. Beside these songs she also sang Spohr's scene and air, E mi lasci così? which expresses the grief and despairing love of Gretchen after Faust's desertion. But this was less well done, although the recitative was strongly phrased and the andante smoothly given. The scene seemed, as a whole, to be just a little beyond Miss Franklin at present; to use a common phrase, it appeared not to "come easy" to her, and the difficult allegro was not clear in execution. Mr. Müller, first violoncellist of the orchestra, also contributed a solo number, which was a slow and noble romance, written by his brother, and arranged with string accompaniment by Berghaus. Mr. Müller played with rich, large tone, and calm gravity of style. Mr. Henschel's pianoforte accompaniments were, as usual, perfect.

At the next concert the Dvorak symphony will be repeated, Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, and Gounod's "Queen of Saba" ballet music will be played, and Mme. Helen Hopekirk will make her debut in America, playing Saint-Saën's second pianoforte concerto, and smaller pieces by Schumann and Chopin.

Although not in accordance with rule or custom, we must acknowledge the graceful attention of a couple of anonymous correspondents who manifest a quite undeserved anxiety over our assumed ignorance of rudimentary German, as shown in a self-contradictory line in the notice of the seventh symphony concert. We may say that the apparent error is attributable to the omission of a line of MS. in transcribing the "copy" of that notice, and that the sentence should have read,—"more feierlich or solemn, and still more feurig or con fuoco," etc.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1883.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eighth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening with the following programme:

Overture to "Athalia".....Mendelssohn
Scene and air from "Faust".....Spohr
Symphony in E flat, No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
Romance for 'cello.....Müller-Berghaus
Songs with pianoforte—

a. Cradle Song.....Wagner
b. To Chloe.....Bennett
c. Forest Wanderings.....Grieg
Overture to "Le Caliphe de Bagdad".....Boieldieu

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer, and Mr. Wilhelm Müller the cellist.

Mr. Henschel still adheres to his admirable plan of playing the nine Beethoven symphonies through in chronological order every winter. That he can do this without unduly neglecting other great classic or modern symphonies is perhaps the best of the few good results that come from giving so long a course of concerts with a single subscription list. The interest which attaches to these symphonies, so given, today is not wholly confined to their intrinsic musical character, nor to the opportunities such a presentation of them affords for careful study of the gradual evolution of the composer's genius and style. It is interesting to note their effect upon the public, as compared with the effect produced by more modern works; and especially to note what influence the bearing of modern works has upon the enjoyableness of these symphonies, and vice versa. No doubt a considerable portion of the public is so exclusively filled with the musical spirit of the present day that finds these symphonies, notably the earlier ones, disappointing to the demands which they are impelled to make upon music. The absolute beauty of construction does not make up to such persons for the lack of certain qualities which they think to find more patently present in more modern works. Again, there are probably some few music lovers to whom the perfection of construction in the Beethoven symphonies appeals so strongly that they feel like rejecting Brahms, Dvorak and the modern lights in general as turbulent, disorderly people who have not been able to acquire that old perfection of style. But there are also some persons, and we are of their number, to whose mind the old music seems to react only favorably upon the new, and the new upon the old. We, for one, never enjoy a Beethoven symphony so much as when we have been straining every nerve to follow Brahms, or some other new genius, through the mazes of some great and taxing work; and again, we find the thorough enjoyment of a Beethoven symphony the best preparation in the world for enjoying a more modern composition. That perfect clearness of style makes the general plan to which all symphonic work must more or less adhere, so lucidly present to the mind that one is provided with a surer clew than before to guide one through the labyrinth of modern music. The great "Eroica" was, upon the whole, superbly played on Saturday evening. The orchestra were not quite together at the beginning of the Scherzo, but Mr. Henschel stuck bravely to his beat, and the men soon fell in with him. The horns played superbly in the trio, but we should still like to see the experiment tried of having the B-flat and A-flat at the end played as stopped notes, as they used to be on the old plain horns. It seems to us that this effect, humorous as it is in character, must have lain in Beethoven's mind as something worth doing for its own sake, and that he did not write the stopped notes merely because the horns of his day could play the passage in no other way. Some few portions of the Finale were a trifle blurred in the playing, and we still feel that Mr. Henschel takes the slow movement too slow. But he has a right to his conception, and, surely, he now makes the orchestra do full justice to it. The Mendelssohn overture was capitally played, as was also Boieldieu's charming and refined little piece of naïveté. Miss Franklin sang with admirable purity and finish of style. Her phrasing was artistic, her intonation perfect, and her runs as clear and even as those of a flute. In expression, too, she was always intelligent. There may be some lack of native charm, as there undoubtedly is of magnetic effectiveness and force, in her singing. But for excellence of style and method, for intelligent appreciation of the music she sings, in short, for everything that careful, sincere and persevering study can give a singer, she must ever command admiring recognition. Mr. Müller played the romance, written for him by his brother, exquisitely. As for the composition itself, it seemed to us wholly tame and uninteresting, albeit that the orchestral accompaniment is superbly scored.

The programme for the ninth concert, next Saturday night, is as follows:

Overture, "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony, D major.....Dvorak
Pianoforte solos: "Warum" and "Grillen".....Schumann
Polonaise, A-flat major.....Chopin
Ballet music, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod

The pianist will be Miss Helen Hopekirk of Scotland—her first appearance in this country.

The second concert in the course at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's Third Symphony the Principal Number Rendered.

At the eighth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, an attractive programme was presented to the large audience. The principal number was Beethoven's Third Symphony, which was led with a judicious care and taste, and played with unusual delicacy and finish. The performance of the work was a marked improvement over Mr. Henschel's previous presentations. Miss Gertrude Franklin, one of the soloists of the evening, sang a scena and aria of Spohr's composition in a voice and style which were beyond criticism. Later in the evening she sang several shorter pieces, which created much enthusiasm and gained her a recall. An unpublished romance for violoncello by K. Mueller-Berghaus received its first interpretation by Herr Wilhelm Mueller in his usual satisfactory manner. The work is an unpretentious but attractive bit of melodious writing, which met with some favor: An overture at the beginning and end of the concert completed the programme. The works to be performed next week are:

Overture (King Stephen), op. 117.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Andante sostenuto; allegro scherzando; presto.
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
Allegro non tanto; adagio; scherzo (furiante, presto.)
Finale (Allegro con spirito.)
Piano Solo.
(a) "Warum".....Schumann
(b) "Grillen".....Schumann
(c) Polonaise in A flat.....Chopin
Ballet music (La Reine de Saba).....Gounod
Soloist, Miss Helen Hopekirk.
(Her first appearance in America.)

Fourth Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Wilhelm Mueller, violoncellist, and Miss Gertrude Franklin were the soloists, and the following programme was performed: Overture ("Athalia"), Mendelssohn; scena and aria, op. 71, Spohr; symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; romance for violoncello, K. Mueller-Berghaus; songs with piano—(a) Cradle Song, R. Wagner; (b) to Chloe, Sterndale Bennett; (c) Forest Wanderings, Grieg; overture ("Le Calife de Bagdad"), Boieldieu. The concert was a very interesting one, and the selections were well played throughout. The Mendelssohn overture was exceptionally well performed, and the rendering that was given of the closing number was interesting enough to atone for the unimportance in a musical point of view of the selection. The symphony gained the best presentation that it has received at the hands of Mr. Henschel's force, who have shown great advance this season over their work of the last two years. If anything, the opening movement and the funeral march would have been bettered by being taken in a little faster time, but this point is hardly worth insisting upon in view of the general consistency and beauty of the performance. The beautiful passages for horns in the scherzo were given with remarkable skill and effect. Miss Franklin's singing was marked by great beauty and artistic power. Seldom has an artist been heard here who gave on one occasion such a variety of selections with equal success. She was warmly welcomed by the audience, and recalled after each of her appearances. Mr. Mueller played, for the first time, the romance above-mentioned, and has never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. The composition is a graceful and intelligent work, and was performed with great clearness, and with more expression than Mr. Mueller—who is not a musician of ardent temperament—usually displays. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, G minor, No. 2, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (which was given at the third concert for the first time here); a group of piano solos by Schumann and Chopin, and the ballet music from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." Mme. Helen Hopekirk will be the soloist, and make her first appearance in America on this occasion.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Histrionic and Harmonic Happenings of the Hour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When we left Music Hall, last Saturday evening, we thought we had a definite notion of the degree to which we were pleased by the eighth concert in this series, then performed. But a reading of the Courier, next day, forced us to become less fixed in our opinion, the more because other critics, far better able to judge than we, seem somewhat unsettled. One thing we are sure of, we thoroughly like the third Symphony (Eroica) of Beethoven, then performed, and as then performed. The orchestra played finely, being perfectly under Mr. Henschel's control, after a few bars of uncertainty, and, happily, individual parts of it were equally admirable with the ensemble. That Beethoven did know all about symphony writing, and that we are more and more pleased to hear him rather than others, we are certain. Much has been said in complaint of Mr. Henschel's failure to offer more popular music. There are, no doubt, people to whom Haydn's Military Symphony, because it is a symphony, appears to belong to the realm of heavy music. There is nothing in the constitution of things that makes it imperative on the part of a literary or musical work, in order to be light and "popular," to have been created within ten years, or even within the century. We think Mr. Henschel wise in his selection of light music for these concerts. The symphony was beautifully played. The delicate work of the clarinets, in the middle of the first movement, the fine playing of the horns in the trio of the scherzo, and the flute and clarinet effects in the final movement, were especially pleasing. Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, appeared in a scena and aria by Spohr, and in songs by Wagner, Sterndale Bennett and Grieg. In the Spohr number we thought her voice overshadowed by the instruments and by the composition. The songs by Bennett and Grieg were well done, the latter being especially pleasing. Some little curiosity seemed to possess our neighbors, regarding the words which Miss Franklin sang to Wagner's music: to us the syllables seemed to be the simple vowels of a "vocalization" exercise, though presumably it was German. Herr Müller, cellist, appeared in a romance written by his brother. Herr Müller played finely a composition of no especial interest, the only fault of execution being a slight thinness of tone. The programme for the ninth concert is: Overture, "King Stephen".....Beethoven

Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 22.....Saint-Saëns

Mr. Henschel still adheres to his admirable plan of playing the nine Beethoven symphonies through in chronological order every winter. That he can do this without unduly neglecting other great classic or modern symphonies is perhaps the best of the few good results that come from giving so long a course of concerts with a single subscription list. The interest which attaches to these symphonies, so given, today is not wholly confined to their intrinsic musical character, nor to the opportunities such a presentation of them affords for careful study of the gradual evolution of the composer's genius and style. It is interesting to note their effect upon the public, as compared with the effect produced by more modern works; and especially to note what influence the bearing of modern works has upon the enjoyableness of these symphonies, and vice versa. No doubt a considerable portion of the public is so exclusively filled with the musical spirit of the present day that finds these symphonies, notably the earlier ones, disappointing to the demands which they are impelled to make upon music. The absolute beauty of construction does not make up to such persons for the lack of certain qualities which they think to find more patently present in more modern works. Again, there are probably some few music lovers to whom the perfection of construction in the Beethoven symphonies appeals so strongly that they feel like rejecting Brahms, Dvorak and the modern lights in general as turbulent, disorderly people who have not been able to acquire that old perfection of style. But there are also some persons, and we are of their number, to whose mind the old music seems to react only favorably upon the new, and the new upon the old. We, for one, never enjoy a Beethoven symphony so much as when we have been straining every nerve to follow Brahms, or some other new genius, through the mazes of some great and taxing work; and again, we find the thorough enjoyment of a Beethoven symphony the best preparation in the world for enjoying a more modern composition. That perfect clearness of style makes the general plan to which all symphonic work must more or less adhere, so lucidly present to the mind that one is provided with a surer clew than before to guide one through the labyrinth of modern music. The great "Eroica" was, upon the whole, superbly played on Saturday evening. The orchestra were not quite together at the beginning of the Scherzo, but Mr. Henschel stuck bravely to his beat, and the men soon fell in with him. The horns played superbly in the trio, but we should still like to see the experiment tried of having the B-flat and A-flat at the end played as stopped notes, as they used to be on the old plain horns. It seems to us that this effect, humorous as it is in character, must have lain in Beethoven's mind as something worth doing for its own sake, and that he did not write the stopped notes merely because the horns of his day could play the passage in no other way. Some few portions of the Finale were a trifle blurred in the playing, and we still feel that Mr. Henschel takes the slow movement too slow. But he has a right to his conception, and, surely, he now makes the orchestra do full justice to it. The Mendelssohn overture was capably played, as was also Boieldieu's charming and refined little piece of naïveté. Miss Franklin sang with admirable purity and finish of style. Her phrasing was artistic, her intonation perfect, and her runs as clear and even as those of a flute. In expression, too, she was always intelligent. There may be some lack of native charm, as there undoubtedly is of magnetic effectiveness and force, in her singing. But for excellence of style and method, for intelligent appreciation of the music she sings, in short, for everything that careful, sincere and persevering study can give a singer, she must ever command admiring recognition. Mr. Müller played the romance, written for him by his brother, exquisitely. As for the composition itself, it seemed to us wholly tame and uninteresting, albeit that the orchestral accompaniment is superbly scored.

The programme for the ninth concert, next Saturday night, is as follows:

Overture, "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony, D major.....Dvorak
Pianoforte solos ("Warum?" and "Grillen").....Schumann
(Polonaise, A-flat major).....Chopin
Ballet music, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod

The pianist will be Miss Helen Hopckirk of Scotland—her first appearance in this country.

The second concert in the course at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's Third Symphony the Principal Number Rendered.

At the eighth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, an attractive programme was presented to the large audience. The principal number was Beethoven's Third Symphony, which was led with a judicious care and taste, and played with unusual delicacy and finish. The performance of the work was a marked improvement over Mr. Henschel's previous presentations. Miss Gertrude Franklin, one of the soloists of the evening, sang a scena and aria of Spohr's composition in a voice and style which were beyond criticism. Later in the evening she sang several shorter pieces, which created much enthusiasm and gained her a recall. An unpublished romance for violoncello by K. Mueller-Berghaus received its first interpretation by Herr Wilhelm Mueller in his usual satisfactory manner. The work is an unpretentious but attractive bit of melodious writing, which met with some favor. An overture at the beginning and end of the concert completed the programme. The works to be performed next week are:

Overture (King Stephen), op. 117.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saëns
Andante sostenuto; allegro scherzando; presto.
Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorak
Allegro non tanto; adagio; scherzo (furiante, presto.)
Finale (Allegro con spirito.)
Piano Solo.
(a) "Warum?" }.....Schumann
(b) "Grillen." }
(c) Polonaise in A flat.....Chopin
Ballet music (La Reine de Saba).....Gounod
Soloist, Mme. Helen Hopckirk.
(Her first appearance in America.)

Eighth Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Wilhelm Mueller, violoncellist, and Miss Gertrude Franklin were the soloists, and the following programme was performed: Overture ("Athalia"), Mendelssohn; scena and aria, op. 71, Spohr; symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; romance for violoncello, K. Mueller-Berghaus; songs with piano—(a) Cradle Song, R. Wagner; (b) to Chloe, Sterndale Bennett; (c) Forest Wanderings, Grieg; overture ("Le Calife de Bagdad"), Boieldieu. The concert was a very interesting one, and the selections were well played throughout. The Mendelssohn overture was exceptionally well performed, and the rendering that was given of the closing number was interesting enough to atone for the unimportance in a musical point of view of the selection. The symphony gained the best presentation that it has received at the hands of Mr. Henschel's force, who have shown great advance this season over their work of the last two years. If anything, the opening movement and the funeral march would have been bettered by being taken in a little faster time, but this point is hardly worth insisting upon in view of the general consistency and beauty of the performance. The beautiful passages for horns in the scherzo were given with remarkable skill and effect. Miss Franklin's singing was marked by great beauty and artistic power. Seldom has an artist been heard here who gave on one occasion such a variety of selections with equal success. She was warmly welcomed by the audience, and recalled after each of her appearances. Mr. Mueller played, for the first time, the romance above-mentioned, and has never appeared to better advantage than on this occasion. The composition is a graceful and intelligent work, and was performed with great clearness, and with more expression than Mr. Mueller—who is not a musician of ardent temperament—usually displays. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; Concerto for pianoforte, G minor, No. 2, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorak (which was given at the third concert for the first time here); a group of piano solos by Schumann and Chopin, and the ballet music from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba." Mme. Helen Hopckirk will be the soloist, and make her first appearance in America on this occasion.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Histrionic and Harmonic Happenings of the Hour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When we left Music Hall, last Saturday evening, we thought we had a definite notion of the degree to which we were pleased by the eighth concert in this series, then performed. But a reading of the Courier, next day, forced us to become less fixed in our opinion, the more because other critics, far better able to judge than we, seem somewhat unsettled. One thing we are sure of, we thoroughly like the third Symphony (Eroica) of Beethoven, then performed, and as then performed. The orchestra played finely, being perfectly under Mr. Henschel's control, after a few bars of uncertainty, and, happily, individual parts of it were equally admirable with the ensemble. That Beethoven did know all about symphony writing, and that we are more and more pleased to hear him rather than others, we are certain. Much has been said in complaint of Mr. Henschel's failure to offer more popular music. There are, no doubt, people to whom Haydn's Military Symphony, because it is a symphony, appears to belong to the realm of heavy music. There is nothing in the constitution of things that makes it imperative on the part of a literary or musical work, in order to be light and "popular," to have been created within ten years, or even within the century. We think Mr. Henschel wise in his selection of light music for these concerts. The symphony was beautifully played. The delicate work of the clarinets, in the middle of the first movement, the fine playing of the horns in the trio of the scherzo, and the flute and clarinet effects in the final movement, were especially pleasing. Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, appeared in a scena and aria by Spohr, and in songs by Wagner, Sterndale Bennett and Grieg. In the Spohr number we thought her voice overshadowed by the instruments and by the composition. The songs by Bennett and Grieg were well done, the latter being especially pleasing. Some little curiosity seemed to possess our neighbors, regarding the words which Miss Franklin sang to Wagner's music: to us the syllables seemed to be the simple vowels of a "vocalization" exercise, though presumably it was German. Herr Müller, cellist, appeared in a romance written by his brother. Herr Müller played finely a composition of no especial interest, the only fault of execution being a slight thinness of tone. The programme for the ninth concert is: Overture, "King Stephen".....Beethoven

Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 22.....Saint-Saëns

Symphony, D major Dvorak
 Piano Solo { "Warum?" and "Grillen" Schumann
 Polonaise, A-flat major Chopin
 Ballet music, "La Reine de Saba" Gounod
 The soloist is Mme. Helen Hopekirk, of Scotland. Mme. Hopekirk comes with a fine reputation to interest us in her playing. While studying in Germany, she appeared at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, in 1878.

Musical.

Home Journal

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—There was a timely consideration shown in the make-up of the programme for the eighth Boston symphony concert. Even so vague a deference to popular opinion as it were no more than possible for conductor Henschel to exhibit, rendered the musical bill of fare for Thanksgiving week a most welcome one to the patronage, whose dreary experience with a majority of the programmes this season has been proverbial. Our own opinion is that the programmes are of a higher standard than formerly; yet Mr. Henschel having had the misfortune to establish a local reputation for himself, of three years' endurance, must now expect to receive the same treatment from our very fickle Boston public, such as has not unfrequently been known to his predecessors. Though vastly superior at the head of an orchestra to the mere tyro of two years ago, yet having been idolized by an elite of both sexes in the former crude state of his non-experience as a conductor, the improvement he has since made quite naturally conveys a very confused impression; and so Mr. Henschel is even now liable to be made the victim of the same cry of old foggy that is so characteristic of Boston's past record in her treatment of her most experienced musicians and institutions. An adept himself in this kind of treatment when he first came here, he, too, showed a lack of veneration for a number of our oldest and most valued artists that cannot so easily be forgiven. This is his last year in Mr. Higginson's service, and about all he can do now is to select such programmes as are acceptable to himself—and the family (!)—now that his Saturday evening audience, anxiously hoping for the arrival of Hans Richter from London, withhold such notably enthusiastic applause of his efforts as in previous years he invariably inspired.

It should be noted as some freak of nature, or some fortunate accident, if not indeed a remarkable conversion of judgment, that produced not simply such a rare selection for the eighth symphony concert, but that enabled the audience to listen to some other soprano vocalists than the well-known artists of the coterie.

We take the liberty of again suggesting that there are also a number of basses right here in Boston whom the public would like to hear at the Boston symphony concerts; though it seems to be somewhat unfortunate in this respect that the conductor himself sings bass, and that he has always persisted in affording a most exclusive evidence of his own desirability.

The conducting at the eighth symphony concert was unusually good. The lead of the "eroica" could but prove satisfying to the many sincere admirers of the work. Previous misinterpretations under the same leadership must necessarily be recalled in order to appreciate the improvement that he has made. Precisely how the tempi corresponded with the metronomic demands of the score need not be investigated, so long as without the score, yet from a cultivated familiarity with the work, the variances in all the movements but the marcia funebre were difficult of detection. Excepting in the first allegro, where Mr. Henschel's characteristic tendency to hurry was somewhat reminiscent of his former vivacious yet irrational beat, each of the tempi was of a self-consistent accuracy. The conductor still appears very original in the excessive somnolency with which he conducts the marcia funebre, yet as to this, it were of course more magnanimous to extend him sympathy for his mood, than seriously to complain of his tempo. In all other movements of the work, the conductor's control, with the culture and fidelity in attendance upon it, carried with it all a most welcome self-renunciation of his former very popular readings. To his superbly equipped orchestra also belongs a significant share of praise. With such an orchestra at command, and one obtained from various parts of the world, regardless of expense, one of the best organized orchestras imaginable, it were indeed a very incompetent conductor that could not produce the most satisfactory effects. The scherzo was played in such a charming manner, so delicately yet with such incisive distinctness as to effect a very rare and delightful experience with the entire movement. Would that it had been encoered. A well-proportioned rubato was sometimes employed in the other movements, yet the orchestra played throughout with exceptional unanimity and precision. The overtures consisted of Mendelssohn's "Atholie," and Boieldieu's "Le Caliphe de Bagdad." Miss Gertrude Franklin was the vocalist, her selections consisting of a scene and aria from Spohr's Faust; Cradle song, Wagner; To Chloe, Bennett, and Forest Wanderings, Grieg. Miss Franklin's extremely creditable performance of Spohr's aria must have been best appreciated by musicians in the audience, owing to the intricate difficulty of her task, and the many nice points of artistic interpretation and delivery that characterized its performance. The exquisite taste she displayed in rendering her group of songs did not seem to meet with the exact recognition that was its due, but the artistic success of her performance, both vocally and from a higher standpoint, was too evident not to have merited the heartiest acknowledgment. Mr. Müller's performance of a romance by Müller-Berghaus, displayed a very stupid and unscholarly piece of music at better advantage than its merits deserved. Mr. Müller's well-intended fidelity to the family of Müller-Berghaus might be more acceptably demonstrated than by the frequent performance in public of his uncle's very worthless music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The following is my text, which may be found in Henschel's eighth pistle to the Bostonians:

Overture (Athalia) Mendelssohn.
 Scene and Aria, op. 71 Spohr.

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

Symphony in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55. Beethoven.
 Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre, (Adagio assai).—
 Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.—

Romance for Violoncello . . (MS. First time.) . K. Müller Berghaus

HERR WM. MUELLER.

Songs with Piano
 a, Cradle Song R. Wagner.
 b, To Chloe Sterndale Bennett.
 c, Forest Wanderings Grieg.

MISS FRANKLIN.

Overture. (Le Caliphe de Bagdad.) Boieldieu.

Now here is a programme for a nice little tea party! It goes from Beethoven via Wagner to Boieldieu. "O most lame and impotent conclusion," as the "divine William" would say.

Boieldieu is milk for babes. If he must be heard, why take his weakest work, one belonging to his very first period, instead of "Jean de Paris" or "La Dame Blanche?" Cherubini regarded "The Caliph of Bagdad" as a musical indiscretion, and few will differ from his opinion. Perhaps it was given as a satirical concession on the part of Mr. Henschel to some unmusical critics, who have been howling for light music, and declaring programmes containing Beethoven's first and second symphony indigestible.

The "Eroica" was well played, and in the matter of tempo Mr. Henschel showed that he has learned much. The "Funeral March" was taken at a solemn but not dawdling pace, and the first movement only might be criticised as being too fast. The difficult horn passages of the second and (especially) the third movements were perfect, and the celli and contrabassi equally firm in their important work of the first movement. Only in the first part of the "Scherzo" was any roughness perceptible and here, too, it was but transient.

Miss Franklin has improved wonderfully of late. Her voice was broad and full, her expression earnest and artistic, her fioriture, with the exception of chromatic work, clear and brilliant. The songs she sung were well selected to show versatility, and each was beautiful in itself. I should have liked a trifle more of joy in the "Waldwanderung," but she sang this also with much daintiness and effect.

Herr Müller's instrument was not one of large tone, but his perfect legato and his refined shading made the number composed by his brother one of the successes of the concert.

This finishes the musical budget for the week, and I can wind up as the school boys do with—"Having no more to say I must now close," which, although uncouth, has the merit of truthfulness.

L. C. E.

Hans Richter has not yet signed any contract for America, as has been announced. He is still bound by his engagement in Vienna, where he is in receipt of 5000 florins a year, with the certainty of a pension after 10 years' service. There are the best of reasons for believing that his engagement as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra has never been contemplated.

or
e a
e. r
r
-
e s
e
e g d r s
e
of rer-
of or ed
ie
erd
of d
nen
n ie
y, ie
ie
d
n oar ge a

e. er
er
isie

as te se ig

ed
hys ie
of ner-

of or ed
he
eir-ed

of ed
nean in rn

he y,

he
he ed
in

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (King Stephen.) op. 117. BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in G minor, No. 2, op. 22. SAINT-SAËNS.
Andante sostenuto.—Allegro scherzando.—Presto.—

SYMPHONY in D. op. 60. DVOŘÁK.
Allegro non tanto.—Adagio.—Scherzo. [Furiant. (Presto.)]
Finale. (Allegro con spirito).—

PIANO SOLO.

(a) "WARUM?" } SCHUMANN.
(b) "GRILLEN." }

(c) POLONAISE in A flat. CHOPIN.

BALLET-MUSIC. (La Reine de Saba.) GOUNOD.
Allegro.—Moderato.—Allegro moderato.—Allegretto.—

SOLOIST:

MME. HELEN HOPEKIRK.

[Her first appearance in America.]

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Ninth Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture (King Stephen), op. 117, Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorák; Piano Solo—(a) "Warum?" (b) "Grillen," Schumann; (c) Polonaise in A flat, Chopin. Ballet Music (La Reine de Saba), Gounod. The chief interest of the concert centred upon the soloist of the evening, Madame Helen Hopekirk, pianist, who made on this occasion her first public appearance in America. She made a decided impression upon the audience, to judge from the applause that she gained, which was very warm after all her numbers, and after the Saint-Saëns concerto was continued until she twice returned to bow her acknowledgments. A strict estimate upon her work, however, will hardly give allowance for such signal manifestations of favor. The lady is a brilliant and well-schooled player, but without any strong indications of a musical instinct, and she plays with little power and with, at times, a false refinement of style. Her technique is skillful and her touch unusually true and exact, but from one hearing, at least, the opinion is gained that she is not a player of any remarkable ability, although considerably above the average. The Dvorák Symphony was the one which was performed at the third concert of the orchestra, and requires no especial mention now, except a word to the effect that the good opinion of its beauty and power that was gained from a first hearing was more than confirmed by a second. The playing of the orchestra was, on the whole, exceedingly good. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air (Judas Maccabæus), Handel; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28 (first time), Saint-Saëns; song, with piano, "The Young Nun," Schubert; overture (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg), Wagner. Soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Alfred DeSeve.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Novelty in the Shape of a Pianist Presented.

At the tenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, the novelty in the evening was the first appearance in America of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist. She chose for her principal number Saint-Saëns' pianoforte concerto in G, and that the choice was wise there can be little doubt; for to the inspiring and exciting nature of Saint-Saëns' music, it seemed to us at least, the lady owed a part of the conquest which she made of a Boston audience. Her hearers "enthused" at once, gave her very marked expressions of favor at the close of the first movement, which increased as the work went on, until at the end she had created a furor. Our impressions of her were that she is an artist who has studied well under a good teacher, rather than one of any individuality or strength of character, and for that reason we thought her reception a little stronger than she deserved. She plays in good taste, but lacks power. The symphony was that of Dvorák's, which was heard as a novelty at the third concert this season. It was played much better than previously, and was received with a great deal more favor. It improves on hearing, and we think that it is not only destined to become popular but standard. The programme for next week is:

Tragic overture, op. 81..... Brahms
Recitative and air. (Judas Maccabæus.)..... Handel
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60..... Beethoven
Introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28. (First time.)..... Saint-Saëns
Song with Piano. "The Young Nun."..... Schubert
Overture. (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.)..... Wagner
Soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Alfred DeSeve.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. aw
THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The chief interest of Saturday evening's concert attached to the debut of Madame Helen Hopekirk (Mrs. Wilson) of London, pianist, for whose first American appearance,—always allowing that a performance at a public rehearsal does not count for anything!—were chosen Saint-Saëns's concerto in G-minor, Schumann's "Warum" and "Grillen," and Chopin's great polonaise in A-flat, opus 53. Madame Hopekirk had already engaged the favor of the audience before she had reached the pianoforte. Dressed in a long, plain robe of old-gold velvet, with a little knot of yellow ribbon for epaulets, and wearing a very broad lace collar which fell far over her bodice; her hair almost aesthetically disposed about her forehead, with a confident and unaffected manner, and a frank and pleasant face, her appearance was charming. So, too, was her playing, and the audience, under the double charm, applauded and recalled her ardently.

If we were obliged to characterize Mme. Hopekirk's playing by a single epithet, we are afraid that we should have to call it "sweet." Her command, though not weak, and especially sure in detached chords and octaves, is rather soft than positive. Her execution is agile and her fingers have apparently all necessary independence; and yet, somehow,—perhaps a not altogether dexterous use of the pedal may be responsible for it,—when to the eye her handling of the instrument looks absolutely definite, its tones do not reach the ear with equal definition. Madame Hopekirk, however, has one quality of greater value than mere technical perfection, which can be gained, while this must come by nature,—a fine, pure sentiment, womanly in feeling and dignified in statement. Sometimes it is modified by more of fancy than we like, but it is certainly never mawkish. She is delightful and admirable, but she is "a mortal and liable to fall," and so all her numbers were not equally good. The stately polonaise is necessarily beyond the grasp of most players, and her failure to seize its majestic character is only one among many. It was carried through with steadiness and taste, but its peculiar spirit was not there. The concerto suited her exceedingly, albeit the orchestra did not always allow this to be seen, and the Schumann morceaux were beautifully turned.

The orchestral works were: A repetition of the Dvorák symphony, first played at the third concert, and which was warmly welcomed and enjoyed again, and would have been yet more appreciated we are sure, if the repetitions within the movements could have been omitted; a full and dignified opening of the evening, in Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, and an agreeable closing of it by the ballet music, so happily and so variedly Oriental, from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

At the next concert Miss Marguerite Hall will sing an air from "Judas Maccabæus" and a song of Schubert; Mr. De Séve will play a rondo for violin by St. Saëns, and the orchestra will perform Beethoven's fourth symphony, and Brahms's "Tragic," and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture.

Ninth Symphony Concert. Journal

The ninth concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture (King Stephen), op. 117, Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorák; Piano Solo—(a) "Warum?" (b) "Grillen," Schumann; (c) Polonaise in A flat, Chopin. Ballet Music (La Reine de Saba), Gounod. The chief interest of the concert centred upon the soloist of the evening, Madame Helen Hopekirk, pianist, who made on this occasion her first public appearance in America. She made a decided impression upon the audience, to judge from the applause that she gained, which was very warm after all her numbers, and after the Saint-Saëns concerto was continued until she twice returned to bow her acknowledgments. A strict estimate upon her work, however, will hardly give allowance for such signal manifestations of favor. The lady is a brilliant and well-schooled player, but without any strong indications of a musical instinct, and she plays with little power and with, at times, a false refinement of style. Her technique is skillful and her touch unusually true and exact, but from one hearing, at least, the opinion is gained that she is not a player of any remarkable ability, although considerably above the average. The Dvorák Symphony was the one which was performed at the third concert of the orchestra, and requires no especial mention now, except a word to the effect that the good opinion of its beauty and power that was gained from a first hearing was more than confirmed by a second. The playing of the orchestra was, on the whole, exceedingly good. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air (Judas Maccabaeus), Handel; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28 (first time), Saint-Saëns; song, with piano, "The Young Nun," Schubert; overture (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg), Wagner. Soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Alfred DeSeve.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Novelty in the Shape of a Pianist Presented.

At the tenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, the novelty in the evening was the first appearance in America of Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist. She chose for her principal number Saint-Saëns' pianoforte concerto in G, and that the choice was wise there can be little doubt; for to the inspiring and exciting nature of Saint-Saëns' music, it seemed to us at least, the lady owed a part of the conquest which she made of a Boston audience. Her hearers "enthused" at once, gave her very marked expressions of favor at the close of the first movement, which increased as the work went on, until at the end she had created a furor. Our impressions of her were that she is an artist who has studied well under a good teacher, rather than one of any individuality or strength of character, and for that reason we thought her reception a little stronger than she deserved. She plays in good taste, but lacks power. The symphony was that of Dvorák's, which was heard as a novelty at the third concert this season. It was played much better than previously, and was received with a great deal more favor. It improves on hearing, and we think that it is not only destined to become popular but standard. The programme for next week is:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....	Brahms
Recitative and air. (Judas Maccabaeus).....	Handel
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven
Introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28. (First time).....	Saint-Saëns
Song with piano. "The Young Nun".....	Schubert
Overture. (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg).....	Wagner

Soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Alfred DeSeve.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. adw THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The chief interest of Saturday evening's concert attached to the debut of Madame Helen Hopekirk (Mrs. Wilson) of London, pianist, for whose first American appearance,—always allowing that a performance at a public rehearsal does not count for anything!—were chosen Saint-Saëns' concerto in G-minor, Schumann's "Warum" and "Grillen," and Chopin's great polonaise in A-flat, opus 53. Madame Hopekirk had already engaged the favor of the audience before she had reached the pianoforte. Dressed in a long, plain robe of old-gold velvet, with a little knot of yellow ribbon for epaulets, and wearing a very broad lace collar which fell far over her bodice; her hair almost aesthetically disposed about her forehead, with a confident and unaffected manner, and a frank and pleasant face, her appearance was charming. So, too, was her playing, and the audience, under the double charm, applauded and recalled her ardently.

If we were obliged to characterize Mme. Hopekirk's playing by a single epithet, we are afraid that we should have to call it "sweet." Her command, though not weak, and especially sure in detached chords and octaves, is rather soft than positive. Her execution is agile and her fingers have apparently all necessary independence; and yet, somehow,—perhaps a not altogether dexterous use of the pedal may be responsible for it,—when to the eye her handling of the instrument looks absolutely definite, its tones do not reach the ear with equal definition. Madame Hopekirk, however, has one quality of greater value than mere technical perfection, which can be gained, while this must come by nature,—a fine, pure sentiment, womanly in feeling and dignified in statement. Sometimes it is modified by more of fancy than we like, but it is certainly never mawkish. She is delightful and admirable, but she is "a mortal and liable to fall," and so all her numbers were not equally good. The stately polonaise is necessarily beyond the grasp of most players, and her failure to seize its majestic character is only one among many. It was carried through with steadiness and taste, but its peculiar spirit was not there. The concerto suited her exceedingly, albeit the orchestra did not always allow this to be seen, and the Schumann moreaux were beautifully turned.

The orchestral works were: A repetition of the Dvorák symphony, first played at the third concert, and which was warmly welcomed and enjoyed again, and would have been yet more appreciated we are sure, if the repetitions within the movements could have been omitted; a full and dignified opening of the evening, in Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, and an agreeable closing of it by the ballet music, so happily and so variedly Oriental, from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba."

At the next concert Miss Marguerite Hall will sing an air from "Judas Maccabaeus" and a song of Schubert; Mr. De Seve will play a rondo for violin by St. Saëns, and the orchestra will perform Beethoven's fourth symphony, and Brahms's "Tragic," and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The ninth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Overture to "König Stephan".....Beethoven
Concerto in G minor, No. 2.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony in D.....Dvorák
Pianoforte Solos:

a. "Warum?".....Schumann
b. "Grillen".....Schumann
c. Polonaise in A-flat.....Chopin
Ballet Music from La Reine de Saba, Gounod.
Mme. Helen Hopekirk was the pianist.

Beethoven's overture to "König Stephan," an occasional composition, written for the opening of the theatre in Pesth, is, like Schumann's overture to "Julius Caesar," one of those little works of a great man which, by a certain individuality they have, impress one as being intrinsically stronger than many a great work by a small man. That it is by no means one of the composer's mightier creations need hardly be said; but the lion's paw still shows itself, and the music is inspiring, if only by its unmistakable kinship with the master's higher achievements. One of the themes, straight from the Ninth Symphony, is of itself enough to make the overture rich in the most exhilarating associations. It was finely played by the orchestra, and we are free to own that we have never enjoyed it so much before. Mr. Henschel deserves warm thanks from all earnest music-lovers who are anxious to familiarize themselves with the best fruits of contemporary genius for repeating the Dvorák symphony so soon after his first performance of it here, at the risk of drawing some growls from the larger and—be it said not uncivilly—the more frivolous part of his audience. As for ourselves, we find, after this second hearing of the work, that much that sounded obscure at first now seems beautifully clear. We now find the first and third movements wholly inspiring. The slow movement satisfies no less, as yet. It may be that a certain likeness of motive to some not entirely fine things by Raff makes the sentiment in several parts of this movement seem to us a little commonplace. But this may be a purely personal bias which further familiarity may overcome. All music is full of reminiscences, and the purest and most exalted melody can recall an ignoble phrase, the memory of which taints, for the time being, the impression it makes upon us. As for the Finale, we are still considerably in the dark; we feel that something fine is there, but exactly what it is we cannot tell. But, upon the whole, one must feel that this symphony of Dvorák's is destined to something better and higher than a mere ephemeral popularity. One is tempted to call it distinctly one of those works which will live long. The orchestra played it grandly, only that we could have wished, at times, that the brass had not been quite so stridently conspicuous. The Gounod ballet music is full of Parisian grace and verve, and not without a certain mondaine elegance which gilds it with at least the show of refinement. It, too, was duly well played. Mme. Hopekirk, the Scotch pianist, who made her first public appearance in America on this occasion, is decidedly an interesting player. Her technique, albeit amply sufficient to give her confidence in attacking the most taxing works, can hardly be called superlatively good by the present high standard. As the common phrase goes, she has not the very best of fingers. A certain nervous excitement, which may spring either from purely emotional causes, or from a lack of perfect technical grasp of the key-board, often leads her to make what pianists call "short bars," that is, to end exciting phrases ahead of time. Indeed, in the concerto, the frequent want of exact coincidence between the orchestra and her was really more her fault than the conductor's. This same nervousness also leads her to misuse the pedal at moments. But, after making the proper deductions for such technical shortcomings, one cannot but find her playing singularly fine. She has that rare expressive power which gets the full meaning out of a musical phrase without effort, and without any of those vulgar subterfuges which are the current small change of sentiment. She plays with genuine warmth, with immense vital vigor, with true musical feeling. And this feeling of hers is not merely latent, but she knows how to express it humanly and naturally. More than this, she shows, in her playing, something which we are firmly persuaded women must possess, but which our experience had almost made us despair of a woman showing in pianoforte-playing, namely; BRAINS! She shows that she appreciates the fact that the composer's work is really something more than a series of notes to be thrown off by the fingers; something better than a clothes-line whereon to let the rags of sentimental moonshine flap in the wind of fatuous applause. Do we speak impolitely in this, and was it a very case-hardened sceptic who once said that the best argument he knew against woman suffrage was the way in which most women play the pianoforte? Well, if we do overstep the bounds of gallantry, it is the impression that Mme. Hopekirk's playing has made on us that pricks the blister of unmannerly petulance which has been growing in us for some years past. We are cured now, and will listen henceforth to fair woman pianists with the most adamant faith in their power of charming.

The next programme is: Tragic overture, Brahms; recitative and air from "Judas Maccabæus," Handel; Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, Beethoven; Introduction and Rondo capriccioso for violin, Saint-Saëns; Song, with pianoforte, "The Young Nun," Schubert; Overture to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," Wagner. Miss Marguerite Hall will be the singer, and Mr. Alfred de Sève the violinist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We greatly regret that the pressure on our columns forbids an extended review of the Symphony Concert this week. The chief work performed was the new Dvorák Symphony, and its second hearing only confirmed our first impressions of its worth. The soloist of the concert was a new pianist—Madam Hopekirk—who performed Saint-Saëns Concerto in G minor in a manner which proved her to be an intelligent artist. Less worthy, however, was her performance of three solo pieces in which she seemed to aim rather at power than refinement, and which traces of blurring, and overuse of the pedal, were apparent. Nevertheless the pianist seems to be an artist of good calibre, and we shall await her further appearances with interest.

MUSICAL GAZETTE

Boston Symphony Concert.

We regret that lack of space forbids us to give more than a passing notice of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Music Hall last night. The soloist, Madam Helen Hopekirk, made her first appearance in America on this occasion, playing Saint-Saëns's G-minor Concerto, Schumann's "Warum" and "Grillen," and Chopin's Polonaise in A-flat. Madame Hopekirk plays with great taste and elegance, and with that cloying prettiness of style peculiar to the English school. She has not much power, and at times her use of the pedals is inartistic; but her technique is brilliant and facile, and her touch is exceedingly nice and accurate. Her best achievement of the evening was her performance of the scherzo in the concerto, which was a marvel of delicacy. "Warum" was also charmingly played. Her reading of the Polonaise was almost phenomenally tame, and in addition showed a wholly misguided conception of the true meaning and spirit of the work. Miss Hopekirk was twice recalled with great enthusiasm after the concerto, and rewarded with hearty applause for her other performances. The pressure on our columns prevents notice of the other features of the concert.

Notes.

The ninth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, and the programme was made up of Overture, (King Stephen,) op. 117, Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, op. 60, Dvorák; Piano Solo—(a), "Warum?" (b), "Grillen," Schumann; (c), Polonaise in A flat, Chopin; Ballet Music, (La Reine de Saba), Gounod. The work of the orchestra throughout the programme was of the best order, and an especially pleasing feature was the repetition of the symphony by Dvorák, which was given for the first time at the third concert, and which increased in favor to a great degree. But the great event of the night was the appearance of the Scottish pianiste, Mad. Helen Hopekirk, who made her first appearance at a regular concert in this city, and also in the country. That she made a profound impression no one can deny, and that she found instant sympathy with her audience is also undeniable. She is a well-skilled player, possessed of rather a delicate style, and some considerable power, and we should look upon her playing as tender and sentimental, rather than powerful, and while quite a scholarly manipulator of the instrument, is no better than many, and not as good as some female performers we have heard in the Music Hall. But the audience warmed to her in a great degree, and all her numbers were heartily applauded. There was something in the lady's style and personal appearance very taking with the audience, and much of the applause may have arisen from this. The tenth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, and the public rehearsal on the afternoon previous, as follows: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air (Judas Maccabæus), Handel; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28 (first time), Saint-Saëns; song, with piano, "The Young Nun," Schubert; overture (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg), Wagner. Soloists, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mr. Alfred DeSève.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ninth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The ninth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening. Mme. Helen Hopekirk, pianist, being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "King Stephen," op. 117.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22.....Saint-Saëns

Symphony in D, op. 60.....Dvorák
Piano solo:
(a) "Warum?".....Schumann
(b) "Grillen,".....Schumann
(c) Polonaise in A flat.....Chopin
Ballet music, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod

Notwithstanding the abundant supply of pianists now in the country, such an artist as Mme. Hopekirk will find a welcome from American audiences which will amply reward her coming from Scotland, and the quick recognition of her abilities by last evening's audience was a well merited tribute to an artist of the first rank. Her playing shows her to be a true musician, as well as an excellent pianist, and her intelligence was amply shown in all her work. The clear, strong presentation of the opening movement of the Saint-Saëns concerto arrested the attention of the audience at once, and, as the movement was concluded, the position of the player was fully assured by the enthusiastic applause which followed it. The second movement was played with a rare grace and elegance of phrasing, and the brilliant presto was given with a dash and finish which fully warranted the applause which it called out. The player's touch is charmingly clear and elastic, her pianissimo passages are given with admirable delicacy, and there is a clearly defined character in all her work. The same skill was shown by Mme. Hopekirk in the Schumann selections as in the concerto, but in the Chopin selection she was less successful, there being some lack of clearness in the introduction and the polonaise being played too slow to give its best effect. The overloud playing of the orchestra marred some of the passages of the concerto, but otherwise the pianist and the musicians were well together in the spirit of the composition. Mr. Henschel is to be commended for repeating the Dvorák symphony. It is safe to assume that but a small fraction of an average concert audience will rightly estimate the real value of such a work upon a first hearing. There was a greater diversity of opinion than usual expressed upon the merits of this composition after the first performance, and if Mr. Henschel believed, as he unquestionably did, that it was worthy a place in the season's programmes, it was clearly right that a second hearing of the work should be afforded, in justice to those holding different opinions as to its value. The work does not improve upon acquaintance, its leading merit being the use it serves as an example of the skill of the composer in concealing his poverty in original ideas. The few and valueless themes of the first movement fail to justify its dreary length; the second movement is the result of labored thought rather than the spontaneous outgrowth of a single well developed idea; the treatment of the national dance theme in the third movement is neither original nor interesting, and the finale has as its leading characteristics a few incoherent and incomplete melodies noisily treated. The composer's skill in the orchestral setting must be admitted, but the wisdom of occupying a place in these programmes with such a work seems open to question, unless there is a considerable portion of the public that craves novelties more than a rehearsing of the melodious music of the old composers. Many of the audience appeared pleased with the composition, thus proving how far the public taste may be vitiated by giving place on these programmes to such musical rubbish. The always enjoyable "King Stephen" overture was capably played, and Gounod's delightful ballet music, especially the graceful little solo for the violin, played in a charming fashion by Mr. Listemann, gave a pleasant ending to the evening's programme.

142 THE ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Georg Henschel, took place last evening at the Boston Music Hall. The programme was made up of the following selections:

Overture (King Stephen), op. 117... Beethoven
Concerto for flute, G minor, op. 22... Saint-Saëns Symphony in D, op. 60... Dvorák
Piano Solo

Warum? }
Grillen. } Schumann

Polonaise, A 6 major... Chopin
Ballet Music, from "La Reine de Saba"... Gounod

The soloist of the evening being Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

The Beethoven overture, one of the composer's lesser known works, was rendered with great spirit and was well received by the audience. The rendering of the next number, the Saint-Saëns concerto, by Mme. Hopekirk, was, however, the success of the evening. This lady, who has already made her mark as pianiste in European art centres, arrived in this country only recently, and this was the occasion of her first appearance before an American audience. Judging by the reception awarded her last evening, her future success seems assured. Her playing is distinguished by uncommon vigor and strength, coupled, however, with grace and delicacy when needed, which give to her renditions a peculiar charm of their own. Her technique is superb, enabling her to reproduce the most rapid runs with perfect clearness; which was especially noticeable in the beautiful scherzo of the concerto, and which called forth the loud and prolonged applause of the audience. The playing of the first movement was marked by breadth of style, while the last movement was a magnificent display of brilliancy and dash in pianoforte playing. At the close of the concerto the approval of the audience was manifested in a hearty and unanimous manner, amounting to quite an ovation, which the lady gracefully acknowledged by repeated bows, as encores are prohibited at these concerts. Her solo numbers were equally well received, and altogether Mme. Hopekirk is to be congratulated upon the decided success she achieved with so critical an audience. She is doubtless the most satisfactory lady pianiste that has yet appeared at these concerts, and it is to be hoped that she will soon favor Boston again with a visit, since, after last night, she can be sure of a hearty welcome. The symphony of Dvorák was finely interpreted and well rendered throughout, if one excepts a few slight mishaps in the woodwind. I heard it for the first time, and must say that it did not strike me as the work of genius that some make it appear. The motives are neither strikingly beautiful nor very original, and owing to the predominance of dance rhythms, illy adapted for symphonic treatment. The work becomes monotonous and wearying in many parts in spite of numerous individual beauties. The scherzo is the most satisfactory movement, and even that, owing to the shortness and incessant repetition of its first motive, is considerably marred in its effect. The concert was brought to a close by the rendering of Gounod's ballet music, from the "Queen of Saba." It is but just to state that Madame Hopekirk was materially assisted in her fine playing by the magnificent Steinway concert grand, placed at her disposal for the occasion. It was one of the finest instruments I have ever heard.

LOUIS MAAS.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Popburn — advertis
Histrionic and Harmonic Happenings. of the Hour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Henschel deserves, in addition to his own inner consciousness, thanks in some more tangible shape, for his consideration in repeating the symphony of the third concert, Dvorák's new composition in D. In detailing the impressions then received by us from this work, we said, as every one must have felt, that one needed a second hearing and further study, in order to be able to conclude, definitely, as to its worth. Its thematic treatment is so elaborate, the entire handling of the work so complicate and unsimple, that a single hearing is very unsatisfactory. The same statement is true of one of Beethoven's symphonies, but for a different reason. To one who had never heard a certain one of the nine by this tone-master, a second hearing, a twentieth hearing, would be pleasant and profitable because the themes, though not extremely elaborated, are so grand and treated in such a masterful manner that one fails to take in, entirely, their wonderful power. Many things would conspire to render impossible a complete comprehension of the master's meaning, just as at a first hearing of Shakspeare's Hamlet, the tremendous depth of the poet's knowledge of human nature makes entire comprehension of his meaning beyond the power of one not long familiar with the text. That a work like this of Dvorák would pay a twentieth hearing, we doubt; it has not the durable charm of one of Beethoven's symphonies; that a third or fourth hearing would be profitable we believe; the interest is not over-used before. But,—it seems to us to be too long, in places; the first movement was absolutely maddening, from its interminable repetition; at any time during the last five minutes of this movement, it seemed as if we should fly, to use a good New England expression. This uncomfortable feeling is partially dispelled by the latter part of the work, but such a sensation, once caused, is hard to entirely erase. The work is, however, to us extremely interesting. The soloist was Mme. Helen Hopekirk, who made her first appearance before an American audience; so read the programmes, which make no account of a rehearsal audience. Mme. Hopekirk's principal number was the piano-forte concerto in G minor, No. 2, by Saint-Saëns. Her very appearance was extremely prepossessing, the costume of gold-colored (?) velvet with the broad lace collar being extremely effective in setting off the lady's clear-cut face. Her playing was good; we think that word better unmodified, for adverbs, after all, weaken the force of the adjective. Mme. Hopekirk was apparently somewhat nervous, a state of mind which showed its presence particularly in the making of short measures, in an unintended rapidity of tempo. Her playing was clear and defined, except in the forte passages. It seems to us that there was too much orchestra, at times, to allow all the fineness of the soloist's work be heard. Mme. Hopekirk appeared to better advantage, because not hidden by orchestra, in two numbers by Schumann, "Warum?" and "Grillen." The Polonaise in A flat, Chopin, was steadily and surely performed. Mme. Hopekirk made a decidedly flattering impression on the audience. The other orchestral numbers were overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven, and ballet music from La Reine de Saba, Gounod, both finely performed. At the concert to-morrow evening, the programme will be: Tragic overture op. 81; Brahms: Recitative and Air (Judas Maccabæus); Hændel: Beethoven's Fourth Symphony: Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin, op. 28 (first time) Saint-Saëns: Song, "The Young Nun," Schubert: overture of The Master-singers of Nuremberg, Wagner. Miss Marguerite Hall and Mr. Alfred De Séve will be the soloists.

144
not need to say much about our weekly Symphony this time, for it was a repetition of a work which I think is one of the most interesting of modern symphonies, that of Dvorak in D major.

The programme was as follows:

Overture.—(King Stephen), op. 117 Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22 Saint Saens
Andante sostenuto—Allegro scherzando—Presto.

Miss HELEN HOPEKIRK

Symphony in D, op. 60 Dvorak
Allegro non tanto—Adagio—Scherzo.
Finale. (Allegro non spirito).—

Piano Solo.

a. "Warum?" Schumann
b. "Grillen"
c. Polonaise in A flat Chopin

Miss HOPEKIRK.

Ballet Music—(La Reine de Saba). Gounod
Allegro—Moderato—Allegro moderato—Allegretto.

It introduced a new pianist to Boston and to America. In the concerto Miss Hopekirk displayed much intelligence and good technic. She has a powerful touch, and, considering the fact that this was her debut in America, she was remarkably free from nervousness. I did not like her so well in the three piano solos. The questioning, "Warum?" was rather too conventional, and had not a well shaded close. In "Grillen" she began with much violence, and did not accent the syncopated phrases prominently enough. In the last piece she may have been fatigued, for there were many phrases blurred, and the pedal was over-used. I learn that the lady is to give a series of recitals in Boston soon, and then one can form a fairer judgment than by the performance at a debut in a strange land. By the way, the symphony at this concert was repeated in defiance of the dictum of a critic of a leading daily who pronounced it musical rubbish at its first performance. Of course it was a trifle heavy for the general audience, but a symphony is not to be judged from a popular standpoint, any more than a Miltonian epic is to be judged by a lot of fashionable novel readers.

I wonder, however, whether the symphony concerts are going to be merely a fashion in Boston. There is no longer any great enthusiasm at the concerts—at least not compared to what there was at the concerts of the first season, which were much poorer than those of the present. If the indifference of the old Harvard Symphony Concert audiences set in, it will be a death warrant to permanent symphony concerts in Boston. Meanwhile the faithful and enthusiastic and really critical audiences are found, not at the concerts of Saturday night, but at the public rehearsals of Friday afternoon. It may, therefore, be possible that fate points its finger toward a sort of Monday "pops," of London style, in Boston.

L. C. E.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the ninth Boston symphony concert, on Saturday evening, the magnificent Dvorak symphony was repeated. Otherwise the programme was devoted to piano selections. Madame Helen Hopekirk was the pianist. She was heard in Saint Saens' G minor concerto, and also played Schumann's Warum and Grillen, and Chopin's A flat polonaise. The best characteristics of Miss Hopekirk's playing are confined to her technique. She has cultivated a very charming skill in the use of her fingers. In this respect her capacity to play prestissimo and with extraordinary clearness—despite an abominable tendency to misuse the pedal—is well nigh matchless. Her chief, if not her only aim as an artiste is at nicety and brilliancy of execution. She is conspicuously successful in her mastery of the key-board. We take the liberty of suspending judgment as to her capacity to play with feeling. She certainly displayed no taste on this occasion, excepting such as she had evidently acquired, and she was far from being faithful to her acquirements in her performance of the Chopin polonaise, a work that she submitted to a most unfeeling abuse, and did not interpret. She could not have been more fortunate in the piano she used; and we know not why, in any record of this concert, the Steinway grand should not be accorded a sincere recognition. Its perfect mechanism combining an unequalled charm and nobility was never more conspicuously displayed.

Home Journal

Mme. Helen Hopekirk.

145
This talented young pianist, whose portrait appears on the title page of this issue, was born near Edinburgh on the 20th of May, 1857. From the age of nine she studied the piano, and performed at a People's concert when only eleven years of age. For six years subsequent to this she studied under Mr. George Lichtenstein of Edinburgh, and in her seventeenth year (1874) played Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto with the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society, in a way that at once won her the warmest encomiums of the large audience.

Two years later, Mr. Hopekirk died, leaving as his last wish, a request for his daughter to complete her musical studies in Germany and in due course Miss Helen found herself a student of the Leipzig Conservatorium.

Here the master under whom she chiefly studied was our own Dr. Louis Maas, then one of the teachers of the Conservatory. For him she has always retained a warm affection, looking upon the time spent under his instruction as the turning point of her musical life.

Her brilliant career at the Conservatorium astonished even her friends. She was selected long before the usual time to play at one of the Conservatorium concerts, and in 1878 after finishing her course of study, she made her debut with Chopin's F minor Concerto at the Gewandhaus Concerts, and received a final ovation at the hands of the directors of the Conservatory, who presented her with a gold bracelet as a mark of esteem.

In England Miss Hopekirk made her first appearance at the Crystal Palace Concerts, and succeeded beyond expectation in securing the good will of the public and the press. Her success was followed by a series of pianoforte recitals, in which she confirmed the good opinion of her critics. Her subsequent career in London and the Provinces was an unbroken triumph.

In August 1882, Miss Hopekirk was married in Edinburgh, to Mr. W. A. Wilson, a well known musical amateur of that city, and occupied the winter of that year by a tour in her native country, which won her fresh laurels.

Her first appearance in this country was at the Boston Symphony Concert last month, when she secured the appreciation of her audience and scored a triumph which she has subsequently repeated in New York.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TRAGIC OVERTURE. op. 81. BRAHMS.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Judas Maccabaeus.) HÆNDEL.

SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 4, op. 60. BEETHOVEN.
Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo.—

INTRODUCTION AND RONDO CAPRICCIOSO
FOR VIOLIN. op. 28. (First time.) SAINT-SAËNS.

SONG WITH PIANO.
THE YOUNG NUN. SCHUBERT.

OVERTURE. (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.) WAGNER.

SOLOISTS:

MISS MARGUERITE HALL.

MR. ALFRED De SÈVE.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Judas Maccabeus.)

HÄNDEL.

RECIT.

Victorious hero! fame shall tell,
With her last breath, how Apollonius fell;
And all Samaria fled, by thee pursued
Through hills of carnage and a sea of blood;
While thy resistless prowess dealt around
With their own leader's sword, the deathful wound.
Thus, too, the haughty Seron, Syria's boast,
Before thee fell, with his unnumber'd host.

AIR.

So rapid thy course is,
Not numberless forces
Withstand thy all-conquering sword;
Though nations surround thee,
No power shall confound thee,
Till freedom again be restored.

SONG.

SCHUBERT.

THE YOUNG NUN.

The storm on the housetop in fury down pours,
Now rattle the rafters, now tremble the floors,
The lightning fast flashes, the thunder loud roars.
And dark is the night like the grave.—

Well and good, so fared it but lately with me,
The storm of my life was so headlong and free,
My frame like the house would as tremulous be,
Love flam'd like the flashes of lightning I see,
And dark was the soul, like the grave.

Thou mighty storm rage on thy boist'rous way,
My heart is quite peaceful, my night turned to day,
The bride for the bridegroom serenely will stay,
Her meek spirit glorious and pure
With infinite Love's tender ray.

Imploring I look and would ne'er be denied,
Come Bridegroom of Heav'n, come rescue Thy bride,
From all that on earth her soul's quiet has tried.
Hark, peacefully sounds from our steeple the bell!
I love its sweet music so well; its notes of eternity tell,
"Hallelujah."

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony at the concert of Saturday evening had many commendable characteristics. The orchestra shows with each week greater unity of feeling, and many effects of shading seem to produce themselves, so to speak, without the conductor being obliged obviously to exact them. This is now generally observable in the pianissimo, as also the crescendo, and on this occasion was made very manifest in the delivery by the violins of the theme of the adagio, which a solo instrument could not have delivered better. In the allegro vivace of the first movement the work of the middle parts was very clear and telling. The assumption of the adagio theme by the flute was very cold and colorless, however, and in the third movement the allegro vivace fell off very greatly in speed and in life, when the vigorous treatment of its opening by the composer had been subdued to softer voicing. Whether it be in Mr. Henschel's plan to do this, or whether a mezzo-forte carries, like Bob Acres's bullet, "a quietus with it," we do not know; but, as we have said before, even a slight relaxation seems to alter the value and character of the movement. The "Tragic" overture of Brahms, and the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" overture of Wagner, began and ended the concert, each played with breadth, power and finish.

Miss Margaret Hall sang twice. Her first selection was from "Judas Maccabæus,"—the recitative, "Victorious hero," and its consequent air, "So rapid thy course is,"—which she sang well, but could not deliver in full keeping with its character. The air was admirably phrased, and vocalized with much clearness, while the management of the breath in the long Handelian runs was most skilful. But in the recitative was the singer unequal to the task. Broad declamation and a vivid suggestion of the dramatic moments in the hero's career are absolutely essential to a proper presentment, and Miss Hall's sweet directness, almost cold in its absence of passion, could not make good the loss of these. Her second number,—Schubert's "Young Nun," which she sang in German,—was, however, thoroughly fine both in form and feeling, and buoyed up by Mr. Henschel's perfect accompaniment.

Mr. Alfred de Sève also contributed to the programme a solo number, which was an "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso," by Saint-Saëns, —opus 28,—now given here for the first time. The introduction, which is of a pensive cast and in the minor mode, very soon gives place to the principal theme, which has a marked phraseology; and which yet suggests somehow the "Suite Algérienne." This theme quickly passes into the rondo, and fairly loses itself in a maze of ornaments and flourishes and technical frills, which are yet so wrought together that the necessary fluency and movement of a rondo are not impeded. Mr. de Sève played with great brilliancy and facility; although he never lacked impetuosity, he never seemed quite so near running away from himself as he often does, and this greater steadiness was of great advantage to the artistic effect.

At the next concert a symphony new to Boston will be played. It is Volkmann's second, in B flat, opus 53. The overture will be Mozart's "Titus," and for a lighter novelty there will be given the ballet music to St. Saëns's "Henry VIII." Mr. George Magrath will appear as solo pianist, playing Hummel's B minor concerto, and Liszt's twelfth Hungarian rhapsody.

Notes.

The tenth of the Symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the soloists on the occasion being Miss Marguerite Hall, vocalist, and Mr. Alfred de Sève, violinist. The selections given were: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air, ("Judas Maccabæus;") Handel; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28, Saint Saëns; song with piano ("The Young Nun"), Schubert; overture ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg") Wagner. Mr. Henschel's orchestra was in capital condition, and did its share of the work in the most acceptable manner, the symphony, in especial, being remarkably well given. Miss Hall gave a great deal of pleasure by her vocalization, but was rather more successful in her delivery of Schubert's "Young Nun" than in the recitative and aria by Handel. She has a sweet, pure voice, which she managed with great skill, and a charming presence before an audience. She was recalled at the conclusion of each of her numbers. Mr. de Sève, as he always does, played with much brilliancy and power, and a large amount of dash. He worked his audience up to a great pitch of enthusiasm, and was fortunate enough to gain a double recall. The eleventh concert, to be given on Saturday evening next, will be made up of: Overture, "Titus," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; piano solo, "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 12, Liszt; ballet music, "Henry VIII.," Saint Saëns. The piano soloist will be Mr. George Magrath, of Baltimore.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The tenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being—
Tragic Overture, op. 81..... Brahms
Recitative and Air from "Judas Maccabæus"..... Handel
Symphony in B flat, No. 4..... Beethoven
Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for Violin..... Saint-Saëns
[First time.]
Song with Pianoforte:
"The Young Nun,"..... Schubert
Overture to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"..... Wagner.
Miss Marguerite Hall was the singer, and Mr. Alfred De Sève the violinist.

The over-crowded state of our columns forbids us saying as much as we could have wished about this concert. The orchestra maintained its now assured reputation for fine playing. The Brahms overture sounded grander than ever, and is surely one of the works by which the genius of the composer is destined to become more generally appreciated. Miss Hall, albeit that her voice is not quite large enough to hold its own against an orchestra in so vast a place as the Music Hall, sang charmingly, and Mr. De Sève played with all his wonted fire. The next programme includes:

Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," Mozart; concerto in B minor, Hummel; symphony in B-flat, Op. 53, Volkmann [new]; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 12, Liszt; ballet music from "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns. Mr. George Magrath will be the pianist.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Judas Maccabeus.)

HÄNDEL.

RECIT.

Victorious hero! fame shall tell,
With her last breath, how Apollonius fell;
And all Samaria fled, by thee pursued
Through hills of carnage and a sea of blood;
While thy resistless prowess dealt around
With their own leader's sword, the deathful wound.
Thus, too, the haughty Seron, Syria's boast,
Before thee fell, with his unnumber'd host.

AIR.

So rapid thy course is,
Not numberless forces
Withstand thy all-conquering sword;
Though nations surround thee,
No power shall confound thee,
Till freedom again be restored.

SONG.

SCHUBERT.

THE YOUNG NUN.

The storm on the housetop in fury down pours,
Now rattle the rafters, now tremble the floors,
The lightning fast flashes, the thunder loud roars,
And dark is the night like the grave.—

Well and good, so fared it but lately with me,
The storm of my life was so headlong and free,
My frame like the house would as tremulous be,
Love flam'd like the flashes of lightning I see,
And dark was the soul, like the grave.

Thou mighty storm rage on thy boist'rous way,
My heart is quite peaceful, my night turned to day,
The bride for the bridegroom serenely will stay,
Her meek spirit glorious and pure
With infinite Love's tender ray.

Imploring I look and would ne'er be denied,
Come Bridegroom of Heav'n, come rescue Thy bride,
From all that on earth her soul's quiet has tried.
Hark, peacefully sounds from our steeple the bell!
I love its sweet music so well; its notes of eternity tell,
"Hallelujah."

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance of Beethoven's fourth symphony at the concert of Saturday evening had many commendable characteristics. The orchestra shows with each week greater unity of feeling, and many effects of shading seem to produce themselves, so to speak, without the conductor being obliged obviously to exact them. This is now generally observable in the pianissimo, as also the in crescendo, and on this occasion was made very manifest in the delivery by the violins of the theme of the adagio, which a solo instrument could not have delivered better. In the allegro vivace of the first movement the work of the middle parts was very clear and telling. The assumption of the adagio theme by the flute was very cold and colorless, however, and in the third movement the allegro vivace fell off very greatly in speed and in life, when the vigorous treatment of its opening by the composer had been subdued to softer voicing. Whether it be in Mr. Henschel's plan to do this, or whether a mezzo-forte carries, like Bob Acres's bullet, "a quietus with it," we do not know; but, as we have said before, even a slight relaxation seems to alter the value and character of the movement. The "Tragic" overture of Brahms, and the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" overture of Wagner, began and ended the concert, each played with breadth, power and finish.

Miss Margaret Hall sang twice. Her first selection was from "Judas Maccabeus,"—the recitative, "Victorious hero," and its consequent air, "So rapid thy course is,"—which she sang well, but could not deliver in full keeping with its character. The air was admirably phrased, and vocalized with much clearness, while the management of the breath in the long Handelian runs was most skilful. But in the recitative was the singer unequal to the task. Broad declamation and a vivid suggestion of the dramatic moments in the hero's career are absolutely essential to a proper presentment, and Miss Hall's sweet directness, almost cold in its absence of passion, could not make good the loss of these. Her second number,—Schubert's "Young Nun," which she sang in German,—was, however, thoroughly fine both in form and feeling, and buoyed up by Mr. Henschel's perfect accompaniment.

Mr. Alfred de Sève also contributed to the programme a solo number, which was an "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso," by Saint-Saëns, —opus 28,—now given here for the first time. The introduction, which is of a pensive cast and in the minor mode, very soon gives place to the principal theme, which has a marked phraseology, and which yet suggests somehow the "Suite Algérienne." This theme quickly passes into the rondo, and fairly loses itself in a maze of ornaments and flourishes and technical frills, which are yet so wrought together that the necessary fluency and movement of a rondo are not impeded. Mr. de Sève played with great brilliancy and facility; although he never lacked impetuosity, he never seemed quite so near running away from himself as he often does, and this greater steadiness was of great advantage to the artistic effect.

At the next concert a symphony new to Boston will be played. It is Volkmann's second, in B flat, opus 53. The overture will be Mozart's "Titus," and for a lighter novelty there will be given the ballet music to St. Saëns's "Henry VIII." Mr. George Magrath will appear as solo pianist, playing Hummel's B minor concerto, and Liszt's twelfth Hungarian rhapsody.

Notes.

The tenth of the Symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the soloists on the occasion being Miss Marguerite Hall, vocalist, and Mr. Alfred de Sève, violinist. The selections given were: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air, ("Judas Maccabeus;") Handel; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28, Saint Saëns; song with piano ("The Young Nun"), Schubert; overture ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg") Wagner. Mr. Henschel's orchestra was in capital condition, and did its share of the work in the most acceptable manner, the symphony, in especial, being remarkably well given. Miss Hall gave a great deal of pleasure by her vocalization, but was rather more successful in her delivery of Schubert's "Young Nun" than in the recitative and aria by Handel. She has a sweet, pure voice, which she managed with great skill, and a charming presence before an audience. She was recalled at the conclusion of each of her numbers. Mr. de Sève, as he always does, played with much brilliancy and power, and a large amount of dash. He worked his audience up to a great pitch of enthusiasm, and was fortunate enough to gain a double recall. The eleventh concert, to be given on Saturday evening next, will be made up of: Overture, "Titus," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; piano solo, "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 12, Liszt; ballet music, "Henry VIII.," Saint Saëns. The piano soloist will be Mr. George Magrath, of Baltimore.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The tenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being—
Tragic Overture, op. 81..... Brahms
Recitative and Air from "Judas Maccabeus"..... Handel
Symphony in B flat, No. 4..... Beethoven
Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for Violin..... Saint-Saëns
[First time.]
Song with Pianoforte:
"The Young Nun,"..... Schubert
Overture to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"..... Wagner.
Miss Marguerite Hall was the singer, and Mr. Alfred De Sève the violinist.

The over-crowded state of our columns forbids us saying as much as we could have wished about this concert. The orchestra maintained its now assured reputation for fine playing. The Brahms overture sounded grander than ever, and is surely one of the works by which the genius of the composer is destined to become more generally appreciated. Miss Hall, albeit that her voice is not quite large enough to hold its own against an orchestra in so vast a place as the Music Hall, sang charmingly, and Mr. De Sève played with all his wonted fire. The next programme includes:

Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," Mozart; concerto in B minor, Hummel; symphony in B-flat, Op. 53, Volkmann [new]; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 12, Liszt; ballet music from "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns. Mr. George Magrath will be the pianist.

152

THE TENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—Aside from Monsieur De Séve's violin playing, which invariably excites awe, and Miss Marguerite Hall's singing, which, though not awe-exciting, barely came within the limits of being an artistic success,—aside from these two most excellent features of the tenth Boston Symphony concert, there is also a very appropriate acknowledgment to be made regarding it. We can justly record that the event was solemnized at the usual time and place. Some of the audience, as they departed from the hall just before the concert was over, actually appeared as though they had been to a prayer-meeting in behalf of the afflicted and distressed. Before the concert began there had been an actual gain made in the number of vacant seats, and at its conclusion there was even a smaller audience present than we have yet known to attend a Boston Symphony concert. The order of services, as the programme is commonly called, was mainly responsible for the adequate appreciation that the concert received. The selection was evidently made with a view of not exciting in any undue measure the recently acquired imperturbability of the conductor's many friends. At its head was placed "The Tragic Overture," by Brahms. No other conductor than the already lamented Mr. Henschel, now that his successor has just been chosen, could have conducted the "tragic overture" in a more fortunate mood. The entire orchestra played con amore and as one man. We cannot vouch for this statement, as we had been venturesome enough to enter the hall at the conclusion of the overture; but our authority is a highly respected member of the orchestra. Our own opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, this most accommodating member of the orchestra also informs us that Mr. Georg Henschel regarded the programme as exceptionally well arranged, and that all the orchestra said "Me too" to the opinion before it was actually decided to send it to the printers. Certain it is that in selecting this very satisfactory programme!—to Mr. Henschel and the members of the orchestra—a very original application may have been made of the time-worn axiom that a whole is equal to the sum of all its parts. Individually considered, each of the selections was of choice and classic worth, yet that the aggregate impression, according to the axiom, would correspond, none other than an artist of Mr. Henschel's most mathematical turn of mind could have anticipated. Aside from Brahms' "tragic overture" the orchestral selections were confined to the fourth symphony of Beethoven and Wagner's overture, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Neither one of these great works, the greatest of which was the symphony, should have been associated with the other upon the same programme. The effect of the association was one of dreariness, and even the fourth symphony was made to suffer its undue share of the lack of appreciation that so unmistakably prevailed. The overtures and symphony are well known works, and beyond a stereotyped recognition of the admirable playing by the orchestra we may leave this portion of the concert to enter upon a consideration of the soloists' efforts.

Mr. Alfred De Séve gave an astonishingly creditable performance of an "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saëns. Even a single hearing of the work enables us to acknowledge it as among the most interesting works of its class, and its many difficulties were very delightfully presented by Mr. De Séve. The warmth and fervency with which this young virtuoso interprets may sometimes appear excessive; but that they are also indicative of his possession of genius cannot reasonably be denied. He invariably plays from the heart, and his command of the instrument is marvellously skillful. While he is disinclined to appear before an audience with all that overfastidious regard for effect which the ordinary artist is prone to cultivate, it cannot be said of him that he fails to deliver himself up to his music with the utmost abandon. His effects are made with a genuine artistic sincerity to the promptings of his talent, and it is his rare fault that he will indulge in the utmost excess of expression, rather than appear to the reverse, inanimate and unsympathetic. Mr. De Séve was deservedly applauded with great enthusiasm. Miss Hall's numbers consisted of a Recitative and Aria from Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and Schubert's song, "The young man." The first named selection was given with all due finesse. The notes were accurately rendered, the phrasing was artistic, and the vocal methods excellent. The voice itself, however, was wholly inadequate in point of volume to the demands made upon it, and she sang without any of the expression that might have gained for her a notably artistic success. Miss Hall was warmly received and applauded. At the concert this evening Mr. George McGrath, pianist, will perform Hummel's concerto No. 2, op. 53, and the 12th Rhapsodie of Liszt.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The 10th programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given last evening, the selections being

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Recitative and air ("Judas Maccabæus").....Handel
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28...Saint-Saëns
Song with piano ("The Young Nun").....Schubert
Overture ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg").....Wagner

The notable success of the evening was made by Miss Marguerite Hall in the vocal numbers, and her merits found a recognition by the audience. Her voice, though not large in volume, is so true and pure and is used with such intelligence, that its effect was quite equal to the demands of her numbers. The Handel recitative was admirably phrased and the delivery of the aria, as well as the Schubert song, proved the singer's abilities to be of the best. Not a little added pleasure was given by the easy grace of the artist's stage presence, and the recalls after each selection were well deserved. The Saint-Saëns composition for violin was played by Mr. Alfred De Séve, who displayed his genius as well as his artistic defects in its interpretation. Much skill was shown by the player in the mastery of the technical difficulties of the selection, and his dash and fire aroused the enthusiasm of the audience, as it usually does whenever he appears as a soloist. The work of the orchestra was of a general excellence, and the symphony was given with marked success.

MUSIC.

Comics

BOSTON SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

The great pressure upon our columns at this holiday season forbids any but the briefest mention of last night's concert. Beethoven's Fourth symphony, not so great a work as its predecessor or successor, was well rendered, as also were the "Tragic Overture" by Brahms, and the overture "Meistersänger of Nürnberg"—although the time in the latter was too suddenly broadened at the close.

Miss Marguerite Hall, the vocalist of the concert, was overweighted in the Händelian number, but sang very beautifully and with a clear German enunciation, in Schubert's "Young Nun." Mr. De Leve, the violinist, achieved a triumph in a violin solo, and showed that his orchestral experience has improved his work greatly. He awakened great enthusiasm and was twice recalled.

There is a marked difference in the size and enthusiasm of the audiences at the public rehearsals, and the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Why should not the orchestra perform a double duty next season, and give light music for the masses, and classical selections for the unusually educated?

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on Saturday evening, the selections being as follows: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air ("Judas Maccabæus"), Handel; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28, Saint-Saëns; song with piano ("The Young Nun"), Schubert; overture ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg"), Wagner. The work of the orchestra was well performed throughout. The soloists of the evening were Miss Marguerite Hall, who sang exceedingly well the Schubert song, and also acceptably, but less successfully, the Handel aria. Mr. De Séve, as usual, played with great brilliancy and power, and was twice recalled with every demonstration of enthusiasm. The next concert will be given next Saturday evening. The soloist will be Mr. George McGrath of Baltimore, pianist, and the programme will be as follows: Overture, "Titus," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; piano solo, "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 12, Liszt; ballet music, "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns.

The London Musical World presumes the following will be interesting to Mr. Henschel: "After having been for ten years one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, W. Gericke will resign his post on the 1st of May, 1884, and go to Boston (United States), where he has accepted a long engagement to conduct the Grand Orchestral Concerts."

The rumor that the Philharmonic Society is to "resume business" at an early date has no foundation in fact. A very earnest effort will, however, undoubtedly be made, another season, to sustain a series of orchestral concerts other than those of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Higginson has it in his power not only to insure the further support of his own series of concerts, but to increase the interest in orchestral music, so as to do away with the necessity for the objectionable club system of maintaining such concerts. The most radical republican principles should be applied in the conduct of all public amusements, because these alone insure a healthy and reliable development of the public patronage.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSITY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: Certain ideas about violin playing, which for some time have been floating in my mind, took form at the last symphony concert, and I desire to commit them to your pages, in the hope that some of your many musical readers may clear away my difficulties, and set me right if I am in error.

The Brahms overture and the symphony seemed to me altogether noble and grand, calculated to arouse the highest emotions of the human soul. They are poems written by poets, with true poetic fire. But when we came to the piece by Saint-Saëns, it seemed as if we were in a different atmosphere. The aim of the composer apparently was to furnish an opportunity for a skilful violinist to show his manual dexterity. The necessity lay upon him to do this musically, and so throughout the piece were interspersed fine chords and bits of beautiful sound; but these were only the accompaniment, the setting of the dexterity.

Whether or not this was the aim of the composer, it is certain that the audience accepted this view of it. The enthusiasm which the performance awakened was manifestly sheer admiration of the brilliant facility displayed. Can we suppose that the same meed of praise would have been bestowed upon a composition full of "sweetness and light," fitted to inform the mind and elevate the heart? It is not likely. So imperatively did the piece demand technical skill, that one could not, if he tried, withdraw his attention from the exhibition of that skill, and fix it upon the music. He was held spell-bound by the display, just as he is fascinated at the circus by the performance of the man who tosses up knives and plates, neither breaking the plates nor cutting himself with the knives.

It may be said that the public demands this sort of thing of violin players. This is doubtless true, and in lyceum-lecture courses and popular concerts, it may be necessary to make concessions to this demand; but the symphony concerts ought not to give us what we like, but what is good for us. They should be a normal college of music, teaching only that which is highest and best, and ever striving to persuade us to like the finest things. The generosity of the founder has placed the concerts above the necessity of catering to popular taste.

Perhaps it may be well to add that I am not attacking the soloist of the last concert. Indeed, I greatly admire his playing. I have heard him play with true power and feeling. He is no more flagrant an offender than others. They are all whirled along in the same

152

THE TENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT
—Aside from Monsieur De Séve's violin playing, which invariably excites awe, and Miss Marguerite Hall's singing, which, though not awe-exciting, barely came within the limits of being an artistic success,—aside from these two most excellent features of the tenth Boston Symphony concert, there is also a very appropriate acknowledgment to be made regarding it. We can justly record that the event was solemnized at the usual time and place. Some of the audience, as they departed from the hall just before the concert was over, actually appeared as though they had been to a prayer-meeting in behalf of the afflicted and distressed. Before the concert began there had been an actual gain made in the number of vacant seats, and at its conclusion there was even a smaller audience present than we have yet known to attend a Boston Symphony concert. The order of services, as the programme is commonly called, was mainly responsible for the adequate appreciation that the concert received. The selection was evidently made with a view of not exciting in any undue measure the recently acquired imperturbability of the conductor's many friends. At its head was placed "The Tragic Overture," by Brahms. No other conductor than the already lamented Mr. Henschel, now that his successor has just been chosen, could have conducted the "tragic overture" in a more fortunate mood. The entire orchestra played con amore and as one man. We cannot vouch for this statement, as we had been venturesome enough to enter the hall at the conclusion of the overture; but our authority is a highly respected member of the orchestra. Our own opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, this most accommodating member of the orchestra also informs us that Mr. Georg Henschel regarded the programme as exceptionally well arranged, and that all the orchestra said "Me too" to the opinion before it was actually decided to send it to the printers. Certain it is that in selecting this very satisfactory programme!—to Mr. Henschel and the members of the orchestra—a very original application may have been made of the time-worn axiom that a whole is equal to the sum of all its parts. Individually considered, each of the selections was of choice and classic worth, yet that the aggregate impression, according to the axiom, would correspond, none other than an artist of Mr. Henschel's most mathematical turn of mind could have anticipated. Aside from Brahms' "tragic overture" the orchestral selections were confined to the fourth symphony of Beethoven and Wagner's overture, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Neither one of these great works, the greatest of which was the symphony, should have been associated with the other upon the same programme. The effect of the association was one of dreariness, and even the fourth symphony was made to suffer its undue share of the lack of appreciation that so unmistakably prevailed. The overtures and symphony are well known works, and beyond a stereotyped recognition of the admirable playing by the orchestra we may leave this portion of the concert to enter upon a consideration of the soloists' efforts.

Mr. Alfred De Séve gave an astonishingly creditable performance of an "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso" by Saint-Saëns. Even a single hearing of the work enables us to acknowledge it as among the most interesting works of its class, and its many difficulties were very delightfully presented by Mr. De Séve. The warmth and fervency with which this young virtuoso interprets may sometimes appear excessive; but that they are also indicative of his possession of genius cannot reasonably be denied. He invariably plays from the heart, and his command of the instrument is marvellously skillful. While he is disinclined to appear before an audience with all that overfastidious regard for effect which the ordinary artist is prone to cultivate, it cannot be said of him that he fails to deliver himself up to his music with the utmost abandon. His effects are made with a genuine artistic sincerity to the promptings of his talent, and it is his rare fault that he will indulge in the utmost excess of expression, rather than appear to the reverse, inanimate and unsympathetic. Mr. De Séve was deservedly applauded with great enthusiasm. Miss Hall's numbers consisted of a Recitative and Aria from Handel's "Judas Maccabaeus" and Schubert's song, "The young man." The first named selection was given with all due finesse. The notes were accurately rendered, the phrasing was artistic, and the vocal methods excellent. The voice itself, however, was wholly inadequate in point of volume to the demands made upon it, and she sang without any of the expression that might have gained for her a notably artistic success. Miss Hall was warmly received and applauded. At the concert this evening Mr. George Magrath, pianist, will perform Hummel's concerto No. 2, op. 53, and the 12th Rhapsodie of Liszt.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The 10th programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given last evening, the selections being

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Recitative and air ("Judas Maccabaeus").....Handel
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28...Saint-Saëns
Song with piano ("The Young Nun").....Schubert
Overture ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg").....Wagner

The notable success of the evening was made by Miss Marguerite Hall in the vocal numbers, and her merits found a recognition by the audience. Her voice, though not large in volume, is so true and pure and is used with such intelligence, that its effect was quite equal to the demands of her numbers. The Handel recitative was admirably phrased and the delivery of the aria, as well as the Schubert song, proved the singer's abilities to be of the best. Not a little added pleasure was given by the easy grace of the artist's stage presence, and the recalls after each selection were well deserved. The Saint-Saëns composition for violin was played by Mr. Alfred De Séve, who displayed his genius as well as his artistic defects in its interpretation. Much skill was shown by the player in the mastery of the technical difficulties of the selection, and his dash and fire aroused the enthusiasm of the audience, as it usually does whenever he appears as a soloist. The work of the orchestra was of a general excellence, and the symphony was given with marked success.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONIC CONCERT.

The great pressure upon our columns at this holiday season forbids any but the briefest mention of last night's concert. Beethoven's Fourth symphony, not so great a work as its predecessor or successor, was well rendered, as also were the "Tragic Overture" by Brahms, and the overture "Meistersänger of Nürnberg"—although the time in the latter was too suddenly broadened at the close.

Miss Marguerite Hall, the vocalist of the concert, was overweighted in the Händelian number, but sang very beautifully and with a clear German enunciation, in Schubert's "Young Nun." Mr. De Séve, the violinist, achieved a triumph in a violin solo, and showed that his orchestral experience has improved his work greatly. He awakened great enthusiasm and was twice recalled.

There is a marked difference in the size and enthusiasm of the audiences at the public rehearsals, and the Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Why should not the orchestra perform a double duty next season, and give light music for the masses, and classical selections for the unusually educated?

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on Saturday evening, the selections being as follows: Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; recitative and air ("Judas Maccabaeus"), Handel; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin, op. 28, Saint-Saëns; song with piano ("The Young Nun"), Schubert; overture ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg"), Wagner. The work of the orchestra was well performed throughout. The soloists of the evening were Miss Marguerite Hall, who sang exceedingly well the Schubert song, and also acceptably, but less successfully, the Handel aria. Mr. De Séve, as usual, played with great brilliancy and power, and was twice recalled with every demonstration of enthusiasm. The next concert will be given next Saturday evening. The soloist will be Mr. George McGrath of Baltimore, pianist, and the programme will be as follows: Overture, "Titus," Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; piano solo, "Rhapsodie Hongroise," No. 12, Liszt; ballet music, "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns.

The London Musical World presumes the following will be interesting to Mr. Henschel: "After having been for ten years one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, W. Gericke will resign his post on the 1st of May, 1884, and go to Boston (United States), where he has accepted a long engagement to conduct the Grand Orchestral Concerts."

The rumor that the Philharmonic Society is to "resume business" at an early date has no foundation in fact. A very earnest effort will, however, undoubtedly be made, another season, to sustain a series of orchestral concerts other than those of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Higginson has it in his power not only to insure the further support of his own series of concerts, but to increase the interest in orchestral music, so as to do away with the necessity for the objectionable club system of maintaining such concerts. The most radical republican principles should be applied in the conduct of all public amusements, because these alone insure a healthy and reliable development of the public patronage.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSITY. Continued

To the Editor of the Transcript: Certain ideas about violin playing, which for some time have been floating in my mind, took form at the last symphony concert, and I desire to commit them to your pages, in the hope that some of your many musical readers may clear away my difficulties, and set me right if I am in error.

The Brahms overture and the symphony seemed to me altogether noble and grand, calculated to arouse the highest emotions of the human soul. They are poems written by poets, with true poetic fire. But when we came to the piece by Saint-Saëns, it seemed as if we were in a different atmosphere. The aim of the composer apparently was to furnish an opportunity for a skilful violinist to show his manual dexterity. The necessity lay upon him to do this musically, and so throughout the piece were interspersed fine chords and bits of beautiful sound; but these were only the accompaniment, the setting of the dexterity.

Whether or not this was the aim of the composer, it is certain that the audience accepted this view of it. The enthusiasm which the performance awakened was manifestly sheer admiration of the brilliant facility displayed. Can we suppose that the same meed of praise would have been bestowed upon a composition full of "sweetness and light," fitted to inform the mind and elevate the heart? It is not likely. So imperatively did the piece demand technical skill, that one could not, if he tried, withdraw his attention from the exhibition of that skill, and fix it upon the music. He was held spell-bound by the display, just as he is fascinated at the circus by the performance of the man who tosses up knives and plates, neither breaking the plates nor cutting himself with the knives.

It may be said that the public demands this sort of thing of violin players. This is doubtless true, and in lyceum-lecture courses and popular concerts it may be necessary to make concessions to this demand; but the symphony concerts ought not to give us what we like, but what is good for us. They should be a normal college of music, teaching only that which is highest and best, and ever striving to persuade us to like the finest things. The generosity of the founder has placed the concerts above the necessity of catering to popular taste.

Perhaps it may be well to add that I am not attacking the soloist of the last concert. Indeed, I greatly admire his playing. I have heard him play with true power and feeling. He is no more flagrant an offender than others. They are all whirled along in the same current. The pressure is upon them all to turn aside from genuine violin playing, the highest form of instrumental music, to become sensational fiddlers, contortionists and clowns. Let the symphony concerts help them to resist this pressure, not encourage them to yield to it. x.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSITY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I have read with much pleasure in your paper of the 24th the remarks of "X." upon the piece selected for the violin solo at a late symphony concert. It has seemed to me of late years that most of our solo performers, whether upon the violin or piano, devote themselves chiefly to trying to astonish their hearers by the display of skill in the execution of difficult and involved music, or that with much ornamentation; so that the beauties of tone and expression are almost lost sight of, and the delight to be derived from the intense feeling which a master can express, especially in the smooth, evenly drawn notes of a violin, is almost wholly lost.

I desire to second "X.'s" motion, that we have less virtuosity and more music. y.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSITY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I have read with much interest some correspondence in your interesting paper in regard to the merit of Saint-Saëns's "Andante and Rondo," and of its performance by Mr. De Sève at one of the symphony concerts. One or two of the correspondents may be honest enough, and I respect their convictions; but the letter signed "Z." seems to me to be nothing but an attack upon Mr. De Sève and on the Boston critics in general.

Whether I should give it the importance it deserves is very hard to decide, as under fictitious initials you never know whether you are dealing with a competent person or not. Who is "Z.," to set up a judgment against the united voice of critics and public? It must be Zero! However, the article of "Z." is so in error from the beginning to the end, that, in justice to Mr. De Sève, the Boston critics and the public in general, I feel duty bound to throw down the gauntlet to my unknown savant, and prove to him that it is better to be wise and silent than to lay himself open to ridicule by trying to reach the top of a church steeple on skates.

The Andante and Rondo of Saint-Saëns belongs to the modern classics; it was dedicated and composed for Sarasate, one of the leading violinists of the day. It was performed for the first time by him in Paris, the composer being present at its first performance at the classical concerts directed by Pasdeloup, an organization which has existed over twenty years, and one of the foremost in Europe.

It was my privilege to hear its first performance and many others afterwards, and being personally acquainted with both the author and its interpreter, I can without presumption make a comparison of its performance in Boston and Paris, and furthermore give credit to Mr. De Sève for his rendition of it.

According to "Z." the piece was played in an acrobatic manner, etc., etc. There were no difficulties in it! Any pupil could play it! I acknowledge that pupils can play at such works, but how? Maybe to the liking of "Z.," who sees nothing but a manufactured work where a bow should go up one way and come down another, viz., a regulated machine devoid of individuality and ideas. If such are "Z.'s" ideas of virtuosity, then the sooner he gives up the trade of critic the better.

He further accuses Mr. De Sève of using effects on the fourth string similar to Paganini's "Witches' Dance." According to that, every piece that has similar passages must be classified as imitation of that work. He seems to forget that there are hundreds of pieces with similar effects, but which are naturally different on account of their rhythm, time and character. Will "Z." allow that a virtuoso has any right at all to any individuality, and does he allow him any personal genius in the rendition of a masterpiece? I will put his own quotation, which speaks for itself:

"Where is the director who finds it easy to make his soloist play or sing as he wills it?"

Scene at Her Majesty's Opera. Mme. Patti, prima donna; Signor Arditì, conductor.

Mme. Patti—"Please, signor, don't hurry me so much in my rallentando."

Signor Arditì—"Madame, you must sing as I beat the time!"

Where, oh where is such a conductor? In what part of the globe can he be found? Decidedly, our friend "Z." must have come very recently from some country choir, and he must be yet under the influence of that dreadful stick—as they call it in those places. The idea of a virtuoso or a singer being under the control and restraint of a conductor is a novel one, and I would advise our friend "Z." to get a patent for it. In regard to his pretended arpeggios à la Mendelssohn, I will merely say that they do not exist in Saint-Saëns's Rondo, and they are specially written to be played each note with a separate bow. They were played so by Sarasate, and will ever be by any artist who possesses enough experience and musical intelligence to understand the meaning of that particular passage. If Saint-Saëns meant it to be so from the start it should be so, and the opinion of Mr. "Z." or others is of very little consequence in the matter. In regard to Mr. De Sève's performance of the Rondo, it was manly and artistic, and it compared very favorably with the performance of the same by the artist for whom it was made.

CALIXA LAVALLEE.

Music Hall.

883-84.

BOSTON. Key-note Dec. 22, 83

Dec. 17.—The wind is generally tempered to the shorn lamb, but this week not only the wind (both brass and wood wind), but the strings also have been tempered to the lazy reviewer. There has been but one orchestral concert, that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at this the Beethoven Fourth Symphony, not as fine a work as either the third or the fifth, was given. The full programme was as follows:

Tragic Overture, op. 81 Brahms
Recitative and Air. (Judas Maccabæus.) Händel
MISS MARGUERITE HALL.

Symphony in B flat No. 4, op. 60 Beethoven
Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo—

Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin, op. 28.
(First time.) Saint-Saëns
MR. A. DE LEVE.

Song with Piano, "The Young Nun" Schubert
MISS HALL.

Overture. (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.) Wagner

In the production of Brahms' works, Mr. Henschel performs a labor of love, for not only is he a great admirer of the master's works, but he is his intimate friend as well. Naturally his readings of the works are ex cathedra. But a few slips in horns and wood-wind were noticeable in the latter part of the overture.

The Symphony was well given. In fact, in all recent performances, the orchestra has shown itself an admirable one, far in advance of any that Boston has ever possessed before, this being a natural result of the three years steady work. Although changes have taken place in some of its departments, it still practically remains the same, and begins to be what Boston has so long hoped for—a permanent organization. When

Mr. Henschel has once left Boston (which he does next season), the critics who have looked upon him as the evil principle, the uprooter of all that was good in Boston's music, will begin to say on the principle De mortuis nil nisi bonum, that he has done much permanent good here; perhaps as much as any one man did in Boston. It is certain however that his growth came slowly. The first year he not only conducted badly but had a great many impractical theories about the platforms, rearrangement of orchestra, etc., etc. One by one he has abandoned these, and now he takes rank as a good organizer, and is attempting earnestly to become a faithful conductor. But to return to our muttons. The minuet was weak in the tutti at first because of ragged attack. The trio was excellently given. The last movement was blurred at the very end.

Miss Hall was the vocalist. One does not know how to call this young lady. At first she burst forth as Miss Daisy Hall, and then became metamorphosed into a plain (yet not plain, because she is quite the reverse), Miss Margaret Hall and now she is a Miss Marguerite Hall. She may yet arrive to be Fraulein Gretchen Hall, for aught I know. Of course it's all the same thing, but I don't think I should like to pose successively as Luigi, Ludovic, Ludwig, Lewis and Louis C. Elson.

Be that as it may, Shakespeare says a rose under any stage name would smell as sweet, and what's true of a rose must also hold true of a daisy, and the lady sang very sweetly and intelligently in the "Young Nun." I could have borne a little more crescendo in the first rising sequences of the song, but the ecstatic ending was well nigh perfect.

ss importance to the observation, than he placed on tion of the work. In this im an already well rooted wned singers without any ample, such certainly celebrated-roeder-Devrient and Titat-er to make use of the word as employs in the German s word grated horribly up n mprehend the possibility of n a sound. As to the far cast for the High Priest, umstantially detailed lesson

AT 8, P. M.

BRAHMS.

HÄNDEL.

BEETHOVEN.

SAINT-SAËNS.

SCHUBERT.

WAGNER.

De SÈVE.

current. The pressure is upon them all to turn aside from genuine violin playing, the highest form of instrumental music, to become sensational fiddlers, contortionists and clowns. Let the symphony concerts help them to resist this pressure, not encourage them to yield to it. x.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSITY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I have read with much pleasure in your paper of the 24th the remarks of "X." upon the piece selected for the violin solo at a late symphony concert. It has seemed to me of late years that most of our solo performers, whether upon the violin or piano, devote themselves chiefly to trying to astonish their hearers by the display of skill in the execution of difficult and involved music, or that with much ornamentation; so that the beauties of tone and expression are almost lost sight of, and the delight to be derived from the intense feeling which a master can express, especially in the smooth, evenly drawn notes of a violin, is almost wholly lost.

I desire to second "X.'s" motion, that we have less virtuosity and more music. y.

VIOLIN VIRTUOSITY.

To the Editor of the Transcript: I have read with much interest some correspondence in your interesting paper in regard to the merit of Saint-Saëns's "Andante and Rondo," and of its performance by Mr. De Sève at one of the symphony concerts. One or two of the correspondents may be honest enough, and I respect their convictions; but the letter signed "Z." seems to me to be nothing but an attack upon Mr. De Sève and on the Boston critics in general.

Whether I should give it the importance it deserves is very hard to decide, as under fictitious initials you never know whether you are dealing with a competent person or not. Who is "Z.," to set up a judgment against the united voice of critics and public? It must be Zero! However, the article of "Z." is so in error from the beginning to the end, that, in justice to Mr. De Sève, the Boston critics and the public in general, I feel duty bound to throw down the gauntlet to my unknown savant, and prove to him that it is better to be wise and silent than to lay himself open to ridicule by trying to reach the top of a church steeple on skates.

The Andante and Rondo of Saint-Saëns belongs to the modern classics; it was dedicated and composed for Sarasate, one of the leading violinists of the day. It was performed for the first time by him in Paris, the composer being present at its first performance at the classical concerts directed by Pasdeloup, an organization which has existed over twenty years, and one of the foremost in Europe.

It was my privilege to hear its first performance and many others afterwards, and being personally acquainted with both the author and its interpreter, I can without presumption make a comparison of its performance in Boston and Paris, and furthermore give credit to Mr. De Sève for his rendition of it.

According to "Z." the piece was played in an acrobatic manner, etc., etc. There were no difficulties in it! Any pupil could play it! I acknowledge that pupils can play at such works, but how? Maybe to the liking of "Z.," who sees nothing but a manufactured work where a bow should go up one way and come down another, viz., a regulated machine devoid of individuality and ideas. If such are "Z.'s" ideas of virtuosity, then the sooner he gives up the trade of critic the better.

He further accuses Mr. De Sève of using effects on the fourth string similar to Paganini's "Witches' Dance." According to that, every piece that has similar passages must be classified as imitation of that work. He seems to forget that there are hundreds of pieces with similar effects, but which are naturally different on account of their rhythm, time and character. Will "Z." allow that a virtuoso has any right at all to any individuality, and does he allow him any personal genius in the rendition of a masterpiece? I will put his own quotation, which speaks for itself:

"Where is the director who finds it easy to make his soloist play or sing as he wills it?"

Scene at Her Majesty's Opera. Mme. Patti, prima donna; Signor Arditi, conductor.

Mme. Patti—"Please, signor, don't hurry me so much in my rallentando."

Signor Arditi—"Madame, you must sing as I beat the time!"

Where, oh where is such a conductor? In what part of the globe can he be found? Decidedly, our friend "Z." must have come very recently from some country choir, and he must be yet under the influence of that dreadful stick—as they call it in those places. The idea of a virtuoso or a singer being under the control and restraint of a conductor is a novel one, and I would advise our friend "Z." to get a patent for it. In regard to his pretended arpeggios à la Mendelssohn, I will merely say that they do not exist in Saint-Saëns's Rondo, and they are specially written to be played each note with a separate bow. They were played so by Sarasate, and will ever be by any artist who possesses enough experience and musical intelligence to understand the meaning of that particular passage. If Saint-Saëns meant it to be so from the start it should be so, and the opinion of Mr. "Z." or of very little consequence in the matter regard to Mr. De Sève's performance. Rondo, it was manly and artistic, and compared very favorably with the performance of the same by the artist for whom it was written.

CALIXA LAVA

BOSTON

Dec. 17.—The wind is generally temperate, but not only the wind (both brass and woodwind) have been tempered to the lazy reviewer. The Beethoven Fourth Symphony, not as the fifth, was given. The full program

Tragic Overture, op. 81. Brahms
Recitative and Air. (Judas Maccabæus.) Handel
MISS MARGUERITE HALL.

Symphony in B flat No. 4, op. 60. Beethoven
Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo—
Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin, op. 28.
(First time.) Saint-Saëns
MR. A. DE LEVE.

Song with Piano, "The Young Nun" Schubert
MISS HALL.

Overture. (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.) Wagner

In the production of Brahms' works, Mr. Henschel performs a labor of love, for not only is he a great admirer of the master's works, but he is his intimate friend as well. Naturally his readings of the works are ex cathedra. But a few slips in horns and wood-wind were noticeable in the latter part of the overture.

The Symphony was well given. In fact, in all recent performances, the orchestra has shown itself an admirable one, far in advance of any that Boston has ever possessed before, this being a natural result of the three years steady work. Although changes have taken place in some of its departments, it still practically remains the same, and begins to be what Boston has so long hoped for—a permanent organization. When

Mr. Henschel has once left Boston (which he does next season), the critics who have looked upon him as the evil principle, the uprooter of all that was good in Boston's music, will begin to say on the principle De mortuis nil nisi bonum, that he has done much permanent good here; perhaps as much as any one man did in Boston. It is certain however that his growth came slowly. The first year he not only conducted badly but had a great many impractical theories about the platforms, rearrangement of orchestra, etc., etc. One by one he has abandoned these, and now he takes rank as a good organizer, and is attempting earnestly to become a faithful conductor. But to return to our muttons. The minuet was weak in the tutti at first because of ragged attack. The trio was excellently given. The last movement was blurred at the very end.

Miss Hall was the vocalist. One does not know how to call this young lady. At first she burst forth as Miss Daisy Hall, and then became metamorphosed into a plain (yet not plain, because she is quite the reverse), Miss Margaret Hall and now she is a Miss Marguerite Hall. She may yet arrive to be Fraulein Gretchen Hall, for aught I know. Of course it's all the same thing, but I don't think I should like to pose successively as Luigi, Ludovic, Ludwig, Lewis and Louis C. Elson.

Be that as it may, Shakespeare says a rose under any stage name would smell as sweet, and what's true of a rose must also hold true of a daisy, and the lady sang very sweetly and intelligently in the "Young Nun." I could have borne a little more crescendo in the first rising sequences of the song, but the ecstatic ending was well nigh perfect.

Candor compels me to state, however, that the vocalist was not so successful in the Handelian aria. Her voice was too explosive, and had too little sustained power to cope with so ambitious a work.

Her German pronunciation was very clear, and deserves praise. Mr. De Leve captured the entire audience by the brilliancy of his work. His tone might be richer and fuller, and he might shake himself less while performing intricate passages, but he has certainly advanced wonderfully since he has served an orchestral apprenticeship. He is a violinist of the Vieuxtemps school (isn't that the same as the "old time" school) and his technique is almost marvelous. But he used to be as erratic a charger as Joseffy was some years ago, and at his former appearance at these concerts there ensued a musical race which was interesting. Mr. Henschel was a rapid conductor, but De Leve was lightning itself, and as regards that, even Henschel was a non-conductor, so the violinist came in about three bars ahead, with everybody concerned in a profuse perspiration. But as Moliere has it, nous avons changé tout cela, and, after a year's work in this same orchestra, Mr. De Leve proves that he is going to become a good musician as well as a fine virtuoso.

AT 8, P. M.

BRAHMS.

HÄNDEL.

BEETHOVEN.

SAINT-SAËNS.

SCHUBERT.

WAGNER.

De SÈVE.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Titus.) MOZART.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in B minor, op. 89. HUMMEL.
Allegro moderato.—Larghetto. Finale (Vivace.)

SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 2, op. 53. VOLKMANN.
(First time.) (Died Oct. 29th, 1883.)
Allegro vivace.—Allegretto.—
Andantino; Allegro; Allegro vivace. Più mosso; Presto.—

PIANO SOLO.

BALLAD in F minor, No. 4, op. 52. CHOPIN.

BALLET MUSIC. (Henry VIII.) SAINT-SAËNS.
(New. First time.)
Introduction. Entrée des Clans.—Idylle Ecossaise.—
Danse de la Gipsy.—Gigue et Final.

SOLOIST:

MR. GEORGE MAGRATH.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito".....Mozart
Concerto in B minor.....Hummel
Symphony in B-flat, op. 53.....Volkmann
(First time in Boston.)

Ballade in F minor, opus 52.....Chopin
Ballet-Music from "Henry VIII.".....Saint-Saëns

Mr. George Magrath was the pianist.

The new symphony is a work well calculated to increase interest in the composer, whose unhappy life was known to so few up to the time of his death, a few months ago. The symphony is virtually in four movements, although the last two are connected together, and contain several changes of tempo. The impression the work makes at the first hearing is mainly that of great vigor and clearness of form. The technical skill shown in the composition is very considerable; although the themes are worked out with great elaboration, they are first presented, in every case, with such unmistakable clearness, with such laconic conciseness, that the ear grasps them at once, and they impress themselves so firmly upon the memory, that to trace their ensuing development through all the mazes of contrapuntal elaboration is at once easy and delightful. In all modern music we can recall to mind no such brief and concise exposition of thematic material as the "first part" of the first movement of this symphony. The most strongly characterized themes are the quaint and charming motive of the second movement, and the delightful little melody given out by the oboe, and repeated in canon by the oboe and first horn in the third; this same melody, by a change of tempo and rhythm, becomes a brilliant tarantella-like dance tune, and serves as the theme for the finale also. Albeit that Volkmann shows a certain predilection for what might now be called archaic methods of development (the contra-dance finale, of itself, recalls Haydn's fondness for last movements of the peasant sort), and the dogged persistency with which he hammers away at his themes smacks strongly of the classic days of yore, there is an innate vigor and vivacity in this work which stamps it at once as something higher than mere Kapellmeister music. It takes one captive, and carries one away. The instrumentation is stout and often brilliant, but impresses one as the work of a man who had studied the best classic and modern models, but had not had much opportunity of hearing his own orchestral compositions performed. The Saint-Saëns ballet music, based almost wholly upon Scotch motives, is as brilliant as need be. It often makes a positively tremendous noise, after the prevailing French fashion (for Saint-Saëns and Massenet have thrown Wagner into the shade by their feats in literally stunning orchestration), but there is an indescribable charm and quasi-savage grace in it. Mr. Magrath, the young pianist, has a clean and facile technique, although not great strength. His tone is better suited to a small hall than to the Music Hall. His phrasing is in general excellent, and he has the rare faculty of getting all the value out of a beautiful and expressive melodic phrase by playing it with the utmost simplicity. This faculty is a precious gift, and not to be acquired. Except for a certain poverty of tone, and a lack of vigor and snap of accent in the last movement, his playing of the Hummel concerto was delightful; artistic to a high degree. In the Chopin Ballade, however, he showed his immaturity, and his playing sounded rather tame and schoolboy-like. But the general impression he made was excellent, and that he has uncommon talent was evident. The orchestra played capitally throughout the concert, saving certain phrases for wind instruments in the Volkmann symphony, which phrases we suspect of being very awkward to play at all.

The next programme is: Italian Overture, Schubert; Cavatina from "Figaro," Mozart; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Brahms; Song, —, Henschel; "Le Bal," from Fantastic Symphony, Berlioz.

Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the singer.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of Saturday night last offered two new numbers, and a new pianist for the consideration of the audience. Of the new music, first came the second symphony, — in B flat, opus 53, — written by Volkmann, whose death occurred but a couple of months ago. Regarded in its entirety, this work is more interesting than entertaining, and will rather win its author respect than give its hearers delight. The first movement, an allegro vivace, is based on a very slender melodic foundation, and there are more evidences of skill than of spontaneity in the construction. There is not much variety of color to it, nor much richness of tone, and a rather high pressure is kept up all through it. It is not exactly dry, but it is certainly not encouraging as the initial movement of a symphonic work. But the second movement, an allegretto, is much more agreeable. Its theme, which has something of the cast of courtly dance music, has a quaint accent, and it is nicely tempered in tone between major and minor keys; comparatively little heavy brass is used in it, and the contrasts between the strings alone and the strings with the wooden wind are ingenious and pretty. The second half of the symphony is one long movement, in which five changes of time succeed one another in a gradual acceleration from andantino to presto, and contains some bright and attractive writing, which we cannot now pause to analyze. The other new number was the ballet music written for his "Henry VIII." by Saint-Saëns, and thus divided: "Introduction; Entrée des Claus; Idylle Ecossaise; Danse de la Gypsy; Gigue et Finale." In these several sections, each sharply defined in measure and flavor, Saint-Saëns has seized the Scotch rhythm and the Scotch spirit and held them fast. To give his work a greater "local color" he has even introduced into it some of the Scotch airs themselves, which appear most prominently in the second and third portions. The Gypsy dance is perhaps the most individual in its impression, the general effect which it shares with the other movements being accentuated by a more wild and barbaric ring in a phrase here and there. This music will well bear a repetition on some evening when there are fewer counter attractions to the regular concert.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito".....Mozart
Concerto in B minor.....Hummel
Symphony in B-flat, op. 53.....Volkmann
(First time in Boston.)
Ballade in F minor, opus 52.....Chopin
Ballet-Music from "Henry VIII.".....Saint-Saëns

Mr. George Magrath was the pianist.

The new symphony is a work well calculated to increase interest in the composer, whose unhappy life was known to so few up to the time of his death, a few months ago. The symphony is virtually in four movements, although the last two are connected together, and contain several changes of tempo. The impression the work makes at the first hearing is mainly that of great vigor and clearness of form. The technical skill shown in the composition is very considerable; although the themes are worked out with great elaboration, they are first presented, in every case, with such unmistakable clearness, with such laconic conciseness, that the ear grasps them at once, and they impress themselves so firmly upon the memory, that to trace their ensuing development through all the mazes of contrapuntal elaboration is at once easy and delightful. In all modern music we can recall to mind no such brief and concise exposition of thematic material as the "first part" of the first movement of this symphony. The most strongly characterized themes are the quaint and charming motive of the second movement, and the delightful little melody given out by the oboe, and repeated in canon by the oboe and first horn in the third; this same melody, by a change of tempo and rhythm, becomes a brilliant tarantella-like dance tune, and serves as the theme for the finale also. Albeit that Volkmann shows a certain predilection for what might now be called archaic methods of development (the contra-dance finale, of itself, recalls Haydn's fondness for last movements of the peasant sort), and the dogged persistency with which he hammers away at his themes smacks strongly of the classic days of yore, there is an innate vigor and vivacity in this work which stamps it at once as something higher than mere Kapellmeister music. It takes one captive, and carries one away. The instrumentation is stout and often brilliant, but impresses one as the work of a man who had studied the best classic and modern models, but had not had much opportunity of hearing his own orchestral compositions performed. The Saint-Saëns ballet music, based almost wholly upon Scotch motives, is as brilliant as need be. It often makes a positively tremendous noise, after the prevailing French fashion (for Saint-Saëns and Massenet have thrown Wagner into the shade by their feats in literally stunning orchestration), but there is an indescribable charm and quasi-savage grace in it. Mr. Magrath, the young pianist, has a clean and facile technique, although not great strength. His tone is better suited to a small hall than to the Music Hall. His phrasing is in general excellent, and he has the rare faculty of getting all the value out of a beautiful and expressive melodic phrase by playing it with the utmost simplicity. This faculty is a precious gift, and not to be acquired. Except for a certain poverty of tone, and a lack of vigor and snap of accent in the last movement, his playing of the Hummel concerto was delightful; artistic to a high degree. In the Chopin Ballade, however, he showed his immaturity, and his playing sounded rather tame and schoolboy-like. But the general impression he made was excellent, and that he has uncommon talent was evident. The orchestra played capitally throughout the concert, saving certain phrases for wind instruments in the Volkmann symphony, which phrases we suspect of being very awkward to play at all.

The next programme is: Italian Overture, Schubert; Cavatina from "Figaro," Mozart; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Brahms; Song, —, Henschel; "Le Bal," from Fantastic Symphony, Berlioz.

Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the singer.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of Saturday night last offered two new numbers, and a new pianist for the consideration of the audience. Of the new music, first came the second symphony, — in B flat, opus 53, — written by Volkmann, whose death occurred but a couple of months ago. Regarded in its entirety, this work is more interesting than entertaining, and will rather win its author respect than give its hearers delight. The first movement, an allegro vivace, is based on a very slender melodic foundation, and there are more evidences of skill than of spontaneity in the construction. There is not much variety of color to it, nor much richness of tone, and a rather high pressure is kept up all through it. It is not exactly dry, but it is certainly not encouraging as the initial movement of a symphonic work. But the second movement, an allegretto, is much more agreeable. Its theme, which has something of the cast of country dance music, has a quaint accent, and it is nicely tempered in tone between major and minor keys; comparatively little heavy brass is used in it, and the contrasts between the strings alone and the strings with the wooden wind are ingenious and pretty. The second half of the symphony is one long movement, in which five changes of time succeed one another in a gradual acceleration from andantino to presto, and contains some bright and attractive writing, which we cannot now pause to analyze. The other new number was the ballet music written for his "Henry VIII." by Saint Saëns, and thus divided: "Introduction; Entrée des Claus; Idylle Ecossaise; Danse de la Gypsy; Gigue et Finale." In these several sections, each sharply defined in measure and flavor, Saint Saëns has seized the Scotch rhythm and the Scotch spirit and held them fast. To give his work a greater "local color" he has even introduced into it some of the Scotch airs themselves, which appear most prominently in the second and third portions. The Gypsy dance is perhaps the most individual in its impression, the general effect which it shares with the other movements being accentuated by a more wild and barbaric ring in a phrase here and there. This music will well bear a repetition on some evening when there are fewer counter attractions to the regular concert.

The stranger of the evening was Mr. George Magrath of Cincinnati, pianist, who is a Stuttgart graduate, and has also spent some time in London, where on one occasion he played Rubinstein's D minor concerto at a Crystal Palace concert. His first selection was Hummel's B minor concerto, opus 89, in which he showed nice taste and nice technique; everything clear, but nothing fervid; fine intellectuality and refined sentiment, but not power and not great depth. His technique appeared admirably suited to the limpid fluency of Hummel, and his touch, although, as we have just said, not forceful, gave good intelligence to the thoughts and to their language. Later in the evening he played Chopin's Ballade in F minor, opus 52, No. 4, but to less acceptance. The reading was as neat as could be desired, but it was too cool and unmodified in color, so that the long ballad, with all its variety, went on to its end, as if every new phase in its diction were but a repetition of a twice-told tale.

At the next concert Mrs. Henschel will sing a cavatina from the "Nozze di Figaro," and a manuscript song by Mr. Henschel. The orchestral selections will be Brahms's first symphony, Schubert's Italian overture, and "Le Bal," from Berlioz's Fantastic symphony. It is positively settled that Mr. Henschel will retire from his conductorship at the end of this series of concerts, and that he will be succeeded, as has been stated in foreign papers, by Herr Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna. Here nothing of any consequence is known of the new director, but Mr. Henschel speaks highly of him, and it is said further that Mr. Higginson has obtained abroad strong credentials as to his full capability.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before a small audience, the soloist being Mr. George Magrath, a Baltimore pianist, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion. The following programme was performed: Overture ("Titus"), Mozart; Concerto for piano-forte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; Allegro vivace. Allegretto; Andantino; Allegro; Allegro vivace. Più mosso; Presto; Piano solo; Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 12, Liszt; Ballet music. "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns; Introduction. Entrée des Clans. Idylle Ecossaise. Danse de la Gipsy. Gigue et Final. As will be observed, the programme had less of the "classical" and more of the "popular" sort of music in it than most of its predecessors—perhaps in deference to a demand that has been made in some quarters for a less lofty order of compositions than the orchestra has been accustomed to give. The chief feature of the performance was the Volkmann Symphony, which received its first performance in Boston at this time. It proved to be an agreeable and melodious composition rather than one which is likely to attain and hold any great reputation. It was finely played, as also were the other works in the programme. The pianist of the evening is a very young man, and a skilful, but in no respect remarkable, player. He seems well trained and demonstrated no little technical skill, but his work lacked personality and individual force, and was interesting rather for the possibilities in his art which it suggested than for any present achievement. The audience received his effort as graciously as its sincerity and good purpose demanded, and gave him the compliment of recalls after each of his numbers.

The programme for next Saturday night is as follows, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; cavatina (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish march (The Ruins of Athens), Beethoven; song, with piano, "Adieu de l'hostesse Arabe (MS.), Henschel; Le Bal (from the symphonie fantastique), Berlioz.

MUSIC.

Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last night was light and popular in the best sense. A melodious overture, a very tuneful yet well-formed symphony, a charming concerto by that exponent of pure music—Hummel, and a gorgeous setting of Scotch airs by Saint-Saëns—what could the popular heart desire further? Yet the popular body certainly staid away last night, possibly because of opera and Christmas purchases combined. The pianist of the evening—Mr. George Magrath—came from the West, from Cincinnati, we believe. His performance of the last movement of the concerto was praiseworthy, but in the other movements and in the Chopin Ballade, he was somewhat mechanical, and over-accented many of the passages. There was more of clearness and of careful technical skill, than of abandon in his work of last night, but we were glad that he did not fall into the vice of exaggeration in the Chopin work, as so many do. The symphony was a pleasing and melodious, rather than a great one. Its first theme is announced at once, boldly and joyously, and the same directness of treatment is evident throughout. The second movement has effective march rhythm recalling the beautiful movement of Raff's "Lenore." The chief theme of the last movement is developed from part of a theme of the third, but is the weakest movement of all the work. It closes with reminiscences of the first movement. The work is brief, and has continuity. It was admirably played, as was also the Saint-Saëns ballet music which closed the concert. Lack of space prevents more extended analysis of a very enjoyable concert.

The eleventh of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Georg Henschel conducting, was given in the Music Hall Saturday night, the piano soloist being Mr. George Magrath, of Baltimore, and the following programme was presented: Overture ("Titus"), Mozart; concerto for piano-forte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; piano solo; Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, Liszt; ballet music ("Henry VIII."), Saint-Saëns; introduction, Entrée des Clans, Idylle Ecossaise; Danse de la Gipsy, Gigue et Finale. We have only to use the stereotyped expression that the work of the orchestra was, as usual, extremely well done, and the selection of the programme, which was more popular than that of any concert which has preceded it, gave the largest amount of enjoyment to the audience. Volkmann's symphony received its first interpretation in Boston, and it is, to say the least, a pleasing and melodious composition, which we feel sure will be heard again with pleasure. All the other orchestral numbers were heard with great favor, especially the Saint-Saëns's ballet music. Mr. George Magrath, the pianist, is quite a young man, and, although not a player of any great or remarkable ability, is yet a skilful and pleasing pianist. He played with precision, but very little force, and, while he would be heard with great interest in a chamber concert, may be looked upon as not fully successful in so large a room as the Music Hall. However, he displayed the best of intentions, and for these he gained the sympathies of the audience, who recalled him after his efforts. The twelfth concert is to be given on Saturday night next, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; Cavatina (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish March, (The Ruins of Athens), Beethoven; Song, with piano, "Adieu de l'Hostesse Arabe (MS.), Henschel; Le Bal (from the Symphonie Fantastique), Berlioz.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 11th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. George Magrath, pianist, of Baltimore being the soloist, and the programme as follows:

Overture, ("Titus"), Mozart
Concerto for Piano-forte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann
Allegro vivace. Allegretto.
Andantino; Allegro; Allegro vivace. Più mosso; Presto.
Piano solo.
Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, Liszt
Ballet music. ("Henry VIII."), Saint-Saëns
Introduction. Entrée des Clans. Idylle Ecossaise.
Danse de la Gipsy. Gigue et Final.

The orchestral numbers were all of the most enjoyable description, and the fact that the Volkmann and Saint-Saëns compositions were heard for the first time here gave an additional interest to the evening's attractions. The symphony is full of bright, fresh, melodious ideas which are very cleverly presented, and worked out without a tiresome extent of elaboration, giving enjoyment at the first hearing, and proving again the sterling merits of Volkmann as a composer. The Saint-Saëns ballet music undoubtedly surprised those unfamiliar with the score of this recent success at the Paris Opéra, and the idea of having the national airs of England, Ireland and Scotland played under Mr. Henschel's baton, disguised under the programme designation, appeared to shock the sense of propriety of some members of the audience. The originality and ingenuity displayed by Saint-Saëns in arranging these old melodies, "Rory O'More," "Sir Roger de Coverly," etc., gave a new and fascinating beauty to the well known measures, and made this number a source of rare enjoyment. The brilliant introduction was played by the strings with magnificent dash, and the "gipsy dance" was given with equally stirring effect. The grand old "Titus" overture was as enjoyable as ever, and the playing of all these selections showed the thorough drill of the orchestra. Mr. Magrath, the piano soloist, is a young gentleman, a resident of Baltimore, apparently hardly out of his teens, so that the future has unlimited possibilities for him. At present he appears to be an excellent drawing room amateur. The audience, which only about half filled the hall, appeared delighted with the young gentleman's efforts, and complimented him with the usual recalls after his numbers.

"Inquiring Mind." You ask "Why the 'Henry VIII.' ballet music finds a place on the symphony concert programme, while a Strauss waltz has never yet been included in their numbers?" Well, you see the difficulty is—in fact, the object of these concerts—or, rather, the impossibility of—oh, bother! ask Mr. Henschel.

VALUE OF METRONOME MARKS.

A correspondent asks if Mr. Georg Henschel has ever replied to those critics who objected to his tempos. We find the following on this subject, in Mr. Henschel's preface to George Grove's Analytical Essays on Beethoven's Nine Symphonies:

"In preparing this new and first complete edition of Sir George Grove's essays, I was at first strongly tempted to omit the metronome marks which the author had embodied in his essay on the Ninth Symphony.

These marks had been sent by Beethoven—eight days before his death—to the Philharmonic Society of London, in his great anxiety to lessen the difficulties of studying and performing his gigantic work. Interesting therefore as they may be to the biographer, the historian, the student—to the public, I thought, it could be nothing but distracting to state that the Adagio, for instance, of the Ninth Symphony is supposed to be played at sixty beats, while the Andante alternating with it should be played at sixty-three beats in a minute. Who could, I reasoned, even supposing he had, by the help of the metronome, begin the Adagio at exactly sixty beats—who could warrant that in the Andante he would not beat more or less than exactly three beats per minute more? Surely not Beethoven himself; for, godlike as are the revelations of his soul, it was human blood that ran through the veins of his body.

Hundreds of musical works are performed to which metronome marks are not given by the composer.

"The metronome," says Nottebohm, "has nothing to do with feeling. The conception of the spirit of a tone-piece, the nuances in its motion, deviations from the absolute and normal measure founded upon the rhythmical structure of the piece, cannot be made dependent on a soulless clockwork; still less can they be determined by such. The metronome is nothing but a help toward securing a time which the composer had in mind," although, we add, a very weak one for those who cannot approximately find it through the character of the themes.

The interpretation of a musical work can as little be measured by the degrees of a metronome as can the delivery by the reader or an actor of a poem, a monologue in rhythmical verse.

In the works of Sebastian Bach we very rarely come across a denotation even of the

SOL

MR. LOUIS SCHMIDT

MR. E

The stranger of the evening was Mr. George Magrath of Cincinnati, pianist, who is a Stuttgart graduate, and has also spent some time in London, where on one occasion he played Rubinstein's D minor concerto at a Crystal Palace concert. His first selection was Hummel's B minor concerto, opus 89, in which he showed nice taste and nice technique; everything clear, but nothing fervid; fine intellectuality and refined sentiment, but not power and not great depth. His technique appeared admirably suited to the limpid fluency of Hummel, and his touch, although, as we have just said, not forceful, gave good intelligence to the thoughts and to their language. Later in the evening he played Chopin's Ballade in F minor, opus 52, No. 4, but to less acceptance. The reading was as neat as could be desired, but it was too cool and unmodified in color, so that the long ballad, with all its variety, went on to its end, as if every new phase in its diction were but a repetition of a twice-told tale.

At the next concert Mrs. Henschel will sing a cavatina from the "Nozze di Figaro," and a manuscript song by Mr. Henschel. The orchestral selections will be Brahms's first symphony, Schubert's Italian overture, and "Le Bal," from Berlioz's Fantastic symphony. It is positively settled that Mr. Henschel will retire from his conductorship at the end of this series of concerts, and that he will be succeeded, as has been stated in foreign papers, by Herr Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna. Here nothing of any consequence is known of the new director, but Mr. Henschel speaks highly of him, and it is said further that Mr. Higginson has obtained abroad strong credentials as to his full capability.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before a small audience, the soloist being Mr. George Magrath, a Baltimore pianist, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion. The following programme was performed: Overture ("Titus"), Mozart; Concerto for piano-forte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; Allegro vivace. Allegretto; Andantino; Allegro; Allegro vivace. Più mosso; Presto; Piano solo; Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 12, Liszt; Ballet music. "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns; Introduction. Entrée des Clans. Idylle Ecossaise. Danse de la Gipsy. Gigue et Final. As will be observed, the programme had less of the "classical" and more of the "popular" sort of music in it than most of its predecessors—perhaps in deference to a demand that has been made in some quarters for a less lofty order of compositions than the orchestra has been accustomed to give. The chief feature of the performance was the Volkmann Symphony, which received its first performance in Boston at this time. It proved to be an agreeable and melodious composition rather than one which is likely to attain and hold any great reputation. It was finely played, as also were the other works in the programme. The pianist of the evening is a very young man, and a skilful, but in no respect remarkable, player. He seems well trained and demonstrated no little technical skill, but his work lacked personality and individual force, and was interesting rather for the possibilities in his art which it suggested than for any present achievement. The audience received his effort as graciously as its sincerity and good purpose demanded, and gave him the compliment of recalls after each of his numbers.

The programme for next Saturday night is as follows, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; cavatina (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish march (The Ruins of Athens), Beethoven; song, with piano, "Adieu de l'hôtesse Arabe (MS.), Henschel; Le Bal (from the symphonie fantastique), Berlioz.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last night was light and popular in the best sense. A melodious overture, a very tuneful yet well-formed symphony, a charming concerto by that exponent of pure music—Hummel, and a gorgeous setting of Scotch airs by Saint-Saëns—what could the popular heart desire further? Yet the popular body certainly staid away last night, possibly because of opera and Christmas purchases combined. The pianist of the evening—Mr. George Magrath—came from the West, from Cincinnati, we believe. His performance of the last movement of the concerto was praiseworthy, but in the other movements and in the Chopin Ballade, he was somewhat mechanical, and over-accented many of the passages. There was more of clearness and of careful technical skill, than of abandon in his work of last night, but we were glad that he did not fall into the vice of exaggeration in the Chopin work, as so many do. The symphony was a pleasing and melodious, rather than a great one. Its first theme is announced at once, boldly and joyously, and the same directness of treatment is evident throughout. The second movement has effective march rhythm recalling the beautiful movement of Raff's "Lenore." The chief theme of the last movement is developed from part of a theme of the third, but is the weakest movement of all the work. It closes with reminiscences of the first movement. The work is brief, and has continuity. It was admirably played, as was also the Saint-Saëns ballet music which closed the concert. Lack of space prevents more extended analysis of a very enjoyable concert.

The eleventh of the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Georg Henschel conducting, was given in the Music Hall Saturday night, the piano soloist being Mr. George Magrath, of Baltimore, and the following programme was presented: Overture ("Titus"), Mozart; concerto for piano-forte in B minor, op. 89, Hummel; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53, Volkmann; piano solo; Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, Liszt; ballet music ("Henry VIII."), Saint-Saëns; introduction, Entrée des Clans, Idylle Ecossaise; Danse de la Gipsy, Gigue et Finale. We have only to use the stereotyped expression that the work of the orchestra was, as usual, extremely well done, and the selection of the programme, which was more popular than that of any concert which has preceded it, gave the largest amount of enjoyment to the audience. Volkmann's symphony received its first interpretation in Boston, and it is, to say the least, a pleasing and melodious composition, which we feel sure will be heard again with pleasure. All the other orchestral numbers were heard with great favor, especially the Saint-Saëns's ballet music. Mr. George Magrath, the pianist, is quite a young man, and, although not a player of any great or remarkable ability, is yet a skilled and pleasing pianist. He played with precision, but very little force, and, while he would be heard with great interest in a chamber concert, may be looked upon as not fully successful in so large a room as the Music Hall. However, he displayed the best of intentions, and for these he gained the sympathies of the audience, who recalled him after his efforts. The twelfth concert is to be given on Saturday night next, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; Cavatina (Le Nozze di Figaro), Mozart; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish March, (The Ruins of Athens), Beethoven; Song, with piano, "Adieu de l'hôtesse Arabe (MS.), Henschel; Le Bal (from the symphonie fantastique), Berlioz.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 11th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. George Magrath, pianist, of Baltimore being the soloist, and the programme as follows:

Overture, ("Titus").....Mozart
Concerto for Piano-forte in B minor, op. 89.....Hummel
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 53.....Volkmann
Allegro vivace. Allegretto.
Andantino; Allegro; Allegro vivace. Più mosso; Presto.
Piano solo.
Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12.....Liszt
Ballet music. ("Henry VIII.").....Saint-Saëns
Introduction. Entrée des Clans. Idylle Ecossaise.
Danse de la Gipsy. Gigue et Final.

The orchestral numbers were all of the most enjoyable description, and the fact that the Volkmann and Saint-Saëns compositions were heard for the first time here gave an additional interest to the evening's attractions. The symphony is full of bright, fresh, melodious ideas which are very cleverly presented, and worked out without a tiresome extent of elaboration, giving enjoyment at the first hearing, and proving again the sterling merits of Volkmann as a composer. The Saint-Saëns ballet music undoubtedly surprised those unfamiliar with the score of this recent success at the Paris Opéra, and the idea of having the national airs of England, Ireland and Scotland played under Mr. Henschel's baton, disguised under the programme designation, appeared to shock the sense of propriety of some members of the audience. The originality and ingenuity displayed by Saint-Saëns in arranging these old melodies, "Rory O'More," "Sir Roger de Coverly," etc., gave a new and fascinating beauty to the well known measures, and made this number a source of rare enjoyment. The brilliant introduction was played by the strings with magnificent dash, and the "gipsy dance" was given with equally stirring effect. The grand old "Titus" overture was as enjoyable as ever, and the playing of all these selections showed the thorough drill of the orchestra. Mr. Magrath, the piano soloist, is a young gentleman, a resident of Baltimore, apparently hardly out of his teens, so that the future has unlimited possibilities for him. At present he appears to be an excellent drawing room amateur. The audience, which only about half filled the hall, appeared delighted with the young gentleman's efforts, and complimented him with the usual recalls after his numbers.

"Inquiring Mind." You ask "Why the 'Henry VIII.' ballet music finds a place on the symphony concert programme, while a Strauss waltz has never yet been included in their numbers?" Well, you see the difficulty is—in fact, the object of these concerts—or, rather, the impossibility of—oh, bother! ask Mr. Henschel.

VALUE OF METRONOME MARKS.

A correspondent asks if Mr. Georg Henschel has ever replied to those critics who objected to his tempos. We find the following on this subject, in Mr. Henschel's preface to George Grove's Analytical Essays on Beethoven's Nine Symphonies:

"In preparing this new and first complete edition of Sir George Grove's essays, I was at first strongly tempted to omit the metronome marks which the author had embodied in his essay on the Ninth Symphony.

These marks had been sent by Beethoven—eight days before his death—to the Philharmonic Society of London, in his great anxiety to lessen the difficulties of studying and performing his gigantic work. Interesting therefore as they may be to the biographer, the historian, the student—to the public, I thought, it could be nothing but distracting to state that the Adagio, for instance, of the Ninth Symphony is supposed to be played at sixty beats, while the Andante alternating with it should be played at sixty-three beats in a minute. Who could, I reasoned, even supposing he had, by the help of the metronome, begin the Adagio at exactly sixty beats—who could warrant that in the Andante he would not beat more or less than exactly three beats per minute more? Surely not Beethoven himself; for, godlike as are the revelations of his soul, it was human blood that ran through the veins of his body.

Hundreds of musical works are performed to which metronome marks are not given by the composer.

"The metronome," says Nottebohm, "has nothing to do with feeling. The conception of the spirit of a tone-piece, the nuances in its motion, deviations from the absolute and normal measure founded upon the rhythmical structure of the piece, cannot be made dependent on a soulless clockwork; still less can they be determined by such. The metronome is nothing but a help toward securing a time which the composer had in mind," although, we add, a very weak one for those who cannot approximately find it through the character of the themes.

The interpretation of a musical work can as little be measured by the degrees of a metronome as can the delivery by the reader or an actor of a poem, a monologue in rhythmical verse.

In the works of Sebastian Bach we very rarely come across a denotation even of the

SOL
MR. LOUIS SCHMIDT

MR. E

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,
March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 152 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

character of a movement. Bach lets his themes and passages speak for themselves. And, surely, they speak more eloquently, more convincingly, than the words Adagio or Allegro—words just as extensible in their meaning as their translations "slow" or "quick."

Richard Wagner confesses that his best guidance in regard to the tempo as well as to the performance of Beethoven's symphonies he had found in—the singing of the great Schroeder-Devrient, and that only the right grasping of the "melos" gives the right time.

Another great composer's opinion of the value of metronome marks. I remembered, which is interesting enough to be quoted here.

A well-known London conductor, having in view a performance of Brahms' Requiem at St. James' Hall, had requested me to write to the composer asking him if the metronome marks before the different movements of the work in question should be strictly kept.

"Your question," Brahms answered, "strikes me as rather indefinite,—whether the metronome marks before the different movements of my Requiem should be strictly adhered to? Why, just as well as those to be found before other music. I am of the opinion that metronome marks go for nothing. As far as I know, all composers have as yet retracted their metronome marks in later years. Those figures which can be found before some of my compositions—good friends have talked them into me; for I myself have never believed that my blood and a mechanical instrument go very well together."

All these were to my thinking strong reasons for omitting the above mentioned metronome marks, and I was conscious of a large number of earnest musicians sympathizing with me in the opinion that in the movement by any invention, say a little noiseless pocket metronome, the interpreters of musical works of any kind should be enabled and willing to control their emotions at any time; to refer at any time to that little clockwork and set their "deviated" feelings according to its beats—in that very moment musicians would do better to go and hang up their harps and weep over the grave of their beloved art.

However, after discussing the question with Sir George, I finally agreed with him that perhaps it would be not only better, but just the thing to do, to place those marks before the public, thus enabling them to judge by themselves and from simply physiological reasons how far they may depend upon figures in regard to the spirit of a work."

168
HENSCHEL's ideas upon the value of metronome marks (on another page) will be read with keen relish by the general musical public, and with especial avidity by the critics of Boston, who took exceptions to his tempi. It is rather refreshing, in this connection, to read a statement made by Mr. Henschel to an interviewer, a few days ago, and to get his frank avowal that in conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was merely learning how to direct! Here is a paragraph from the interview in question:

"I have no intention of returning to America for two years at least, and then, perhaps, only on a visit for pleasure. My stay here has been both pleasant and profitable, my experience during the last three years being invaluable. A German conductor could not acquire such an experience in three times as many years. I have conducted seventy concerts in Boston, and have each year given all nine of Beethoven's symphonies. I go back to Europe because I wish still to enjoy the singer's life which my youth permits, and, with my wife to visit with me the place in which I practised my art in my days of bachelorhood."

170

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE in the Italian Style. op. 170. . . . SCHUBERT.

CAVATINA. (Le Nozze di Figaro.) MOZART.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 1, op. 68. . . . BRAHMS.

Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—

Un poco Allegretto e grazioso.—

Adagio; Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio. Più Allegro.—

TURKISH MARCH. (The Ruins of Athens.) . . . BEETHOVEN.

SONG WITH PIANO.

ADIEU DE L'HÔTESSE ARABE. (MS.) . . HENSCHEL.

LE BAL. (From the Symphonie fantastique.) . . . BERLIOZ.

SOLOIST:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

CAVATINA. (Le nozze di Figaro.)

MOZART.

English Version.

Thou, oh love, thou canst restore me;
Grant my prayer and hear my sigh:
Ah! without the love he bore me,
Unremembered let me die!

SONG. (Adieu de l'hôtesse Arabe.)

HENSCHEL.

Puisque rien ne t'arrête en cet heureux pays
Ni l'ombre du palmier, ni le jaune maïs,
Ni le repos ni l'abondance
Ni de voir à ta voix battre le jeune sein
De nos sœurs dont, les soirs, le tournoyant essaim
Couronne un coteau de sa danse;
Adieu beau voyageur, Oh! que n'es tu de ceux
Qui donnent pour limite à leurs pieds paresseux
Leur toit de branches ou de toiles,
Qui, rêveurs sans en faire, écoutent les récits
Et souhaitent le soir devant leur porte assis,
De s'en aller dans les étoiles!
Hélas! Hélas!

Si tu l'avais voulu, peut-être une de nous
O jeune homme eut aimé te servir à genoux
Dans nos huttes toujours ouvertes.
Elle eut fait, en bercant ton sommeil de ses chants
Pour chasser de ton front les moucherons méchants
Un éventail de feuilles vertes.
Si tu ne reviens pas, songe un peu quelquefois
Aux filles du désert, sœurs à la douce voix
Qui dansent pieds nus sur la dune.
O beau jeune homme blanc, bel oiseau passager,
Souviens toi; car peut-être, ô rapide étranger
Ton souvenir reste à plus d'une.
Adieu, beau voyageur, adieu!

(Victor Hugo.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms's first symphony, the one which the Brahmsites called the tenth symphony, and regarded as a worthy success or to Beethoven's nine, was the chief work on the programme last evening. It certainly wears well, for after repeated hearing, one is disposed to accord it more praise than at first, and its complexity begins to disentangle, while the interior movements seem more and more pleasing to the cultured auditor. There is nothing new to say of the reading of the work. Mr. Henschel finds himself perfectly at home in the Brahms school, and gives the work with the ardor of a devotee. The performance was better than the former renderings of the work, the orchestra having decidedly gained in unity and in precision of attack. Only in the last movement was there a trace of raspiness in the violin part. The rush of pizzicati in this movement is a wonderful and thrilling effect, and loses nothing in Mr. Henschel's manner of giving it. The sombre passages of the wood-wind with contra-bassoon, the power of the final theme, reminding somewhat of the theme of the last movement of Beethoven's ninth symphony, and the vigor of the coda, are only to be characterized by the word "vast," and spite of the occasional abstruse development, one becomes more and more disposed to concede its rank among the masterpieces of the world. In this work Brahms seems the legitimate outcome of Schumann, and as the latter was opposed to the modern "theories" in art, it is also natural to find his successor disdaining to defend his work by any theories or explanations. We unfortunately came too late to hear Schubert's Italian overture, but arrived in time to listen to Mrs. Henschel's charming rendering of the cavatina from "Le Nozze di Figaro" which was a good example of the way Mozart's arias, which are not of the bravura type, should be given. A pure legato and unaffected sweetness were its chief characteristics. The sensational "Turkish March" by Beethoven, which is not Turkish at all in character, was played with the requisite amount of bass drum, triangle, and cymbal, and was well shaded. One movement, and that the weakest of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," was also well performed. We do not think it just, to be the most dramatic of instrumental composers, to take a single chapter out of the thrilling tale which he tells in this work, and give it without comment or continuity. To be sure Berlioz expressed the wish that this work might sometimes be heard without its printed "key," but he certainly did not countenance dismembering it. The meaning of the "love motive," and the cause of the interruptions of the chance rhythms, were obscured by hearing the movement without its context. But at least it was given with fidelity to the score, even two harpists being present; (and one of them a lady, an innovation which we are glad to see in the orchestra), and we presume that the presentation of a single movement was due to the desire to close the programme according to custom with something either light or well spiced. Another word of praise is due both to Mrs. Henschel and her talented husband on the performance of a new Oriental song composed by the latter. Hugo's glowing words have been wedded to equally glowing and characteristic music. A thoroughly Eastern figure is heard, either in voice or accompaniment, throughout the whole work. Tropical passion is in every line. Even the cadence at the close, with a change to the dominant note in the music, is striking and effective. It is one of the neatest pieces of its genre, and was sung with most excellent good taste.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 12th concert of the season by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction, was given last evening at Music Hall, with the following as the programme:
Overture in the Italian style, op. 170.....Schubert
Cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro").....Mozart
Symphony in G minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens").....Beethoven
Song with piano, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe," (M. S.).....Henschel
"Le Bal," (from the Symphonie fantastique).....Berlioz
Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano, was the soloist, and her popularity with the audience was shown in the pleasant reception given her upon entering. The unpretentious and direct manner of this artist in all her work predisposes the hearer in her favor, and she seldom disappoints in any of her efforts. The singing of the selection from Mozart's tuneful opera was notably well done, but Mr. Henschel's setting of Hugo's "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe," gave quite an equal pleasure, and it was impossible not to realize how Mr. Henschel's admiration for the old schools of musical composition was shown in this bit of his own writing. The character of the song was so in keeping with that of the musical setting given it that the singer's intelligent rendering of the number was doubly enjoyable, and she was enthusiastically applauded at its conclusion and recalled. The Brahms symphony, played here during the first season's concerts by this orchestra, does not gain in interest materially upon further acquaintance, and it hardly appears possible that it will ever find an appreciation from a general audience. The beautiful theme for the violin was played with excellent taste by Mr. Listemann, and the presentation of the work, as a whole, was thoroughly pleasing. The Schubert overture, rich in melodious ideas, made a pleasant prelude to the programme, the Turkish march, with its brief suggestion of sensual eastern life, gave quite a novelty in these concerts, and the fascinating measures of Berlioz's "Le Bal" made full amends for whatever weariness was caused by portions of the evening's symphony. With the usual consideration for the fitness of things shown in the management of these concerts, a second harp was added to the usual forces for the Berlioz number.

Last Evening's Symphony Concert.

The twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall last night was not very fully attended. There were a great many subscribers' seats vacant. The concert was not lacking in strong attractions, however. The programme, if not one of the best, was well chosen. The symphony was Brahms' first. Mr. Henschel is determined that the Boston public shall not continue to suspect Brahms of heaviness and unmusical extravagances for nothing. If their verdict is to be against him it is only to be after a careful investigation. That there are a great many people who do not like Brahms at all there can be no doubt; but it is also true that there are many who appreciate him better and better the more they hear him, and if the applause of last evening is any indication, this number constitutes no small part of the audience. With Mr. Henschel the conducting of a Brahms symphony is a labor of love, and the only defects in the performance of last evening were the inevitable roughness among the strings in the heavier passages. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist and sang a delightfully fresh and original manuscript song of Mr. Henschel's. She sang it in a style altogether beyond criticism, though one could not help wishing the effort could have been heard in a smaller hall. For a wonder Berlioz' name was on the programme. It is a little remarkable, if Mr. Henschel, can bring in the extra services of two harps to play in a brief afterpiece, why some of the more ambitious works of this

CAVATINA. (Le nozze di Figaro.)

MOZART.

English Version.

Thou, oh love, thou canst restore me;
Grant my prayer and hear my sigh:
Ah! without the love he bore me,
Unremembered let me die!

SONG. (Adieu de l'hôtesse Arabe.)

HENSCHEL.

Puisque rien ne t'arrête en cet heureux pays
Ni l'ombre du palmier, ni le jaune maïs,
Ni le repos ni l'abondance
Ni de voir à ta voix battre le jeune sein
De nos sœurs dont, les soirs, le tournoyant essaim
Couronne un coteau de sa danse;
Adieu beau voyageur, Oh! que n'es tu de ceux
Qui donnent pour limite à leurs pieds paresseux
Leur toit de branches ou de toiles,
Qui, rêveurs sans en faire, écoutent les récits
Et souhaitent le soir devant leur porte assis,
De s'en aller dans les étoiles!
Hélas! Hélas!

Si tu l'avais voulu, peut-être une de nous
O jeune homme eut aimé te servir à genoux
Dans nos huttes toujours ouvertes.
Elle eut fait, en bercant ton sommeil de ses chants
Pour chasser de ton front les moucherons méchants
Un éventail de feuilles vertes.
Si tu ne reviens pas, songe un peu quelquefois
Aux filles du désert, sœurs à la douce voix
Qui dansent pieds nus sur la dune.
O beau jeune homme blanc, bel oiseau passager,
Souviens toi; car peut-être, ô rapide étranger
Ton souvenir reste à plus d'une.
Adieu, beau voyageur, adieu!

(Victor Hugo.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms's first symphony, the one which the Brahmsites called the tenth symphony, and regarded as a worthy success or to Beethoven's nine, was the chief work on the programme last evening. It certainly wears well, for after repeated hearing, one is disposed to accord it more praise than at first, and its complexity begins to disentangle, while the interior movements seem more and more pleasing to the cultured auditor. There is nothing new to say of the reading of the work. Mr. Henschel finds himself perfectly at home in the Brahms school, and gives the work with the ardor of a devotee. The performance was better than the former renderings of the work, the orchestra having decidedly gained in unity and in precision of attack. Only in the last movement was there a trace of raspiness in the violin part. The rush of pizzicati in this movement is a wonderful and thrilling effect, and loses nothing in Mr. Henschel's manner of giving it. The sombre passages of the wood-wind with contra-bassoon, the power of the final theme, reminding somewhat of the theme of the last movement of Beethoven's ninth symphony, and the vigor of the coda, are only to be characterized by the word "vast," and spite of the occasional abstruse development, one becomes more and more disposed to concede its rank among the masterpieces of the world. In this work Brahms seems the legitimate outcome of Schumann, and as the latter was opposed to the modern "theories" in art, it is also natural to find his successor disdaining to defend his work by any theories or explanations. We unfortunately came too late to hear Schubert's Italian overture, but arrived in time to listen to Mrs. Henschel's charming rendering of the cavatina from "Le Nozze di Figaro" which was a good example of the way Mozart's arias, which are not of the bravura type, should be given. A pure legato and unaffected sweetness were its chief characteristics. The sensational "Turkish March" by Beethoven, which is not Turkish at all in character, was played with the requisite amount of bass drum, triangle, and cymbal, and was well shaded. One movement, and that the weakest of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," was also well performed. We do not think it just, to be the most dramatic of instrumental composers, to take a single chapter out of the thrilling tale which he tells in this work, and give it without comment or continuity. To be sure Berlioz expressed the wish that this work might sometimes be heard without its printed "key," but he certainly did not countenance dismembering it. The meaning of the "love motive," and the cause of the interruptions of the chance rhythms, were obscured by hearing the movement without its context. But at least it was given with fidelity to the score, even two harpists being present (and one of them a lady, an innovation which we are glad to see in the orchestra), and we presume that the presentation of a single movement was due to the desire to close the programme according to custom with something either light or well spiced. Another word of praise is due both to Mrs. Henschel and her talented husband on the performance of a new Oriental song composed by the latter. Hugo's glowing words have been wedded to equally glowing and characteristic music. A thoroughly Eastern figure is heard, either in voice or accompaniment, throughout the whole work. Tropical passion is in every line. Even the cadence at the close, with a change to the dominant note in the music, is striking and effective. It is one of the neatest pieces of its genre, and was sung with most excellent good taste.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 12th concert of the season by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction, was given last evening at Music Hall, with the following as the programme:

Overture in the Italian style, op. 170.....Schubert
Cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro").....Mozart
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens").....Beethoven
Song with piano, "Adieu de L'Hôtesse Arabe,"
(M. S.).....Henschel
"Le Bal," (from the Symphonie fantastique).....Berlioz

Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano, was the soloist, and her popularity with the audience was shown in the pleasant reception given her upon entering. The unpretentious and direct manner of this artist in all her work predisposes the hearer in her favor, and she seldom disappoints in any of her efforts. The singing of the selection from Mozart's tuneful opera was notably well done, but Mr. Henschel's setting of Hugo's "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe," gave quite an equal pleasure, and it was impossible not to realize how Mr. Henschel's admiration for the old schools of musical composition was shown in this bit of his own writing. The character of the song was so in keeping with that of the musical setting given it that the singer's intelligent rendering of the number was doubly enjoyable, and she was enthusiastically applauded at its conclusion and recalled. The Brahms symphony, played here during the first season's concerts by this orchestra, does not gain in interest materially upon further acquaintance, and it hardly appears possible that it will ever find an appreciation from a general audience. The beautiful theme for the violin was played with excellent taste by Mr. Listemann, and the presentation of the work, as a whole, was thoroughly pleasing. The Schubert overture, rich in melodious ideas, made a pleasant prelude to the programme, the Turkish march, with its brief suggestion of sensual eastern life, gave quite a novelty in these concerts, and the fascinating measures of Berlioz's "Le Bal" made full amends for whatever weariness was caused by portions of the evening's symphony. With the usual consideration for the fitness of things shown in the management of these concerts, a second harp was added to the usual forces for the Berlioz number.

Last Evening's Symphony Concert.

The twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall last night was not very fully attended. There were a great many subscribers' seats vacant. The concert was not lacking in strong attractions, however. The programme, if not one of the best, was well chosen. The symphony was Brahms' first. Mr. Henschel is determined that the Boston public shall not continue to suspect Brahms of heaviness and unmusical extravagances for nothing. If their verdict is to be against him it is only to be after a careful investigation. That there are a great many people who do not like Brahms at all there can be no doubt; but it is also true that there are many who appreciate him better and better the more they hear him, and if the applause of last evening is any indication, this number constitutes no small part of the audience. With Mr. Henschel the conducting of a Brahms symphony is a labor of love, and the only defects in the performance of last evening were the inevitable roughness among the strings in the heavier passages. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist and sang a delightfully fresh and original manuscript song of Mr. Henschel's. She sang it in a style altogether beyond criticism, though one could not help wishing the effort could have been heard in a smaller hall. For a wonder Berlioz' name was on the programme. It is a little remarkable, if Mr. Henschel, can bring in the extra services of two harps to play in a brief afterpiece, why some of the more ambitious works of this of orchestral writing cannot be occasionally even if they do call for extraordinary resources. The programme for next week is:

174

Overture (Iphigénie en Aulide).....Gluck
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15.....Johan S. Svendsen
(First time.)
Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26.....Weber
Ballet music (Henry VIII.).....Saint-Saëns
Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.

Speaking of the Symphonies, they still are and Henschel still is;—c'est tout. This is a strange world. He is a better conductor than he was when he created such a furor, and yet in this city his day of fashion has passed and chaos has come upon him early. He has added nothing to his reputation, unless it be that of a musical James, and one which is near sighted in one direction and can't see straight in the other. No man ever had a better opportunity, yet his millionaire patron is out of conceit with him; the public no longer raves over him, and even his orchestra, picked by himself, you must remember, and consequently his, is a little shy of him; underlings are apt to stand afar that the favorite when he falls may not take them with him or bury them in the ruins. I must believe that there are not in any one city people enough who appreciate and love symphonic music to keep it in style many consecutive seasons, unless time and the fashions are catered to with tact. The people must be amused even if we decapitate an artist to do it. "Le roi est mort; vive le roi." is still the cry, and whoever comes to take Mr. Henschel's place is sure of a welcome—at first.

I mean to write oftener, old fellow, but I am catching Boston airs, and living is such a bore, do you know, that I begin to believe the Jesuit priesthood, which the Dominie so feared for me, would have been much more exciting than this hum-drumism of Boston on the bay. Regards to every one, dear boy, and with your usual generosity, commend to your past remembrances of him this shadow of himself,

Your
To Volney Thrale, Esq. MARC BERTONI.

Notes. From the

The twelfth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, with Mrs. Georg Henschel as the soloist. The programme was: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro"), Mozart; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens"), Beethoven; song with piano, "Adieu de L'Hôtesse Arabe" (MS.), Henschel; "Le Bal" (from the Symphonie Fantastique), Berlioz. Mrs. Henschel sang with fine effect, and was listened to with especial delight in her husband's song, which is an interesting but somewhat singular work. The orchestra played in a thoroughly superior manner. The symphony of Brahms was repeated, but we think it met with no more favor than on its first presentation, and we imagine it cannot be forced into popularity. The thirteenth concert will be given on Saturday evening next, and this is the programme: Overture (Iphigénie en Aulide), Gluck; concerto for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15 (first time), Johan S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music (Henry VIII.), Saint-Saëns. Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The audience was not a large one, but the operatic attraction elsewhere was doubtless the cause of the light attendance. Schubert's somewhat puerile and ineffective overture in the Italian style, op. 170, opened the concert. It was brilliantly, gracefully and effectively interpreted, and with a precision, especially in the wood wind, to be warmly praised. The symphony was Brahms's, No. 1, which was admirably played, but which does not reach the heart any more upon a tenth than on a first hearing. The Turkish March from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" and "Le Bal," from Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," were the other instrumental numbers. They were both spiritedly read and played. The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel who sang the ever-fresh and beautiful cavatina, "Thou, oh love!" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and a M. S. song "Adieu de l'hôtesse Arabe" by Mr. Henschel. The former was given with Mrs. Henschel's usual grace and delicacy of expression, and the latter, which is a weird, but original and interesting work somewhat rhapsodic in character, was rendered with equal warmth and dramatic feeling. Both selections were generously and cordially applauded. At the next concert the symphony will be one by Svendsen, which will receive its first performance here. The soloists are to be Mr. L. Schmidt, who will play Beethoven's violin concerto, and Mr. E. Strasser, who will perform Weber's concertino, op. 26, for clarinet.

It is definitely decided that Mr. Henschel will retire from the post of director of the Symphony Concerts after this season, to be succeeded by Herr von Gericke, of Vienna. Herr von Gericke is at present director of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, which was formerly conducted by Brahms. This great composer was not successful as a conductor, and when Von Gericke assumed the leadership the Philharmonic was anything but flourishing, but he gave it new life and has brought it to an honorable position among the best European organizations.

Herr Wilhelm Gericke, who may with confidence be accepted as the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, is a musician of eminent abilities and just in the prime of life, being about 45 years of age. For the past eight years he has directed the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House, which numbers about 100 musicians, and he is also director of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, having succeeded Brahms in the latter position. His record is well known among the leading musicians of Vienna, and Herr Stengel, the husband of Mme. Sembrich, who was attached to the Vienna Conservatory of Music, holding a professorship in that institution, commends Herr Gericke as a man eminently fitted to assume the duties for which he has been selected by Mr. Higginson. It is not unlikely that the orchestra may enlarge its field of labors under its coming directorship.

It is said that the farce recently printed in Harper's Monthly, from the pen of Mr. W. D. Howells, "The Register," is to be the basis of the book for the comic opera for which Mr. Howells will supply the libretto and Mr. Georg Henschel the music. The plot turns upon the results arising from the overhearing of conversations in adjoining rooms by means of a connecting furnace pipe, the scene showing a double stage or two rooms side by side. The collaborators are said to be much interested in their work, and there is ample reason to anticipate a great measure of success for their efforts.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twelfth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Italian Overture.....Schubert
Aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms
Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Song, with pianoforte, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe".....Henschel
"Un Bal," from the Fantastic Symphony.....Berlioz

Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

Schubert's Italian overture is a bright and lovely work, full of enchanting melody, and with a reminiscence of the Rossini crescendo in it, the latter probably introduced in deference to the title of the piece. Beethoven put a similar crescendo into his overture to "Leonore" (the smaller one, known as No. 1), with, very likely, something of sarcastic intent, as if saying to the people of Pesth, for whom he wrote it, "You find my great 'Leonore' overture too heavy; well, here is something after your own heart, just like Rossini!" Although Schubert's crescendo has not quite the Rossinian dash and sparkle of Beethoven's, it is easy enough to recognize it as a characteristically Italian trait in his overture. Brahms's great symphony—we now write great without any misgivings—at last produces the impression upon us that we have been waiting for through so many years. Some while ago we wrote of this symphony that no one could hope to understand it without severe study, and that the work seemed so repelling that it hardly encouraged this necessary study. And now we are free to admit that this encouragement has come to us far less from the C minor symphony itself than from some other less abstruse works of the composer, such as the "academic" and "tragic" overtures, the Serenade for orchestra, the G minor pianoforte quartet and the "Rinaldo." More than this, these lesser compositions not only bred a certain enthusiasm for Brahms in us, but very likely furnished the key to many a perplexing difficulty in the symphony. †

As we now stand before the work, it seems unspeakably great and beautiful, admirably coherent in every part. We can think of no modern composition of equal dimensions which represents so vast an amount of labor; even the third act of Wagner's "Tristan" (a thing, by the way, of a very different sort) can hardly be said to show such an enormous expenditure of brain work in its construction. But, it may be answered, labor is an excellent thing in its way, but it is not inspiration, and without inspiration it must go for naught. Very true! But what better proof of the vigor and vitality of Brahms's inspiration, of the efficient genius he has shown in this symphony, can there be, than that all the infinite labor he has bestowed upon the composition has not overwhelmed and crushed it under an avalanche of curiously wrought details? There are two sorts of inspiration; one kind is genial only by its spontaneity, by its simplicity; it does things at a dash. But hard work, careful pains-taking, kill it. Of this sort was the inspiration of the greater Italian composers of the earlier part of the present century. Then there is the harder sort, which does not, perhaps, seem to burn so brightly at first, but which hard work can not quench, nay, upon which hard work acts only as oil does upon flame, until at last it shows itself as one great, consuming blaze, by the side of which the more facile and unconscious sort seems a very rush-light. And of this sort is Brahms's. In the C minor symphony every note draws blood. It has been plausibly questioned whether Brahms's music will ever become popular. That it is not popular now and in Boston is pretty evident, for our audiences listen to it in a silence that speaks more of dismay than of veneration. But, upon the whole, the impression it makes upon the public is probably less painful than that produced by Beethoven's third and fourth symphonies (to say nothing of the ninth) upon the average musical mind of Germany when they were first brought out. If any one be tempted to prophesy that Brahms's C minor symphony will never be found enjoyable, save by a small group of musical specialists, let him remember that the time was when a good half of the best musical culture in Germany found Beethoven's B-flat symphony utterly distracted music, without melody, coherence or form. True, great as Brahms is, there are certain qualities in which he seems as yet to be deficient; he has not, or perhaps we should say, does not yet show that Hellenic grace of the truly classical writers; he has, to compare him with more modern men, neither the originality, the uniqueness, the grand, passionate sweep of Wagner, nor the rich, imaginative fancy of Berlioz. But he has more eminently than any man since Schumann (with the possible exception of Robert Franz, with whom it is, after all, impossible fairly to compare him), that essentially German quality, which has no adequate name save in the German language—Gemüth; largeness of nature, profundity of thought wedded to the truest depth of feeling. And what fine pertinacity of enthusiasm! Take him for all in all, a truly great man and musician. Beethoven's Turkish March—Turkish in spirit, if not in musical character—was given pretty much at the break-neck pace at which Rubinstein used to play it, not without a certain brilliancy of effect. The exquisite Ball-scene from Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was played with dainty grace in its first and second themes (waltz-motive, and the "fixed idea"), albeit that in some parts of the movement we could have wished to have a little more striking relief given to piquant details. Mrs. Henschel gave the ever delightful "Porgi, amor" very beautifully indeed; she also sang a setting, by her husband, of Victor Hugo's "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe" with superb effect. This charming song, in which the composer shows how willing the modern tonal system is to welcome even so old-fashioned a guest as the Oriental chromatic mode, struck us as being one of the most thoroughly delightful and poetic of Mr. Henschel's recent compositions.

The next programme is: Overture, "Iphigénie en Aulide," Gluck; concerto for violin, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony, No. 2, op. 15, Svendsen; concertino for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music, "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., will play the violin solo and Mr. E. Strasser that for clarinet.

174 of orchestral writing cannot be occasionally even if they do call for extraordinary results. The programme for next week is:

Overture (Iphigénie en Aulide).....Gluck
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15.....Johan S. Svendsen
(First time.)
Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26.....Weber
Ballet music (Henry VIII.).....Saint-Saëns
Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E.
Strasser, clarinet.

Speaking of the Symphonies, they still are and Henschel still is;—c'est tout. This is a strange world. He is a better conductor than he was when he created such a furor, and yet in this city his day of fashion has passed and chaos has come upon him early. He has added nothing to his reputation, unless it be that of a musical James, and one which is near sighted in one direction and can't see straight in the other. No man ever had a better opportunity, yet his millionaire patron is out of conceit with him; the public no longer raves over him, and even his orchestra, picked by himself, you must remember, and consequently his, is a little shy of him; underlings are apt to stand afar that the favorite when he falls may not take them with him or bury them in the ruins. I must believe that there are not in any one city people enough who appreciate and love symphonic music to keep it in style many consecutive seasons, unless time and the fashions are catered to with tact. The people must be amused even if we decapitate an artist to do it. "Le roi est mort; vive le roi," is still the cry, and whoever comes to take Mr. Henschel's place is sure of a welcome—at first.

I mean to write oftener, old fellow, but I am catching Boston airs, and living is such a bore, do you know, that I begin to believe the Jesuit priesthood, which the Dominie so feared for me, would have been much more exciting than this hum-drumism of Boston on the bay. Regards to every one, dear boy, and with your usual generosity, commend to your past remembrances of him this shadow of himself.

Your
To Volney Thrale, Esq. MARC BERTONI.

Notes.

The twelfth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, with Mrs. Georg Henschel as the soloist. The programme was: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro"), Mozart; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens"), Beethoven; song with piano, "Adieu de L'Hôtesse Arabe" (MS.), Henschel; "Le Bal" (from the Symphonie Fantastique), Berlioz. Mrs. Henschel sang with fine effect, and was listened to with especial delight in her husband's song, which is an interesting but somewhat singular work. The orchestra played in a thoroughly superior manner. The symphony of Brahms was repeated, but we think it met with no more favor than on its first presentation, and we imagine it cannot be given on Saturday evening next, and this is the programme: Overture (Iphigénie en Aulide), Gluck; concerto for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15 (first time), Johan S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music (Henry VIII.), Saint-Saëns. Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The audience was not a large one, but the operatic attraction elsewhere was doubtless the cause of the light attendance. Schubert's somewhat puerile and ineffective overture in the Italian style, op. 170, opened the concert. It was brilliantly, gracefully and effectively interpreted, and with a precision, especially in the wood wind, to be warmly praised. The symphony was Brahms's, No. 1, which was admirably played, but which does not reach the heart any more upon a tenth than on a first hearing. The Turkish March from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" and "Le Bal," from Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," were the other instrumental numbers. They were both spiritedly read and played. The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel who sang the ever-fresh and beautiful cavatina, "Thou, oh love!" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and a M. S. song "Adieu de l'hôtesse Arabe" by Mr. Henschel. The former was given with Mrs. Henschel's usual grace and delicacy of expression, and the latter, which is a weird, but original and interesting work somewhat rhapsodic in character, was rendered with equal warmth and dramatic feeling. Both selections were generously and cordially applauded. At the next concert the symphony will be one by Svendsen, which will receive its first performance here. The soloists are to be Mr. L. Schmidt, who will play Beethoven's violin concerto, and Mr. E. Strasser, who will perform Weber's concertino, op. 26, for clarinet.

It is definitely decided that Mr. Henschel will retire from the post of director of the Symphony Concerts after this season, to be succeeded by Herr von Gericke, of Vienna. Herr von Gericke is at present director of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, which was formerly conducted by Brahms. This great composer was not successful as a conductor, and when Von Gericke assumed the leadership the Philharmonic was anything but flourishing, but he gave it new life and has brought it to an honorable position among the best European organizations.

Herr Wilhelm Gericke, who may with confidence be accepted as the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, is a musician of eminent abilities and just in the prime of life, being about 45 years of age. For the past eight years he has directed the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House, which numbers about 100 musicians, and he is also director of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, having succeeded Brahms in the latter position. His record is well known among the leading musicians of Vienna, and Herr Stengel, the husband of Mme. Sembrich, who was attached to the Vienna Conservatory of Music, holding a professorship in that institution, commends Herr Gericke as a man eminently fitted to assume the duties for which he has been selected by Mr. Higginson. It is not unlikely that the orchestra may enlarge its field of labors under its coming directorship.

It is said that the farce recently printed in Harper's Monthly, from the pen of Mr. W. D. Howells, "The Register," is to be the basis of the book for the comic opera for which Mr. Howells will supply the libretto and Mr. Georg Henschel the music. The plot turns upon the results arising from the overhearing of conversations in adjoining rooms by means of a connecting furnace pipe, the scene showing a double stage or two rooms side by side. The collaborators are said to be much interested in their work, and there is ample reason to anticipate a great measure of success for their efforts.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twelfth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Italian Overture.....Schubert
Aria from "Le Nozze di Figaro".....Mozart
Symphony No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms
Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Song, with pianoforte, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe".....Henschel
"Un Bal," from the Fantastic Symphony.....Berlioz

Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

Schubert's Italian overture is a bright and lovely work, full of enchanting melody, and with a reminiscence of the Rossini crescendo in it, the latter probably introduced in deference to the title of the piece. Beethoven put a similar crescendo into his overture to "Leonore" (the smaller one, known as No. 1), with, very likely, something of sarcastic intent, as if saying to the people of Pesth, for whom he wrote it, "You find my great 'Leonore' overture too heavy; well, here is something after your own heart, just like Rossini!" Although Schubert's crescendo has not quite the Rossinian dash and sparkle of Beethoven's, it is easy enough to recognize it as a characteristically Italian trait in his overture. Brahms's great symphony—we now write great without any misgivings—at last produces the impression upon us that we have been waiting for through so many years. Some while ago we wrote of this symphony that no one could hope to understand it without severe study, and that the work seemed so repelling that it hardly encouraged this necessary study. And now we are free to admit that this encouragement has come to us far less from the C minor symphony itself than from some other less abstruse works of the composer, such as the "academic" and "tragic" overtures, the Serenade for orchestra, the G minor pianoforte quartet and the "Rinaldo." More than this, these lesser compositions not only bred a certain enthusiasm for Brahms in us, but very likely furnished the key to many a perplexing difficulty in the symphony. +

As we now stand before the work, it seems unspeakably great and beautiful, admirably coherent in every part. We can think of no modern composition of equal dimensions which represents so vast an amount of labor; even the third act of Wagner's "Tristan" (a thing, by the way, of a very different sort) can hardly be said to show such an enormous expenditure of brain work in its construction. But, it may be answered, labor is an excellent thing in its way, but it is not inspiration, and without inspiration it must go for naught. Very true! But what better proof of the vigor and vitality of Brahms's inspiration, of the efficient genius he has shown in this symphony, can there be, than that all the infinite labor he has bestowed upon the composition has not overwhelmed and crushed it under an avalanche of curiously wrought details? There are two sorts of inspiration; one kind is genial only by its spontaneity, by its simplicity; it does things at a dash. But hard work, careful pains-taking, kill it. Of this sort was the inspiration of the greater Italian composers of the earlier part of the present century. Then there is the harder sort, which does not, perhaps, seem to burn so brightly at first, but which hard work can not quench, nay, upon which hard work acts only as oil does upon flame, until at last it shows itself as one great, consuming blaze, by the side of which the more facile and unconscious sort seems a very rush-light. And of this sort is Brahms's. In the C minor symphony every note draws blood. It has been plausibly questioned whether Brahms's music will ever become popular. That it is not popular now and in Boston is pretty evident, for our audiences listen to it in a silence that speaks more of dismay than of veneration. But, upon the whole, the impression it makes upon the public is probably less painful than that produced by Beethoven's third and fourth symphonies (to say nothing of the ninth) upon the average musical mind of Germany when they were first brought out. If any one be tempted to prophesy that Brahms's C minor symphony will never be found enjoyable, save by a small group of musical specialists, let him remember that the time was when a good half of the best musical culture in Germany found Beethoven's B-flat symphony utterly distracted music, without melody, coherence or form. True, great as Brahms is, there are certain qualities in which he seems as yet to be deficient; he has not, or perhaps we should say, does not yet show that Hellenic grace of the truly classical writers; he has, to compare him with more modern men, neither the originality, the uniqueness, the grand, passionate sweep of Wagner, nor the rich, imaginative fancy of Berlioz. But he has more eminently than any man since Schumann (with the possible exception of Robert Franz, with whom it is, after all, impossible fairly to compare him), that essentially German quality, which has no adequate name save in the German language—Gemüth; largeness of nature, profundity of thought wedded to the truest depth of feeling. And what fine pertinacity of enthusiasm! Take him for all in all, a truly great man and musician. Beethoven's Turkish March—Turkish in spirit, if not in musical character—was given pretty much at the break-neck pace at which Rubinstein used to play it, not without a certain brilliancy of effect. The exquisite Ball-scene from Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was played with dainty grace in its first and second themes (waltz-motive, and the "fixed idea"), albeit that in some parts of the movement we could have wished to have a little more striking relief given to piquant details. Mrs. Henschel gave the ever delightful "Porgi, amor" very beautifully indeed; she also sang a setting, by her husband, of Victor Hugo's "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe" with superb effect. This charming song, in which the composer shows how welling the modern tonal system is to welcome even so old-fashioned a guest as the Oriental chromatic mode, struck us as being one of the most thoroughly delightful and poetic of Mr. Henschel's recent compositions.

The next programme is: Overture, "Iphigénie en Aulide," Gluck; concerto for violin, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony, No. 2, op. 15, Svendsen; concertino for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music, "Henry VIII.," Saint-Saëns. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., will play the violin solo and Mr. E. Strasser that for clarinet.

Their programme of last Saturday was:

Overture in the Italian Style, op. 170. Schubert
Cavatina (Le Nozze di Figaro.) Mozart
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68. Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—
Un poco Allegretto e grazioso.—
Ada io; Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio. Più Allegro.
Turkish March (The Ruins of Athens.) Beethoven
Song with Piano.—Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe (M.S.) Henschel
Le Bal. (From the Symphonie fantastique.) Berlioz

I missed the first number, so, in accordance with my resolve, announced at the beginning of this letter, I will not describe it. But I heard Mrs. Henschel's two songs, and admired them. The singer has such a pure and refined style, and sings with so much artistic earnestness, that she is always sure of charming the musical auditor. The second of her songs is a very clever composition by her husband. It has a single oriental figure which is interwoven in the accompaniment throughout, and it is really eastern in its tropical passion and its delicate minor touches. Regarding the symphony I need say nothing. It is a work which grows on one the more it is heard. The last movement, perhaps, remains a little abstruse in its development, but the meaning of this also is clearer than at a first or second hearing, and the dignity and power of the work is incontestable. It was finely performed, save that the violins grew a little violent in the last movement. The two remaining numbers are rather sensational, but always interesting. The march was well shaded, and the "Ball Scene" was given with proper rhythmic swing and with due fidelity to the score. Two harpists were present, one, strange to say, a lady, which opens the question as to why there should not be more ladies among the performers in grand orchestras. I am sorry that a single movement of the "Fantastique" should be given in this manner however, for Berlioz's story is a continuous one, and while this greatest piece of programme music may be given without the printed story (indeed Berlioz wished that this might sometimes be done), it should not be given in a "to be continued in our next" manner, like a New York Ledger story.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 12th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction, was given last evening at Music Hall, with the following as the programme:

Overture in the Italian style, op. 170. Schubert
Cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro") Mozart
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68. Brahms
Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens") Beethoven
Song with piano, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe."
(M.S.) Henschel
"Le Bal." (from the Symphonie fantastique.) Berlioz

Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano, was the soloist, and her popularity with the audience was shown in the pleasant reception given her upon entering. The unpretentious and direct manner of this artist in all her work predisposes the hearer in her favor, and she seldom disappoints in any of her efforts. The singing of the selection from Mozart's tuneful opera was notably well done, but Mr. Henschel's setting of Hugo's "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe," gave quite an equal pleasure, and it was impossible not to realize how Mr. Henschel's admiration for the old schools of musical composition was shown in this bit of his own writing. The character of the song was so in keeping with that of the musical setting given it that the singer's intelligent rendering of the number was doubly enjoyable, and she was enthusiastically applauded at its conclusion and recalled. The Brahms symphony, played here during the first season's concerts by this orchestra, does not gain in interest materially upon further acquaintance, and it hardly appears possible that it will ever find an appreciation from a general audience. The beautiful theme for the violin was played with excellent taste by Mr. Listemann, and the presentation of the work, as a whole, was thoroughly pleasing. The Schubert overture, rich in melodious ideas, made a pleasant prelude to the programme, the Turkish march, with its brief suggestion of sensual eastern life, gave quite a novelty in these concerts, and the fascinating measures of Berlioz's "Le Bal" made full amends for whatever of weariness was caused by portions of the evening's symphony. With the usual consideration for the fitness of things shown in the management of these concerts, a second harp was added to the usual forces for the Berlioz number.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of Saturday night began with Schubert's overture "in the Italian style." Just where the dell'Italiane comes in, except in the title, it is not easy to decide, unless the smooth flow of sweet melodies, sustained on unobtrusive accompaniments and unobscured by any process of elaboration, be supposed to be particularly Italian. There is certainly in it none of Porpora's deep harmony nor anything of southern fervor, but the overture is consonant with sense and grateful to hearing, especially when so well and easily played, as on this evening. After that, Mrs. Henschel sang Mozart's "Porgi Amor" ("Le Nozze di Figaro") to full orchestral accompaniment. Mrs. Henschel is a singer whose means, and whose use of them grow from month to month. Her voice, never to be a large one, constantly gains body and meaning, and the intellectual correctness of her reading is vitalized by a sentiment which, although not passionate indeed, has a suggestive character which makes a favorable effect upon the hearer. The aria was sung with simplicity, but it implied truly the feeling which the composer portrayed in it. The symphony, which was Brahms's first, in C minor, followed, and showed strikingly the advance which the orchestra has made upon its own work of previous seasons. Passage after passage became obvious to the understanding which had before been dark, and thus justified our remark, made after the first hearing of the symphony, that much of its obscurity might be due to the want of proper apprehension on the part of the players. Yet it cannot be said that even such careful and sensitive playing made the symphony all clear or all enjoyable. The work seems to strive after the unattainable; it is full of irritant and restless discords; it has strange, climbing, grasping phrases which seem to be trying to drag down something which still glides upward from their reach; its pastoral motifs often break away in suggestion of storm and confusion; the strings are frequently urged to the very top of their compass, and at times, as in the first and last movement, a sort of Walpurgis Night sweeps down and whirls everything away in a rhythmic chaos. There is constantly displayed the finest knowledge of orchestration, and some of the illustrations of this are highly dramatic, as, for instance, in the last movement, when the delicate adagio has ended and the wild flight of the strings in pizzicato suddenly ceases, the solemn voice of the contra-bassoon speaks, in almost tremendous contrast, with its deepest tones. The second movement, andante sostenuto, with its pleasant violin solo, which Mr. Listemann played gracefully, is the most acceptable movement as a whole, and the musical interest of the last is somewhat diminished by the marked reminiscences it brings of the thought, although not of the exact phraseology, of Beethoven's ninth symphony.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, Mrs. Henschel being the soloist, and the programme as follows: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; Cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro"), Mozart; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens"), Beethoven; Song with piano, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe" (M.S.), Henschel; "Le Bal" (from the Symphonie fantastique), Berlioz. The playing of the orchestra was exceedingly good throughout, and the Brahms symphony was better performed than ever before. Despite repeated hearings, however, it does not gain in interest, and continues to impress as a dull and heavy piece of composition. Mrs. Henschel's singing was exceedingly good, the chief interest in it centering upon Mr. Henschel's song, which was a strange but interesting and able work. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture (Iphigenie en Aulide), Gluck; Concerto for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15 (first time), Johan S. Svendsen; Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music (Henry VIII.), Saint-Saens. Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.

LATE COMERS AT CONCERTS.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

Human nature doesn't like being lashed for sins not its own. I did not thoroughly read your article on late comers at the symphony rehearsals, but I can assure you that some of us are unavoidably late. Is it an easy matter, think you, for a suburban who works till 2 p.m., to reach Music Hall at 2:30 p.m.? Herdies and hansom, as you may know, are not at hand in the outlying wards; and if they were, many workers would not feel that they could call them. "Workers can stay at home." Surely; but some of us had felt that the afternoon rehearsals were partly for this very class, who cannot well, for several reasons, go in the evening. And so some of us take "half the loaf" often. Isn't it rather crusty not to be allowed to stand inside, after heroic exertions for the large "half"?

I respectfully submit: Would not your influential pen do good service in trying to secure 3 p.m., or even 2:45 p.m., as the opening hour? Possibly some would then, as now, need to leave before the close; but, with the approximate time necessary for the performance of the closing number printed on the programme, those who have consciences—musical or other—could do so at a relatively fitting moment. And some who would like to be prompt, and who would like especially the opening number, would also be gratified. Allow me to subscribe myself, very respectfully yours,

BOTH DEFENDANT AND PLAINTIFF.

Boston, Jan. 4, 1884.

Their programme of last Saturday was:

Overture in the Italian Style, op. 170. Schubert
Cavatina (Le Nozze di Figaro). Mozart
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68. Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—
Un poco Allegretto e grazioso.—
Adagio; Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio. Più Allegro.
Turkish March (The Ruins of Athens). Beethoven
Song with Piano.—Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe (M.S.). Henschel
Le Bal. (From the Symphonie fantastique). Berlioz

I missed the first number, so, in accordance with my resolve, announced at the beginning of this letter, I will not describe it. But I heard Mrs. Henschel's two songs, and admired them. The singer has such a pure and refined style, and sings with so much artistic earnestness, that she is always sure of charming the musical auditor. The second of her songs is a very clever composition by her husband. It has a single oriental figure which is interwoven in the accompaniment throughout, and it is really eastern in its tropical passion and its delicate minor touches. Regarding the symphony I need say nothing. It is a work which grows on one the more it is heard. The last movement, perhaps, remains a little abstruse in its development, but the meaning of this also is clearer than at a first or second hearing, and the dignity and power of the work is incontestable. It was finely performed, save that the violins grew a little violent in the last movement. The two remaining numbers are rather sensational, but always interesting. The march was well shaded, and the "Ball Scene" was given with proper rhythmic swing and with due fidelity to the score. Two harpists were present, one, strange to say, a lady, which opens the question as to why there should not be more ladies among the performers in grand orchestras. I am sorry that a single movement of the "Fantastique" should be given in this manner however, for Berlioz's story is a continuous one, and while this greatest piece of programme music may be given without the printed story (indeed Berlioz wished that this might sometimes be done), it should not be given in a "to be continued in our next" manner, like a New York Ledger story.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 12th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction, was given last evening at Music Hall, with the following as the programme:

Overture in the Italian style, op. 170. Schubert
Cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro"). Mozart
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68. Brahms
Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens"). Beethoven
Song with piano, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe," (M.S.). Henschel
"Le Bal." (from the Symphonie fantastique). Berlioz

Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano, was the soloist, and her popularity with the audience was shown in the pleasant reception given her upon entering. The unpretentious and direct manner of this artist in all her work predisposes the hearer in her favor, and she seldom disappoints in any of her efforts. The singing of the selection from Mozart's tuneful opera was notably well done, but Mr. Henschel's setting of Hugo's "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe," gave quite an equal pleasure, and it was impossible not to realize how Mr. Henschel's admiration for the old schools of musical composition was shown in this bit of his own writing. The character of the song was so in keeping with that of the musical setting given it that the singer's intelligent rendering of the number was doubly enjoyable, and she was enthusiastically applauded at its conclusion and recalled. The Brahms symphony, played here during the first season's concerts by this orchestra, does not gain in interest materially upon further acquaintance, and it hardly appears possible that it will ever find an appreciation from a general audience. The beautiful theme for the violin was played with excellent taste by Mr. Listemann, and the presentation of the work, as a whole, was thoroughly pleasing. The Schubert overture, rich in melodious ideas, made a pleasant prelude to the programme, the Turkish march, with its brief suggestion of sensual eastern life, gave quite a novelty in these concerts, and the fascinating measures of Berlioz's "Le Bal" made full amends for whatever of weariness was caused by portions of the evening's symphony. With the usual consideration for the fitness of things shown in the management of these concerts, a second harp was added to the usual forces for the Berlioz number.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of Saturday night began with Schubert's overture "in the Italian style." Just where the à l'italienne comes in, except in the title, it is not easy to decide, unless the smooth flow of sweet melodies, sustained on unobtrusive accompaniments and unobscured by any process of elaboration, be supposed to be particularly Italian. There is certainly in it none of Porpora's deep harmony nor anything of southern fervor, but the overture is consonant with sense and grateful to hearing, especially when so well and easily played, as on this evening. After that, Mrs. Henschel sang Mozart's "Porgi Amor" ("Le Nozze di Figaro") to full orchestral accompaniment. Mrs. Henschel is a singer whose means, and whose use of them grow from month to month. Her voice, never to be a large one, constantly gains body and meaning, and the intellectual correctness of her reading is vitalized by a sentiment which, although not passionate indeed, has a suggestive character which makes a favorable effect upon the hearer. The aria was sung with simplicity, but it implied truly the feeling which the composer portrayed in it. The symphony, which was Brahms's first, in C minor, followed, and showed strikingly the advance which the orchestra has made upon its own work of previous seasons. Passage after passage became obvious to the understanding which had before been dark, and thus justified our remark, made after the first hearing of the symphony, that much of its obscurity might be due to the want of proper apprehension on the part of the players. Yet it cannot be said that even such careful and sensitive playing made the symphony all clear or all enjoyable. The work seems to strive after the unattainable; it is full of irritant and restless discords; it has strange, climbing, grasping phrases which seem to be trying to drag down something which still glides upward from their reach; its pastoral motifs often break away in suggestion of storm and confusion; the strings are frequently urged to the very top of their compass, and at times, as in the first and last movement, a sort of Walpurgis Night sweeps down and whirls everything away in a rhythmic chaos. There is constantly displayed the finest knowledge of orchestration, and some of the illustrations of this are highly dramatic, as, for instance, in the last movement, when the delicate adagio has ended and the wild flight of the strings in pizzicato suddenly ceases, the solemn voice of the contra-bassoon speaks, in almost tremendous contrast, with its deepest tones. The second movement, andante sostenuto, with its pleasant violin solo, which Mr. Listemann played gracefully, is the most acceptable movement as a whole, and the musical interest of the last is somewhat diminished by the marked reminiscences it brings of the thought, although not of the exact phraseology, of Beethoven's ninth symphony.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, Mrs. Henschel being the soloist, and the programme as follows: Overture in the Italian style, op. 170, Schubert; Cavatina ("Le Nozze di Figaro"), Mozart; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Turkish march ("The Ruins of Athens"), Beethoven; Song with piano, "Adieu de l'Hôtesse Arabe" (M.S.), Henschel; "Le Bal" (from the Symphonie fantastique), Berlioz. The playing of the orchestra was exceedingly good throughout, and the Brahms symphony was better performed than ever before. Despite repeated hearings, however, it does not gain in interest, and continues to impress as a dull and heavy piece of composition. Mrs. Henschel's singing was exceedingly good, the chief interest in it centering upon Mr. Henschel's song, which was a strange but interesting and able work. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture (Iphigenie en Aulide), Gluck; Concerto for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15 (first time), Johan S. Svendsen; Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music (Henry VIII.), Saint-Saens. Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.

LATE COMERS AT CONCERTS.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

Human nature doesn't like being lashed for sins not its own. I did not thoroughly read your article on late comers at the symphony rehearsals, but I can assure you that some of us are unavoidably late. Is it an easy matter, think you, for a suburban who works till 2 P.M., to reach Music Hall at 2:30 P.M.? Herdies and hansom, as you may know, are not at hand in the outlying wards; and if they were, many workers would not feel that they could call them. "Workers can stay at home." Surely; but some of us had felt that the afternoon rehearsals were partly for this very class, who cannot well, for several reasons, go in the evening. And so some of us take "half the loaf" often. Isn't it rather crusty not to be allowed to stand inside, after heroic exertions for the large "half"?

I respectfully submit: Would not your influential pen do good service in trying to secure 3 P.M., or even 2:45 P.M., as the opening hour? Possibly some would then, as now, need to leave before the close; but, with the approximate time necessary for the performance of the closing number printed on the programme, those who have consciences—musical or other—could do so at a relatively fitting moment. And some who would like to be prompt, and who would like especially the opening number, would also be gratified. Allow me to subscribe myself, very respectfully yours,

BOTH DEFENDANT AND PLAINTIFF.

Boston, Jan. 4, 1884.

178 observed

The Twelfth Symphony Concert.

Perhaps the most delightful number—certainly the freshest—of the programme for the twelfth symphony concert, was Mr. Henschel's own contribution—a manuscript composition upon Victor Hugo's poem "L'adieu de l'hotesse Arabe." The spirit of Orientalism is in the music, which constantly alludes to Eastern figures and phrases, and reproduces them in their essence but without ever undertaking to copy, or even to imitate them. At the same time all regard is had to modern taste, and the song, if sung without any indication of its meaning, would give delight by the variety and beauty of its forms. Mrs. Henschel sang it charmingly; and so she also did Mozart's Porgi amor, reading it simply, and relying upon the clearness of the author's text as able to convey his meaning, without any extra effort of hers. If singers would oftener recognize that music has a power of its own; and that to always insist upon forcing themselves into it may sometimes destroy the author's purpose, how much better it would be!

The symphony was Brahms's first. Mr. Henschel has gained so much in command of himself and of his orchestra, that this great work, so nearly incomprehensible when first played, now became almost wholly comprehensible, and was far more enjoyable—as sense as well as sound—than many even musical people had believed it could be. Schubert's "Italian" overture, nicely read and finely shaded; Beethoven's "Turkish march," rather forced and flurried in time; and Berlioz's waltz, "Le Bal," which seems rather deplace out of its connection with the "Fantastic" symphony,—completed the evening's bill.

182

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5TH, AT 8, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Iphigénie en Aulide.) GLUCK.

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN in D. op. 61. BEETHOVEN.
Allegro, ma non troppo.—Larghetto. Rondo.—
(Cadenzas by David.)

SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 2. op. 15. JOHAN S. SVENDSEN.
(First time.)
Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—Intermezzo. (Allegro giusto.)
Finale. (Andante. Allegro con fuoco.)—

CONCERTINO in E flat, for CLARINET. op. 26. WEBER.

BALLET MUSIC. (Henry VIII.) SAINT-SAËNS.

SOLOISTS:

MR. LOUIS SCHMIDT, Jr., Violin.

MR. E. STRASSER, Clarinet.

184

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,

March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 152 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

185

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A specially long but thoroughly interesting programme was given last evening in this series. It began with Gluck's beautiful overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," a work which never can lose the charm which attaches to pure and symmetrical music. Following this came Beethoven's concerto for violin, in D, played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, jr. The first movement of this work is not of a character to arouse great enthusiasm, and the manner of its performance added to the effect which might be summarized like a weather report—"cold and clear." The deep notes of the cadenza by David were raspy and this first cadenza seemed rather barren of all save virtuosity. The rhythmic strokes of the orchestra in the latter part of this movement are very effective, and, by the way, this was always a favorite device of Beethoven's, and one which was followed by Schubert in his Symphony in C, and was satirized by some of the critics of the composer. The second movement is in every sense more beautiful and noble, and here the player began to show how excellent a violinist he is. From the first tender theme, against the horn passage, to the final melody supported by pizzicato chords, his legato playing was flawless. The tone might perhaps have been broader, but could not have been steadier or better shaded. The horn, unfortunately, "broke" in a rather critical diminuendo passage at the close of this movement. At the beginning of the Rondo, the orchestra were not steady, and the first phrases of accompaniment were very irresolute, but this fault was only transient, and the rest of the movement, with its ingenious treatment of a quaint theme, went in a manner that reflected credit on soloist and orchestra. The other soloist of the concert was Mr. E. Strasser, who, in a concertino by Weber, proved himself a clarinetist of great ability. The work dealt chiefly in virtuosity, but in its central portion the gloomy color of the deeper notes of the instrument was also displayed with effect. Mr. Strasser's surety in the highest register, and especially in the final cadenza and trill deserve praise. The Svendsen symphony was heard here for the first time. A little of Bizet, a little of Norwegian melody, and a great deal of trombone were the salient points of the work. The first movement opens at once with the theme, a rather majestic one, which has a marked figure in its first phrase, which lends itself well to development. The second theme is well contrasted with this, and the closing theme begins the blare of brass. The conventional repeat is made—is it not time that this bit of ancient formalism were abolished?—and the development begins with the above mentioned figure given in the bass strings, and responded to by the deeper wood-wind. This portion of the work is interesting, though short. The themes return, somewhat altered in their order, but practically unchanged, and a short but emphatic coda closes this part. The second movement is chiefly given to the wood-wind, and is chiefly remarkable for the blending of two themes, an oboe melody, and a third pizzicato subject, Trombone to close. The third movement begins with merry dancing figures (flute) against a drone bass, and the grace of the ballet music school is present. The first figures are very playfully treated, closing with a final reiteration on bassoon. The final movement is joyous and brilliant, full of striking contrasts, and—for a change—some trombone. The composer's version of Hoyle must read, "When in doubt play trombone." The close was taken at a furious pace, and it speaks well for the orchestra that they were able to sustain it. Lack of space forces brevity upon us, but we can briefly say that with a little less of trombone, the symphony would be a most agreeable and graceful one. The concert closed with a repetition of a portion of the Henry VIII. ballet music, which, with the exception of a couple of errors in the brass, was well given, to a rapidly departing audience. When the Boston auditor is filled up with harmonies—he goes. What a pity he fills up so quickly.

Courier

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The performance opened with Guido's noble overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," which was broadly and impressively interpreted, the strings acquitting themselves with admirable spirit and precision. It was followed by Beethoven's concerto for violin, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr. This young artist has a light but pure tone, an excellent technique, and a style in which musicianly taste, expressiveness and vigor are pleasingly manifested. His playing shows every evidence of careful training and earnest study. That he wholly succeeded in grasping the possibilities of the opening movement and developing its largeness cannot be conceded; but his interpretation was marked by many excellent points, and his performance of it was clean-cut and true in technique and intonation. In the largetto and finale his success was greater, and here his performances fairly earned the hearty approval that rewarded them. Mr. Schmidt must be particularly credited for the steadiness and the freedom from affectation that distinguished his efforts throughout. The symphony was one by Svendsen, No. 2, in B-flat, which was played for the first time here. It is bright, pleasant and spirited work, showing taste, full and well-applied learning, and with a delightful grace and breeziness in its general characteristics. There are some seemingly heavy moments in which the composer appears to be seeking extremes of thematic development; but the work, taken altogether, is notable for its freshness, fluency and freedom. It was played in a dashing, brilliant and generally impressive manner. It proved pleasing to critical taste, and will doubtless afford a still greater pleasure upon a second hearing. Mr. E. Strasser also appeared as a soloist, performing Weber's beautiful concertino in E-flat for clarinet. This artist has a beautiful tone,—a pianissimo of rare delicacy and purity, and a complete mastery over the technique of his instrument. His interpretation of the work was masterly from beginning to end in the fine taste, the clearness and the artistic sentiment that distinguished it. The concert ended with the ballet music from Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII.," a selection that was given at a recent concert. It is chiefly noticeable for its dainty orchestration of familiar melodies, and for its characteristically French confusion regarding the eras of such airs as "Haste to the Wedding," "Love's Young Dream," and English, Irish and Scotch tunes, ancient and modern, generally. At the next concert will be performed: Overture "King Lear," Berlioz; Concerto for Flute and Harp, Mozart; Symphony No. 5, Beethoven. Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Henidl and Mr. A. Freygang will appear as soloists.

Gazette

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 13th concert in the present season's course by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening, and this was the programme:

Overture. ("Iphigénie en Aulide").....Gluck
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johan S. Svendsen
Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26.....Weber
Ballet music. ("Henry VIII.").....Saint-Saëns

Again Mr. Henschel is to be thanked for a hearing of another new symphony. This time the composer is from the north of Europe. Svendsen of Christiania has become only a little known to our concertgoers, through recent performances of four lesser orchestral works, all of which were produced by the Philharmonic Society. He was born in 1840, studied chiefly at Leipzig, and, apart from his composition, is an accomplished violinist. Mr. Henschel is the first conductor in America to play this symphony; nor has it been heard in London. The work is interesting throughout, and not so difficult as to absorb the band wholly in the playing of notes, though there are many places where the usual Brahms fixations of mind—which is second nature now to our orchestral players, thanks to the stern will of Mr. Henschel—is of positive value to prevent confusion. It is sunshine, fresh, glowing, and the player seems to feel its vitality, so uniformly well was everything done. There is no lack of modern thought displayed, for its complete and well defined subject is seen with the aid of the full orchestra of the present, the composer tacitly declining the usual fortissimo blast and howl, ever in his fingers. It is written by a genial hand, to whom music is something alive. It is fervent and spontaneous, and speaks of the woods and haunts of nature rather than the den of the musical scientist. The listener may wonder a little at first where the strings, after a dozen measures, take up the theme of the allegro in three-quarter time, that matters become prolix so quickly, but the form is quickly recovered, the woods and brass are in time allowed the usual courtesies with the theme, until a final sweeping unison (so reminding of the "Elysium" music; the poetry and grandeur of some of those choruses of Paine's; who will ever forget them!) unites the whole band. The andante sostenuto, in common time, given to the clarinet to introduce, is full of charm. Much skill is shown in the musical handling, fine climaxes occurring where the basses carry the song, accompanied by the strings in rapid floriture, while the woodwinds play a sober, sweeping adornment. The intermezzo is buoyant, graceful and short; may be the tune of a shepherd, or the dance of a jolly peasant. The closing movement is the most learned. While the symphony is not profound, it is more formal than that of Volkmann, so recently played by this orchestra, though the spirit of the two composers seems not unlike, in that they each wrote from a standpoint not stubbornly scientific. We are sure this symphony will be heard again with increased pleasure, and if it is Mr. Henschel's good fortune to lay hold upon some of the fresh manuscript said to have been discovered among Volkmann's effects, we hope it will be played, that people may know how much beauty there remained pent up in the soul of the man who died from want. The orchestra is to be praised for so rare a performance of a new work. It was only in the final rush of the strings toward the closing of the finale that there was anything like a noise, and this was only for a moment. Some of the syncopated work was most carefully done. The band in the intermezzo were all clever. The other orchestral numbers were well contrasted. We may call the Gluck overture ancient, but we have only to go back to the first performance of the opera in Paris, where the new composer was honored by the most critical audience of the time with unfettered approbation. The wonderful unison here, the command of the oracle, is the key to the whole drama. It was played with great intensity. The Saint-Saëns méloange, with its potpourri from "Sir Roger" to "Johnny Comes Marching Home Again," through Verdi to a Scotch heath, was not at all a bad ending of a capitally good concert. The concerto for violin was played by Louis Schmidt, Jr., a young artist member of the orchestra, whose first appearance was made at last season's course. His playing is highly refined, and was a commendable feature. He is the only violinist who has played a Beethoven concerto in our midst for a long time, and if his play lacked breadth, it must be remembered that his ambition is high. We can't see why the very first figure in the allegro—written in triplets—was not played as written. The custom of adding cadenzas has, in this concerto, been done by F. David. It does seem inconsistent, and if Beethoven could have stopped this abuse, he would have restored the euphony of the larghetto by erasing the cadenza before the rondo. Mr. Schmidt was heartily greeted by the audience. It is fair to presume that to many of Mr. Henschel's auditors a concertino for the clarinet was a much of a revelation as a hymn from the triangle would have been, but surely the orchestra contains among the yet unspoken instruments no virtuoso who can more surely please than did Mr. E. Strasser by his fine work in this number. This Weber concertino, the only thing of the kind, was played by Mr. Strasser at a Philharmonic concert last season. It is very brilliant, and only the most facile player can overcome its difficulties, all of which were made light of in the easiest possible manner by the artist player. That Mr. Henschel should find so much fine material in his band as is evident through the recent solo performances of half a score or more of its members is only another proof of the splendid material here among us. That he gives these artists the opportunity is greatly to his credit.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Said Charles Reade in his "Christie Johnstone": "The Scotch are icebergs, with volcanoes underneath; thaw the Scotch ice, which is very cold, and you will get to the Scotch fire, warmer than any sun of Italy or Spain." Something of this seems to be in most Northern natures, and there is certainly much illustration of it in the symphony of the Danish Svendsen which Mr. Henschel introduced to Boston at Saturday night's concert. Even when the movement is cool, though still animated, there seems to be ever in it a spirit which is too much pent-up, and there comes a crescendo of gradual but undeniable power, sweeping on to a climax, when the great united blasts of the brass instruments strike an emphasis as distinct and dominant as the stamping of a mighty foot is more thrilling and more significant of passion than the mere beat of drums and common clash of cymbals. Then, after such an outburst, there frequently comes an instant of sudden silence, followed by a half-timid resumption of the theme, as if the author were almost ashamed of having been betrayed into such an exhibition of himself. This was to us the greatest peculiarity of style in the symphony, and it is quite unlike anything else which we can recall. For the rest, the music is beautifully unsophisticated in its ideas and in most of its phraseology. The themes are short, intelligible and most agreeable, given out largely by the wooden wind and the violoncello, the brass having little melodic movement, although the horn comes out into obligato toward the end of the first movement, and the brass in general has an odd, contrary motion and sentiment just at the close of the second. In the working out of the themes Svendsen shows the legitimate influence of at least two master minds; the rhetorical development has often the simplicity and the suggestiveness of Beethoven, now content with transferring the subject from voice to voice, and now recurring to it, after a digression, by indirect approaches, while the orchestration has not infrequently the flavor of Raff, especially in the treatment of the wooden wind and the lower strings. The first movement is rather long, and the sharp interruptions of what might else become monotonous in prolongation, would seem to imply that the author felt this, and checked himself, although he lacked perhaps the decision to do so quite soon enough. But, as we have already said, the work is fresh, genial, never stilted, often impassioned, merciful to the ear and to the mind, and well entitled to a second hearing. The orchestra played with remarkable clearness and consideration, and Mr. Henschel's conducting was easy, steady and sympathetic. Similar good qualities characterized the introductory "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture of Gluck, and the "Henry VIII." ballet music, given in repetition, as the closing number.

The soloists came from the orchestra. One was Mr. Strasser, who is one of the few clarinet players whose mastery of the voice of that sometimes hard and explosive instrument, and whose fine taste in giving a style to the conquered tones, entitle them to rank among virtuosi. He played the E-flat concertino of Weber with even more nicety of finish, and with decidedly more elan than when he gave it first, two seasons ago, in the Philharmonic series. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., was the other solo player, and had chosen Beethoven's violin concerto in D, opus 61, which he read to almost entire acceptance. Exception could only be taken to the first movement, which is one of those wonderful passages of Beethoven in which the flowing current of an allegro must yet be sustained, and full and broad and deep, as if expressive of a recognized and admitted joy pervading the calmness of strength and certainty. The playing was honest, direct and unaffected, and the tone was pure and pleasant; the rest should come with time, for Mr. Schmidt is an earnest musician and not an unenthusiastic one. The larghetto and rondo had more coloring in them, and the quaint contrast in the former of the alternations of the theme between the first and fourth strings was prettily marked. The rondo could have borne to spring along with a little greater vitality, and there were bars in all the movements the intonation of which was not irreproachable.

The fifth symphony of Beethoven falls regularly into the next programme, which contains a decided novelty in Mozart's concerto for flute and harp (first time), to be played by Messrs. Heindl and Freygang. Miss Rollwagen, the contralto, will sing songs and a scene from Bruch's "Odysseus," and the concert will open with Berlioz's "King Lear" overture. At the last concert of all, Schumann's "Manfred" music, and Beethoven's choral symphony are to be given.

The thirteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, when the following programme was presented: Overture ("Iphigénie en Aulide"), Gluck; concerto for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johan V. Svendsen; concertino in E flat for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music ("Henry VIII."), Saint-Saëns. The soloists on the occasion were Mr. E. Strasser, clarinetist, and Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violinist. The greatest interest of the evening was clustered around the symphony of Svendsen, which was heard for the first time in this country, which proved itself to be a refined and pleasing work, bright and sparkling, and interesting through all its movements. The orchestra played it almost as if one man, and they executed some of their best work of the season. The symphony will well repay a repetition, and we are sure that it will be listened to with pleasure whenever it may be placed on the programme. Gluck's overture and the Saint Saëns ballet music afforded the audience much enjoyment. Mr. Schmidt in his violin solo met with a good share of success. He displayed a good method and a decided knowledge of all the technicalities of his instrument, and he played with grace and expression. The same remarks will apply to Mr. Strasser, whose clarinet playing was of the first order. For the fourteenth concert, which is to be given on Saturday evening next, the following is the programme which has been selected: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scene from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro con brio—andante con moto; allegro, allegro; Presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute A. Freygang, harp.

"HALF-PAST TWO"—THE REMEDY.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

Let the doors be closed on the "tap of the conductor's baton," and let no one enter until the overture is finished; in short, let no one enter during the performance of any piece. This may require at first a little decision and firmness on the part of manager and attendants, but when once established, the practice will be applauded by every one, as it is at other halls, where it has been the unvaried rule for years.

EXPERIENCE.

Is it not about time that some of Professor Paine's orchestral works should be given at the symphony concerts? When even the lesser European lights are seen on the programmes, it seems that American leaders in music might also be heard.

MUSIC, DRAMA, ART.

Fugitive Echoes from Studio, Concert Room and Stage.

The Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth symphony concert was given at Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Overture ("Iphigenie en Aulide"), Gluck; concert, for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johann S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Webber; ballet music ("Henry VIII.") Saint-Saëns. Mr. Henschel introduced the symphony in B flat of the Danish composer Svendsen, which was heard for the first time in Boston. The movement of this symphony, slow and quiet at first, becomes very lively and spirited as it proceeds, gathering power at every successive step, until it ends at last in a grand and soul-stirring climax in which all the brass instruments come in with almost startling force. Then follows a moment of silence, after which the music sweeps on again as before, until the close. The orchestra did its part exceedingly well while Mr. Henschel directed the whole with grace, firmness, and an intelligent and masterly comprehension of the requirements of the piece. The violin solos of Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., were gracefully rendered, his technique being admirable and his execution finished and easy. Mr. E. Strasser, of the clarinet soloist, surprised and delighted the audience by his mastery of that difficult instrument. His rendering of the E-flat concertino of Webber—a piece in which he always excels—was more than commonly fine. It would be hard to conceive how he could have improved it. For the fourteenth concert, which is to be given on Saturday evening next, the following programme has been selected: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro, con brio—andante con moto; allegro, allegro; presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

Symphony Concert.

At the thirteenth symphony concert last evening the following programme was given:
Overture (Iphigenie en Aulide).....Gluck
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15.....Johan S. Svendsen
(First time.)
Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26.....Weber
Ballet music (Henry VIII.).....Saint-Saëns
Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.
The interest of the evening centred chiefly upon the novelty, Svendsen's symphony. It is in four movements, and in general follows classical models. The first two movements are full of the poetic, romantic fervor which has made Svendsen famous, and the whole work is filled with pleasing melodies. The interest is not, however, maintained fully to the end. Mr. Schmidt, a member of the orchestra, played the Beethoven concerto with good taste and execution, but he can hardly be considered as being up to the level of the soloists who appear at the concerts. Mr. Strasser is an excellent player on the clarinet, and his brief number proved most interesting. The playing of the orchestra was excellent throughout. Little enthusiasm was roused, and this must be laid to the make-up of the programme, which was far from being as interesting as usual. Unless the symphony of the evening is a great masterpiece, the whole entertainment seems weak. The programme for next week promises better. It is as follows:

Overture (King Lear).....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for flute and harp in C.....Mozart
(First time.)
Songs with piano.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro. Allegro; Presto.
Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.
The thirteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture ("Iphigenie en Aulide"), Gluck; concert, for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johan S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music ("Henry VIII."), Saint-Saëns. The chief feature of the programme was the Svendsen symphony, which was played for the first time in America on this occasion. It proved a very interesting work, bright and pleasing in its general effect, and very refined and pure in its expression. It is to be hoped that a second hearing of it may soon be allowed. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., was the violin soloist, and made a decided success, showing an agreeable and well-formed style, a confident technical power and a good degree of expression. Mr. E. Strasser, the clarinet soloist, played his selection in a manner that was above criticism, and showed himself to be a master of his instrument. The playing of the orchestra was very good, barring some weakness and irregularity in parts of the support of Mr. Schmidt's solo. The programme for the next concert is a very interesting one, and is as follows: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro con brio—andante con moto; allegro, allegro; presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

Notes and Announcements.

We regret that lack of space forbids review of last night's Symphony concert. Beethoven's fifth symphony was given in a manner vastly in advance of its previous performance, although the first attacks were still rough. Miss Rollwagen aroused much enthusiasm by her singing, as did also Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, by a flute and harp concerto performed in a musicianly manner.

CONCERTO FOR FLUTE AND HARP in C.
(First time.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—
Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—

SOLOISTS:
MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN.
MR. E. M. HEINDL, Flute.
MR. A. FREYGANG, Harp.

Music Hall.

1883-84.

ONY ORCHESTR

SCHHEL, CONDUCTOR.

ONCERT.

RY 12TH, AT 8, P. M.

AMME.

ving a garment.)

MUSICAL OBSERVER.

ISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Tremont Street, Boston.

Observer Publishing Company.

SSIER - - - MANAGER.

Subscription.

ED STATES AND CANADA.

ear.).....$4.00
months.).....$2.00

Postage Prepaid.

DVERTISING RATES.

BERL r.).....$80.
nths.).....$20. insertion.).....25 cents.
BRUCARDS, (per year.).....$10.

ions relating to business, should be addressed,
RVER PUBLISHING COMPANY. All other
should be addressed Editorial Department,
VER.

ts, Money Orders, etc, should be made payable
MUSICAL OBSERVER PUBLISHING COM-

OBSERVER is mailed every Wednesday
rs not receiving their paper in time should ately.

ICAL OBSERVER PUBLISHING COMPANY.

portant Notice.

l Observer Publishing Company,
the production of a representative ra has been largely hindered by the niary support on the part of manaoffer hereby a prize of

THOUSAND DOLLARS,
ra, comic or otherwise, sent into the
paper by the 1st day of July, 1884.
the following conditions;
must be bona fide the work of an
or naturalized, and resident in this

MUSIC, DRAMA, ART.

Fugitive Echoes from Studio, Concert Room and Stage.

The Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth symphony concert was given at Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Overture ("Iphigenie en Aulide"), Gluck; concert, for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johann S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Webber; ballet music ("Henry VIII.") Saint-Saëns. Mr. Henschel introduced the symphony in B flat of the Danish composer Svendsen, which was heard for the first time in Boston. The movement of this symphony, slow and quiet at first, becomes very lively and spirited as it proceeds, gathering power at every successive step, until it ends at last in a grand and soul-stirring climax in which all the brass instruments come in with almost startling force. Then follows a moment of silence, after which the music sweeps on again as before, until the close. The orchestra did its part exceedingly well while Mr. Henschel directed the whole with grace, firmness, and an intelligent and masterly comprehension of the requirements of the piece. The violin solos of Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., were gracefully rendered, his technique being admirable and his execution finished and easy. Mr. E. Strasser, of the clarinet soloist, surprised and delighted the audience by his mastery of that difficult instrument. His rendering of the E-flat concertino of Webber—a piece in which he always excels—was more than commonly fine. It would be hard to conceive how he could have improved it. For the fourteenth concert, which is to be given on Saturday evening next, the following programme has been selected: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro, con brio—Andante con moto; allegro, allegro; presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

Symphony Concert.

At the thirteenth symphony concert last evening the following programme was given:

Overture (Iphigenie en Aulide).....Gluck
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15.....Johan S. Svendsen
(First time.)

Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26.....Weber
Ballet music (Henry VIII.).....Saint-Saëns
Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.

The interest of the evening centred chiefly upon the novelty, Svendsen's symphony. It is in four movements, and in general follows classical models. The first two movements are full of the poetic, romantic fervor which has made Svendsen famous, and the whole work is filled with pleasing melodies. The interest is not, however, maintained fully to the end. Mr. Schmidt, a member of the orchestra, played the Beethoven concerto with good taste and execution, but he can hardly be considered as being up to the level of the soloists who appear at the concerts. Mr. Strasser is an excellent player on the clarinet, and his brief number proved most interesting. The playing of the orchestra was excellent throughout. Little enthusiasm was roused, and this must be laid to the make-up of the programme, which was far from being as interesting as usual. Unless the symphony of the evening is a great masterpiece, the whole entertainment seems weak. The programme for next week promises better. It is as follows:

Overture (King Lear).....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for flute and harp in C.....Mozart
(First time.)

Songs with piano.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro, Allegro; Presto.
Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture ("Iphigenie en Aulide"), Gluck; concert, for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johan S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music ("Henry VIII."), Saint-Saëns. The chief feature of the programme was the Svendsen symphony, which was played for the first time in America on this occasion. It proved a very interesting work, bright and pleasing in its general effect, and very refined and pure in its expression. It is to be hoped that a second hearing of it may soon be allowed. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., was the violin soloist, and made a decided success, showing an agreeable and well-formed style, a confident technical power and a good degree of expression. Mr. E. Strasser, the clarinet soloist, played his selection in a manner that was above criticism, and showed himself to be a master of his instrument. The playing of the orchestra was very good, barring some weakness and irregularity in parts of the support of Mr. Schmidt's solo. The programme for the next concert is a very interesting one, and is as follows: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro con brio—Andante con moto; allegro, allegro; presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

We regret that lack of space forbids review of last night's Symphony concert. Beethoven's fifth symphony was given in a manner vastly in advance of its previous performance, although the first attacks were still rough. Miss Rollwagen aroused much enthusiasm by her singing, as did also Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, by a flute and harp concerto performed in a musicianly manner.

CONCERTO FOR FLUTE AND HARP in C.
(First time.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.

Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—
Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—

SOLOISTS:

MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN.

MR. E. M. HEINDL, Flute.

MR. A. FREYGANG, Harp.

Music Hall.

1883-84.

ONY ORCHESTR.

SCHHEL, CONDUCTOR.

ONCERT.

RY 12TH, AT 8, P. M.

AMME.

ving a garment.)

MUSICAL OBSERVER.

ISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

Tremont Street, Boston.

Observer Publishing Company.

SSIER - - - MANAGER.

Subscription.

ED STATES AND CANADA.

Year.....$4.00
Months.....$2.00

Postage Prepaid.

VERTISING RATES.

BERL.....$80.
Months.....$20.
Insertion.....25 cents.
BRUCARDS, (per year.).....$10.

ions relating to business, should be addressed,
VER PUBLISHING COMPANY. All other
should be addressed Editorial Department,
VER.

ts, Money Orders, etc., should be made payable
MUSICAL OBSERVER PUBLISHING COM-

OBSERVER is mailed every Wednesday
rs not receiving their paper in time should
ately.

MUSICAL OBSERVER PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Important Notice.

Observer Publishing Company,
the production of a representative
ra has been largely hindered by the niary support on the part of mana-
, offer hereby a prize of

THOUSAND DOLLARS,

ra, comic or otherwise, sent into the
paper by the 1st day of July, 1884.
the following conditions;

must be bona fide the work of an
or naturalized, and resident in this

MUSIC, DRAMA, ART.

Fugitive Echoes from Studio, Concert Room and Stage.

The Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth symphony concert was given at Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Overture ("Iphigenie en Aulide"), Gluck; concert, for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johann S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Webber; ballet music ("Henry VIII.") Saint-Saëns. Mr. Henschel introduced the symphony in B flat of the Danish composer Svendsen, which was heard for the first time in Boston. The movement of this symphony, slow and quiet at first, becomes very lively and spirited as it proceeds, gathering power at every successive step, until it ends at last in a grand and soul-stirring climax in which all the brass instruments come in with almost startling force. Then follows a moment of silence, after which the music sweeps on again as before, until the close. The orchestra did its part exceedingly well while Mr. Henschel directed the whole with grace, firmness, and an intelligent and masterly comprehension of the requirements of the piece. The violin solos of Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., were gracefully rendered, his technique being admirable and his execution finished and easy. Mr. E. Strasser, and the clarinet soloist, surprised and delighted the audience by his mastery of that difficult instrument. His rendering of the E-flat concertino of Webber—a piece in which he always excels—was more than commonly fine. It would be hard to conceive how he could have improved it. For the fourteenth concert, which is to be given on Saturday evening next, the following programme has been selected: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro, con brio—Andante con moto; allegro, allegro; presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

Symphony Concert.

At the thirteenth symphony concert last evening the following programme was given:
Overture (Iphigenie en Aulide).....Gluck
Concerto for violin in D, op. 61.....Beethoven
Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15.....Johann S. Svendsen
(First time.)
Concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26.....Weber
Ballet music (Henry VIII.).....Saint-Saëns
Soloists: Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet.
The interest of the evening centred chiefly upon the novelty, Svendsen's symphony. It is in four movements, and in general follows classical models. The first two movements are full of the poetic, romantic fervor which has made Svendsen famous, and the whole work is filled with pleasing melodies. The interest is not, however, maintained fully to the end. Mr. Schmidt, a member of the orchestra, played the Beethoven concerto with good taste and execution, but he can hardly be considered as being

up to the level of the soloists who appear at the concerts. Mr. Strasser is an excellent player on the clarinet, and his brief number proved most interesting. The playing of the orchestra was excellent throughout. Little enthusiasm was roused, and this must be laid to the make-up of the programme, which was far from being as interesting as usual. Unless the symphony of the evening is a great masterpiece, the whole entertainment seems weak. The programme for next week promises better. It is as follows:
Overture (King Lear).....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for flute and harp in C.....Mozart
(First time.)
Songs with piano.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto.
Allegro. Allegro; Presto.
Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

The thirteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was formed: Overture ("Iphigenie en Aulide"), Gluck; concert, for violin in D, op. 61, Beethoven; symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 15, Johann S. Svendsen; concertino in E flat, for clarinet, op. 26, Weber; ballet music ("Henry VIII.") Saint-Saëns. The chief feature of the programme was the Svendsen symphony, which was played for the first time in America on this occasion. It proved a very interesting work, bright and original in its general effect, and very refined and in its expression. It is to be hoped that a hearing of it may soon be allowed. Mr. Schmidt, Jr., was the violin soloist, and made a decided success, showing an agreeable and formed style, a confident technical power, and a good degree of expression. Mr. E. Strasser, clarinet soloist, played his selection in a manner that was above criticism, and showed himself to be a master of his instrument. The playing of the orchestra was very good, barring some weakness and irregularity in parts of the support of Schmidt's solo. The programme for the next concert is a very interesting one, and is as follows: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven; allegro con brio—Andante con moto; allegro, allegro; presto. Soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, A. Freygang, harp.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS
We regret that lack of space forbids review of last night's Symphony concert. Beethoven's fifth was given in a manner vastly in advance of its performance, although the first attacks were somewhat weak. Miss Rollwagen aroused much enthusiasm by her performance of the flute concerto, as did also Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, by a harp concerto performed in a musicianly manner.

CONCERTO FOR FLUTE AND

SONGS WITH PIANO.

SYMPHONY in C minor. No. 5.

Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.
Allegro. Allegro; Presto.

MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN.
MR. E. M. HEINDL.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Henschel presented a programme of unusually varied make-up at the thirteenth symphony concert. A new symphony, a clarinet solo and a violin solo, certainly make diversity enough, and it was an interesting diversity as well. The symphony in question was the second written by Svendsen, a native of Christiania in Norway, and a remarkably fine illustration of the Scandinavian musical mind. Its themes were simple and natural in themselves, straightforwardly put, and honestly worked out, without any lack of learning or variety, and yet without abstruseness or far-fetched effects. It was a severe test of the symphony that it followed directly after Beethoven's great D major violin concerto, in which the orchestra does not merely serve as a support to the solo instrument, but maintains its own integrity and individuality; but the test was well borne, and there were many passages in Svendsen's writing which were not unworthy of being quoted beside Beethoven's. But we do not mean to imply any want of originality in the symphony, and had we the space, we might point out in a more than general way many curiously individual fashions of thought and of expression,—for instance, certain abrupt changes of purpose, as we might call them, when a digression is suddenly broken off in an impatient way, and "the previous question" is moved quite unexpectedly. There is much of idyllic flavor to the work, and the presentation of the themes is most frequently assuaged to the oboe, horn and others which are especially associated with pastoral subjects. For a first performance the reading was remarkably fine, the orchestra playing freely, confidently, and with fine appreciation. There was excellent work also done in the overture, which was Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis, and in the representation of St. Saëns' medley of Scotch and English airs, which he has so ingeniously and entertainingly cooked for the "characteristic"—we suppose it should be called—of his Henry VIII.

The violin concerto which we just mentioned was played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, jr., who sits at the second desk, behind Mr. Listemann. A conscientious, careful, tasteful player, modestly subordinating himself to his work, clean in execution, generally nice in intonation, thoughtful in reading, and sensible in emphasis, Mr. Schmidt made an excellent impression. The greatest powers of the greatest violinist would have ample scope in this grand concerto, and it is no discredit to this young man to say that in the first allegro he did not seem to go very deep into the sentiment. The adagio was rendered feelingly, and the rondo flowed fluently. Mr. Strasser, of course, played the clarinet solo number—which was Weber's E-flat concerto—with splendid technique, flawlessly smooth tone, and sufficient animation, exhibiting both the resources of the instrument for solo music and the skill with which Weber had written for those resources, of which only a very players can give more than a vague idea.

190

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 12TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (King Lear.) BERLIOZ.

SCENA from "Odysseus." (Penelope weaving a garment.) . . . BRUCH.

CONCERTO FOR FLUTE AND HARP in C. (First time.) . . . MOZART.

[Cadenzas by G. Henschel.]

Allegro.—Andantino.—Rondo. (Allegro.)

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) DER TOD UND DAS MÄDCHEN. SCHUBERT.

b) "AUS ALTEN MÄRCHEN." SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY in C minor. No. 5, op. 67. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—

Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—

SOLOISTS:

MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN.

MR. E. M. HEINDL, Flute.

MR. A. FREYGANG, Harp.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

SCENA. (Penelope Weaving a Garment.)

BRUCH.

This garment by day I weave in my sorrow,
And ravel the web in the still hour of night;
Thus wearying long, yet my tears greet the morrow,
Hope vanishes as the long years take flight!

Where art thou my husband?
Hath bitter Fate borne thee down into baleful Hades'
abyss?
Or by tempests toss'd, art thou roving upon the wide-
way'd and billowy sea?

Return, my Odysseus, return, oh my husband!
Come, ere this garment my hands shall have wrought!
Th' importunate suitors with boldness assail thy devoted spouse!
Unjustly despoiling thy son of his birthright,
Each day do they dare 'neath thy roof to carouse!
Return, my Odysseus, my husband!

SONG. (Death and the Maiden.)

SCHUBERT.

THE MAIDEN: Oh pass me, pass me by, thou wild and hoary man! I am yet young; go rather and do not touch me!

DEATH: Give me thy hand, thou tender, lovely image; I am a friend, and do not come to punish. Be of good cheer, I am not wild; Shalt softly sleep within my arms.

SONG. (The Stories of our Childhood.)

SCHUMANN.

The stories of our childhood invite with beck'ning hand
And sing to softest music about a magic land,
Where full blown flow'rets languish in evening's golden light,
And mingle lovelorn glances in bridal beauty bright;

Where all the trees are vocal, and all in concert sing,
And tuned to blithest music, the limpid fountains spring;
And love strains ring melodious, sweet as no tongue can tell,
Till love's resistless longings possess thee like a spell.

And oh! could I be yonder, and lighten there my breast,
And free from every torture be happy and at rest!
Alas! that land enchanted, full oft my dreams display;
But with the dawn of morning, like mist it melts away.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a large audience. The performance opened with Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, that strange mixture of nobility and commonplace, of great power and great weakness. It was accorded a broad and vigorous rendering. The novelty of the programme was a concerto for flute and harp in C, by Mozart, which was played for the first time here. The work is wholly characteristic of the composer in his most familiar vein. It is in regular concerto form, having the three usual movements. The combination is a curious one, and not particularly effective in a large hall, the two instruments having but little in sympathy. The flute part is written largely and broadly, and with a thorough feeling for the peculiar quality and a complete knowledge of the capacity of the instrument, and is always interesting. The harp part is written in a conventional and somewhat monotonous manner, though doubtless it fully met all the possibilities to which players had arrived, in Mozart's time; but the thin upper notes are used and the rich lower notes are avoided with a persistency that at length becomes tiresome. The work itself overflows with beauties of almost every description. The opening allegro wonderfully fresh and solid, is scored, as is, in fact, the whole concerto, in the composer's most delightful manner. The slow movement is exquisitely chaste, tender and playful, and the finale is fairly fascinating in its naïveté and uninterrupted flow. The solo parts were played by Mr. E. M. Heindl and Mr. A. Freygang in a purely artistic style. The concerto was warmly applauded, and seemed to have excited equal pleasure and surprise in its hearers. The cadenzas written for it by Mr. Henschel were brilliant and wholly in keeping with the character of the work. The symphony was Beethoven's in C minor, which was very finely interpreted throughout. It was the most artistic and most satisfying reading that Mr. Henschel has given of it. The work of the orchestra was almost flawless. The vocalist was Miss Louise Rollwagen, whose singing was marked by true musicianly intelligence. She has a good contralto voice, somewhat dry in the extreme lower notes, but of good quality in the middle and upper registers. Her first contribution to the concert was Penelope's song from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," a labored and not particularly attractive composition, but Miss Rollwagen sang it with winning freshness, and in an earnest, natural and honest style that was very interesting. Her other solos were Schubert's weird song, "Death and the Maiden," and Schumann's gay and brilliant "Stories of Our Childhood," in both which her sweet voice and refined taste were pleasingly heard. She made a most favorable impression, and was cordially applauded and recalled. At the next concert will be performed Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture; Raff's Winter Symphony (first time); a Serenade in canon form for strings, by Mr. Henschel; and the March from Wagner's "Tannhauser." Miss Emily Winant is to be the soloist.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair proportions. The following programme was performed, Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flutist, and Mr. A. Freygang, harpist, being the soloists: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scene from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Der Tod und das Mädchen, Schubert; (b) "Aus alten Märcchen," Schumann; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven. The concert was one of the most interesting of the season, and the programme throughout was exceedingly well performed. The work of the orchestra was very strong and of unusually even excellence, the symphony, in particular, receiving a much better interpretation than it has ever before gained at the hands of this organization. The concerto for flute and harp by Mozart, the novelty of the evening, proved to be a beautiful work, although giving but limited opportunities to the harp. The flute part, however, was delightful, and gave full occasion for the exercise of all of Mr. Heindl's unexcelled powers of force and expression. Miss Rollwagen sang with much taste and expression, although her selections did not particularly commend themselves, and, like Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, she was recalled after each of her efforts. The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air (Samson and Dalila), Saint-Saëns, (first time); symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff, (first time); serenade in Canonform for Strings, op. 23, Henschel, (first time); song; march (Tannhauser), Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth symphony concert presented an attractive programme, commencing with Berlioz' "King Lear" overture, including Mozart's concerto for flute and harp in G, and closing with Beethoven's ever fresh and popular fifth symphony. The orchestral work was at its usual standard throughout the evening, an occasional roughness among the strings being the only defect. The soloist was Miss Louise Rollwagen, a contralto singer of considerable merit. She met with much favor, and was recalled after each of her three numbers. The Mozart concerto was more interesting than some of the minor works of the composer which have been played here from time to time as novelties. Mr. E. M. Heindl with the flute and Mr. A. Freygang with the harp were the soloists. Their work was admirably done, Mr. Henschel's brilliant and difficult cadenzas being exceedingly well done. A printed request inserted between the leaves of the programme, that the individuals in the audience would not disturb everybody by going out in the midst of the playing, ensured an undisturbed performance of the last movement of the symphony. It is announced that at the last concert of the season, March 22, Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," as well as Beethoven's choral symphony, will be given. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven
Recitative and air, "Samson and Dalila," Saint-Saëns
(First time.)
Symphony in A minor, "The Winter," No. 11,
op. 24.....Raff
(First time.)
"The First Snow."
"At the Fireside."
Carnaval.
Serenade in Canonform for strings, op. 23..Henschel
(First time.)
Song
March, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Soloist—Miss Emily Winant.

SCENA. (Penelope Weaving a Garment.)

BRUCH.

This garment by day I weave in my sorrow,
And ravel the web in the still hour of night;
Thus wearying long, yet my tears greet the morrow,
Hope vanishes as the long years take flight!

Where art thou my husband?
Hath bitter Fate borne thee down into baleful Hades'
abyss?
Or by tempests toss'd, art thou roving upon the wide-
way'd and billowy sea?

Return, my Odysseus, return, oh my husband!
Come, ere this garment my hands shall have wrought!
Th' importunate suitors with boldness assail thy
devoted spouse!
Unjustly despoiling thy son of his birthright,
Each day do they dare 'neath thy roof to carouse!
Return, my Odysseus, my husband!

SONG. (Death and the Maiden.)

SCHUBERT.

THE MAIDEN: Oh pass me, pass me by, thou wild and hoary man! I am yet young; go rather and do not touch me!

DEATH: Give me thy hand, thou tender, lovely image; I am a friend, and do not come to punish. Be of good cheer, I am not wild; Shalt softly sleep within my arms.

SONG. (The Stories of our Childhood.)

SCHUMANN.

The stories of our childhood invite with beck'ning hand
And sing to softest music about a magic land,
Where full blown flow'rets languish in evening's golden light,
And mingle lovelorn glances in bridal beauty bright;

Where all the trees are vocal, and all in concert sing,
And tuned to blithest music, the limpid fountains spring;
And love strains ring melodious, sweet as no tongue can tell,
Till love's resistless longings possess thee like a spell.

And oh! could I be yonder, and lighten there my breast,
And free from every torture be happy and at rest!
Alas! that land enchanted, full oft my dreams display;
But with the dawn of morning, like mist it melts away.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a large audience. The performance opened with Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, that strange mixture of nobility and commonplace, of great power and great weakness. It was accorded a broad and vigorous rendering. The novelty of the programme was a concerto for flute and harp in C, by Mozart, which was played for the first time here. The work is wholly characteristic of the composer in his most familiar vein. It is in regular concerto form, having the three usual movements. The combination is a curious one, and not particularly effective in a large hall, the two instruments having but little in sympathy. The flute part is written largely and broadly, and with a thorough feeling for the peculiar quality and a complete knowledge of the capacity of the instrument, and is always interesting. The harp part is written in a conventional and somewhat monotonous manner, though doubtless it fully met all the possibilities to which players had arrived, in Mozart's time; but the thin upper notes are used and the rich lower notes are avoided with a persistency that at length becomes tiresome. The work itself overflows with beauties of almost every description. The opening allegro wonderfully fresh and solid, is scored, as is, in fact, the whole concerto, in the composer's most delightful manner. The slow movement is exquisitely chaste, tender and playful, and the finale is fairly fascinating in its naïveté and uninterrupted flow. The solo parts were played by Mr. E. M. Heindl and Mr. A. Freygang in a purely artistic style. The concerto was warmly applauded, and seemed to have excited equal pleasure and surprise in its hearers. The cadenzas written for it by Mr. Henschel were brilliant and wholly in keeping with the character of the work. The symphony was Beethoven's in C minor, which was very finely interpreted throughout. It was the most artistic and most satisfying reading that Mr. Henschel has given of it. The work of the orchestra was almost flawless. The vocalist was Miss Louise Rollwagen, whose singing was marked by true musicianly intelligence. She has a good contralto voice, somewhat dry in the extreme lower notes, but of good quality in the middle and upper registers. Her first contribution to the concert was Penelope's song from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," a labored and not particularly attractive composition, but Miss Rollwagen sang it with winning freshness, and in an earnest, natural and honest style that was very interesting. Her other solos were Schubert's weird song, "Death and the Maiden," and Schumann's gay and brilliant "Stories of Our Childhood," in both which her sweet voice and refined taste were pleasingly heard. She made a most favorable impression, and was cordially applauded and recalled. At the next concert will be performed Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture; Raff's Winter Symphony (first time); a Serenade in canon form for strings, by Mr. Henschel; and the March from Wagner's "Tannhauser." Miss Emily Winant is to be the soloist.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair proportions. The following programme was performed, Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flutist, and Mr. A. Freygang, harpist, being the soloists: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scene from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Der Tod und das Mädchen, Schubert; (b) "Aus alten Mäarchen," Schumann; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven. The concert was one of the most interesting of the season, and the programme throughout was exceedingly well performed. The work of the orchestra was very strong and of unusually even excellence, the symphony, in particular, receiving a much better interpretation than it has ever before gained at the hands of this organization. The concerto for flute and harp by Mozart, the novelty of the evening, proved to be a beautiful work, although giving but limited opportunities to the harp. The flute part, however, was delightful, and gave full occasion for the exercise of all of Mr. Heindl's unexcelled powers of force and expression. Miss Rollwagen sang with much taste and expression, although her selections did not particularly commend themselves, and, like Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, she was recalled after each of her efforts. The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air (Samson and Dalila), Saint-Saëns, (first time); symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff, (first time); serenade in Canonform for Strings, op. 23, Henschel, (first time); song; march (Tannhauser), Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth symphony concert presented an attractive programme, commencing with Berlioz' "King Lear" overture, including Mozart's concerto for flute and harp in G, and closing with Beethoven's ever fresh and popular fifth symphony. The orchestral work was at its usual standard throughout the evening, an occasional roughness among the strings being the only defect. The soloist was Miss Louise Rollwagen, a contralto singer of considerable merit. She met with much favor, and was recalled after each of her three numbers. The Mozart concerto was more interesting than some of the minor works of the composer which have been played here from time to time as novelties. Mr. E. M. Heindl with the flute and Mr. A. Freygang with the harp were the soloists. Their work was admirably done, Mr. Henschel's brilliant and difficult cadenzas being exceedingly well done. A printed request inserted between the leaves of the programme, that the individuals in the audience would not disturb everybody by going out in the midst of the playing, ensured an undisturbed performance of the last movement of the symphony. It is announced that at the last concert of the season, March 22, Schumann's music to Byron's "Mantred," as well as Beethoven's choral symphony, will be given. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven
Recitative and air, "Samson and Dalila," Saint-Saëns
(First time.)
Symphony in A minor, "The Winter," No. 11,
op. 24, Raff
(First time.)
"The First Snow."
"At the Fireside."
Carnaval.
Serenade in Canonform for strings, op. 23, Henschel
(First time.)
Song
March, "Tannhauser" Wagner
Soloist—Miss Emily Winant.

S-S-S-SHAME!

To the Editor of the Transcript: Please permit me to make a suggestion for the benefit of many who will attend the concert this evening. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is the last number on the programme. The real music-lover will certainly desire to hear every note of that wonderful and much-loved work, even to the last chord of the last movement. Now, is it too much to ask people, when the Finale begins, not to rise from their seats, or make preparations for a sudden departure from the hall, as if the "last trumpet" had sounded? Under some circumstances, and for some people, I wish it had. The programme is comparatively short, and will probably end about twenty minutes before ten; surely, therefore, every one living out of town can catch his or her train without spoiling the enjoyment of all. At yesterday's afternoon public rehearsal, we must say that it was a humiliating exhibition of the lack of appreciation of this great work, to say the least, to see well-dressed people rise and go out as soon as the Scherzo passed into the glorious March Finale, which has been called by some "The March to Heaven." I noticed one young man in the upper balcony, in a very exposed position, who, as soon as the Finale began, rose out of his seat, got on his arctics, and then struggled quite a while to get on an apparently tight-fitting overcoat (the young man is still growing), button up the same, then put on a muffler, standing up all through the operation (unconscious, of course, of the admiration his movements excited), then sit down for the almost fifteen minutes more of the Finale. This was a case simply of greenness.

Will the day ever come when good people will be cultivated up to the point that they will not rise or make preparations to go till the last note or word has been heard (though I freely leave out of this case the everlasting long opera where the long waits between the acts wearies the patience of all)? Until that time will have come, I think all managers would be justified in putting on the programme a final number whose title given in some foreign language shall say, "Now you may go home."

THOMAS RYAN.

Boston, Jan. 12, 1884.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

We regret that lack of space forbids review of last night's Symphony concert. Beethoven's fifth symphony was given in a manner vastly in advance of its previous performance, although the first attacks were still rough. Miss Rollwagen aroused much enthusiasm by her singing, as did also Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, by a flute and harp concerto performed in a musicianly manner.

The fourteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair proportions. The following programme was performed, Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flutist, and Mr. A. Freygang, harpist, being the soloists: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Der Tod und das Mädchen, Schubert; (b) "Aus alten Märchen," Schumann; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven. The concert was one of the most interesting of the season, and the programme throughout was exceedingly well performed. The work of the orchestra was very strong and of unusually even excellence; the symphony, in particular, receiving a much better interpretation than it has ever before gained at the hands of this organization. The concerto for flute and harp by Mozart, the novelty of the evening, proved to be a beautiful work, although giving but limited opportunities to the harp. The flute part, however, was delightful, and gave full occasion for the exercise of all of Mr. Heindl's unexcelled powers of force and expression. Miss Rollwagen sang with much taste and expression, although her selections did not particularly commend themselves, and, like Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, she was recalled after each of her efforts. The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air (Samson and Delila), Saint-Saëns (first time); symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff (first time); serenade in Canonform for Strings, op. 23, Henschel (first time); song; march (Tannhäuser), Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist. Miss Ellen A. McLaughlin, soprano of the Cathedral, will give a concert at Tremont Temple on Tuesday evening, assisted by Mrs. Ita Welsh Donovan, Mr. G. J. Parker, Mr. C. E. Hay, Mr. J. F. Donahoe and the Listemann String Quartette. Miss McLaughlin will make her professional debut on this occasion, singing "Deh per questo istante," from Mozart's "Titus," and Arne's "The Soldier Tired of War's Alarms," and take part in the quartette "Il cor," from Beethoven's "Fidelio." A choice miscellaneous programme will also be performed by the other artists engaged. Among the announcements of soloists at the Symphony Concerts is that of the first appearance in Boston of Professor Carl Faelten, formerly of Frankfurt and now of Baltimore, which will take place at the concert of Feb. 9. He will also give a recital at the Melodeon on the following Monday, when he will play selections from the works of Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin and Liszt.

Notes.

At the Music Hall on Saturday night the fourteenth symphony concert was given, with this programme: Overture ("King Lear"), Berlioz; Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; Concerto for flute and harp in C, (first time), Mozart (Cadenza by G. Henschel). Songs with piano: a, "Der Tod und das Mädchen," Schubert; b, "Aus Alten Märchen," Schumann; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven. The soloists were Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flutist; and Mr. A. Freygang, harpist. The programme was a delightful one, and the concert was not only one of the most interesting of the season, but one which has not been more thoroughly enjoyable. The applause throughout was spontaneous, and fully testified to the fact that the popular music is much more in accord with the taste of the public than the severely classical. The foremost piece of the evening was Mozart's concerto for flute and harp in C, (the cadenza by G. Henschel, played by Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, heard for the first time in this city,) and which proved to be a most charming composition, abounding more in beauties for the flute than for the harp, though it was finely played throughout by both the artists. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, was magnificently played by the orchestra, who on this occasion were at their very best, and it is more than probable that this favorite symphony was never before so well played in this city. The overture to "King Lear" also received fine treatment. Miss Rollwagen's numbers were the scena from "Odysseus," and songs by Schubert and Schumann, and she was much more pleasing in the two latter than in the former number. The lady has been heard in the city before, and the characteristics of her singing were the same on Saturday night as on the previous occasion. The accompaniments by Mr. Henschel were, as usual, all that accompaniments should be. The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air (Samson and Delila), Saint-Saëns (first time); symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff (first time); serenade in Canonform for strings, op. 23, Henschel (first time); song; march (Tannhäuser), Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist.

AMUSEMENTS. Herald

Fourteenth Symphony Concert of the Season's Series.

The 14th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as its soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, and Mr. A. Freygang, harp, and as its programme:

Overture, ("King Lear").....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus." (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for flute and harp in C. (First time).....Mozart
(Cadenza by G. Henschel.)
Songs with piano:
a "Der Tod und das Mädchen".....Schubert
b "Aus Alten Märchen".....Schumann
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

The delightfully old-fashioned music of the Mozart concerto made its performance one of the most enjoyable events of the season, and the spontaneous applause which followed each of these movements best told of the thorough enjoyment it gave the audience. The simple flowing melodies, so purely the outgrowth of the tuneful mind of the composer, give a far more lasting pleasure than the elaborately evolved and carefully developed ideas of many of the latter day musical writers; and Mr. Henschel deserves commendation, not only for presenting the work, which has not been heard here before, but also for the skilful manner in which he has embellished the composition by the added cadenzas. Messrs. Heindl and Freygang were most happily suited to the flute and harp parts, and well deserved the enthusiastic applause which called them to the front at the conclusion of the concerto. With such solo talent in its ranks, the orchestra has little call for outside talent to give variety to those programmes. Miss Rollwagen's former appearances here had not given altogether a fair opportunity to judge of her merits as a vocalist. She appears to be a singer of many good parts, however, her voice being fresh and true, of good volume and compass, and its use shows the result of careful, intelligent study. The Bruch scena was delivered with excellent taste, and, though the singer appeared not to fully control her voice at times, the number was, as a whole, rendered with excellent effect. In the Schubert song, Miss Rollwagen was heard with greater pleasure, and the Schumann song was also given in a very artistic fashion. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments adding much to the presentation of both these latter selections. The masterly work of Berlioz in the "Lear" overture gave the orchestra an admirable opportunity, and the performance of the number proved the thorough drill of the organization, its dramatic tone pictures being given with splendid effect throughout. The symphony was played in a manner to disarm criticism, and the large audience present indicated an unusual interest in the programme of the evening.

MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourteenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was: Overture (King Lear).....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for Flute and Harp in C (First time).....Mozart
(Cadenza by G. Henschel.)

Songs with Pianoforte:
(a.) Der Tod und das Mädchen.....Schubert
(b.) "Aus alten Märchen".....Schumann
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

Miss Louise Rollwagen was the singer; Mr. E. M. Heindl and Mr. A. Freygang the solo flute and harp, respectively.

Berlioz's overture was played smoothly and with much fire. We are inclined to think, however, that neither Mr. Theodore Thomas nor Mr. Henschel (the only conductors who have given this overture in Boston, as far as we can remember) have quite seized the true essence of the composition. Certainly no performance of the "King Lear" that we have heard here has recalled the truly prodigious impression the work once made upon us in Paris, when it was played under Pasdolaup. On the other hand, the playing of the C-minor symphony was by far the best that Mr. Henschel has yet given us. To be sure, we still find the tempo of the first movement a little too slow, but Mr. Henschel asserted it so vigorously, and made the orchestra do his bidding so perfectly, that one could not but feel that one was in the presence of an idea, strongly conceived and well carried out. Mr. Henschel's tempo in the slow movement still strikes us as exceptionally admirable. The Mozart pianoforte and harp concerto was excellently well played and is a delightful composition. Unfortunately, however, it is utterly unsuited to so large a hall, and even the most willing ears could not help recognizing that it made but little effect. Miss Rollwagen made a fine impression by her artistic and soulful singing of the Bruch scena, and gave the smaller songs with truly admirable effect.

The next programme is:

Overture (The Creatures of Prometheus)...Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Samson and Delila)...Saint Saëns
First time.
Symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff
First time.
Serenade in Canonform for Strings, op. 23...Henschel
First time.

Song.
March (Tannhäuser).....Wagner
Miss Emily Winant will be the singer.

Tit-for-tat. Felix Moschelles says the Boston Symphony orchestra is the finest orchestra without exception that he ever heard. Georg Henschel considers the portrait in Williams & Everett's gallery the best likeness of himself, and from an artistic standpoint the finest work of art of the kind that he ever saw.

S-S-S-S-SHAME!

To the Editor of the Transcript: Please permit me to make a suggestion for the benefit of many who will attend the concert this evening. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is the last number on the programme. The real music-lover will certainly desire to hear every note of that wonderful and much-loved work, even to the last chord of the last movement. Now, is it too much to ask people, when the Finale begins, not to rise from their seats, or make preparations for a sudden departure from the hall, as if the "last trumpet" had sounded? Under some circumstances, and for some people, I wish it had. The programme is comparatively short, and will probably end about twenty minutes before ten; surely, therefore, every one living out of town can catch his or her train without spoiling the enjoyment of all. At yesterday's afternoon public rehearsal, we must say that it was a humiliating exhibition of the lack of appreciation of this great work, to say the least, to see well-dressed people rise and go out as soon as the Scherzo passed into the glorious March Finale, which has been called by some "The March to Heaven." I noticed one young man in the upper balcony, in a very exposed position, who, as soon as the Finale began, rose out of his seat, got on his arctics, and then struggled quite a while to get on an apparently tight-fitting overcoat (the young man is still growing), button up the same, then put on a muffler, standing up all through the operation (unconscious, of course, of the admiration his movements excited), then sit down for the almost fifteen minutes more of the Finale. This was a case simply of greenness.

Will the day ever come when good people will be cultivated up to the point that they will not rise or make preparations to go till the last note or word has been heard (though I freely leave out of this case the everlasting long opera where the long waits between the acts wearies the patience of all)? Until that time will have come, I think all managers would be justified in putting on the programme a final number whose title given in some foreign language shall say, "Now you may go home."

THOMAS RYAN.

Boston, Jan. 12, 1884.

NOTES AND ANNOUNCEMENTS.

We regret that lack of space forbids review of last night's Symphony concert. Beethoven's fifth symphony was given in a manner vastly in advance of its previous performance, although the first attacks were still rough. Miss Rollwagen aroused much enthusiasm by her singing, as did also Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, by a flute and harp concerto performed in a musicianly manner.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair proportions. The following programme was performed, Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flutist, and Mr. A. Freygang, harpist, being the soloists: Overture (King Lear), Berlioz; scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; concerto for flute and harp in C (first time), Mozart; songs with piano, (a) Der Tod und das Mädchen, Schubert; (b) "Aus alten Märchen," Schumann; symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven. The concert was one of the most interesting of the season, and the programme throughout was exceedingly well performed. The work of the orchestra was very strong and of unusually even excellence; the symphony, in particular, receiving a much better interpretation than it has ever before gained at the hands of this organization. The concerto for flute and harp by Mozart, the novelty of the evening, proved to be a beautiful work, although giving but limited opportunities to the harp. The flute part, however, was delightful, and gave full occasion for the exercise of all of Mr. Heindl's unexcelled powers of force and expression. Miss Rollwagen sang with much taste and expression, although her selections did not particularly commend themselves, and, like Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, she was recalled after each of her efforts. The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air (Samson and Dalila), Saint-Saëns, (first time); symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff, (first time); serenade in Canonform for Strings, op. 23, Henschel, (first time); song; march (Tannhäuser), Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist.

Miss Ellen A. McLaughlin, soprano of the Cathedral, will give a concert at Tremont Temple on Tuesday evening, assisted by Mrs. Ita Welsh Donovan, Mr. G. J. Parker, Mr. C. E. Hay, Mr. J. F. Donahoe and the Listemann String Quartette. Miss McLaughlin will make her professional debut on this occasion, singing "Deh per questo istante," from Mozart's "Titus," and Arne's "The Soldier Tired of War's Alarms," and take part in the quartette "Il cor," from Beethoven's "Fidelio." A choice miscellaneous programme will also be performed by the other artists engaged.

Among the announcements of soloists at the Symphony Concerts is that of the first appearance in Boston of Professor Carl Faelten, formerly of Frankfurt and now of Baltimore, which will take place at the concert of Feb. 9. He will also give a recital at the Melodion on the following Monday, when he will play selections from the works of Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin and Liszt.

Notes.

At the Music Hall on Saturday night the fourteenth symphony concert was given, with this programme: Overture ("King Lear"), Berlioz; Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment), Bruch; Concerto for flute and harp in C, (first time), Mozart (Cadenzas by G. Henschel). Songs with piano: a, "Der Tod und Das Mädchen," Schubert; b, "Aus Alten Märchen," Schumann; Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, Beethoven. The soloists were Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flutist; and Mr. E. A. Freygang, harpist. The programme was a delightful one, and the concert was not only one of the most interesting of the season, but one which has not been more thoroughly enjoyable. The applause throughout was spontaneous, and fully testified to the fact that the popular music is much more in accord with the taste of the public than the severely classical. The foremost piece of the evening was Mozart's concerto for flute and harp in C, (the cadenza by G. Henschel, played by Messrs. Heindl and Freygang, heard for the first time in this city,) and which proved to be a most charming composition, abounding more in beauties for the flute than for the harp, though it was finely played throughout by both the artists. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, was magnificently played by the orchestra, who on this occasion were at their very best, and it is more than probable that this favorite symphony was never before so well played in this city. The overture to "King Lear" also received fine treatment. Miss Rollwagen's numbers were the scena from "Odysseus," and songs by Schubert and Schumann, and she was much more pleasing in the two latter than in the former number. The lady has been heard in the city before, and the characteristics of her singing were the same on Saturday night as on the previous occasion. The accompaniments by Mr. Henschel were, as usual, all that accompaniments should be. The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows: Overture, "Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air (Samson and Dalila), Saint-Saëns (first time); symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff (first time); serenade in Canonform for strings, op. 23, Henschel (first time); song; march (Tannhäuser), Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist.

AMUSEMENTS. Hudd

Fourteenth Symphony Concert of the Season's Series.

The 14th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as its soloists, Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. E. M. Heindl, flute, and Mr. A. Freygang, harp, and as its programme:

Overture, ("King Lear").....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus." (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for flute and harp in C. (First time).....Mozart
(Cadenzas by G. Henschel.)

Songs with piano:
a "Der Tod und Das Mädchen".....Schubert
b "Aus Alten Märchen".....Schumann
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

The delightfully old-fashioned music of the Mozart concerto made its performance one of the most enjoyable events of the season, and the spontaneous applause which followed each of these movements best told of the thorough enjoyment it gave the audience. The simple flowing melodies, so purely the outgrowth of the tuneful mind of the composer, give a far more lasting pleasure than the elaborately evolved and carefully developed ideas of many of the latter day musical writers; and Mr. Henschel deserves commendation, not only for presenting the work, which has not been heard here before, but also for the skillful manner in which he has embellished the composition by the added cadenzas. Messrs. Heindl and Freygang were most happily suited to the flute and harp parts, and well deserved the enthusiastic applause which called them to the front at the conclusion of the concerto. With such solo talent in its ranks, the orchestra has little call for outside talent to give variety to those programmes. Miss Rollwagen's former appearances here had not given altogether a fair opportunity to judge of her merits as a vocalist. She appears to be a singer of many good parts, however, her voice being fresh and true, of good volume and compass, and its use shows the result of careful, intelligent study. The Bruch scena was delivered with excellent taste, and, though the singer appeared not to fully control her voice at times, the number was, as a whole, rendered with excellent effect. In the Schubert song, Miss Rollwagen was heard with greater pleasure, and the Schumann song was also given in a very artistic fashion. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments adding much to the presentation of both these latter selections. The masterly work of Berlioz in the "Lear" overture gave the orchestra an admirable opportunity, and the performance of the number proved the thorough drill of the organization, its dramatic tone pictures being given with splendid effect throughout. The symphony was played in a manner to disarm criticism, and the large audience present indicated an unusual interest in the programme of the evening.

MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourteenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was: Overture (King Lear).....Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus" (Penelope weaving a garment).....Bruch
Concerto for Flute and Harp in C (First time).....Mozart
(Cadenzas by G. Henschel.)

Songs with Pianoforte:
(a.) Der Tod und das Mädchen.....Schubert
(b.) "Aus alten Märchen".....Schumann
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

Miss Louise Rollwagen was the singer; Mr. E. M. Heindl and Mr. A. Freygang the solo flute and harp, respectively.

Berlioz's overture was played smoothly and with much fire. We are inclined to think, however, that neither Mr. Theodore Thomas nor Mr. Henschel (the only conductors who have given this overture in Boston, as far as we can remember) have quite seized the true essence of the composition. Certainly no performance of the "King Lear" that we have heard here has recalled the truly prodigious impression the work once made upon us in Paris, when it was played under Pasdolaup. On the other hand, the playing of the C-minor symphony was by far the best that Mr. Henschel has yet given us. To be sure, we still find the tempo of the first movement a little too slow, but Mr. Henschel asserted it so vigorously, and made the orchestra do his bidding so perfectly, that one could not but feel that one was in the presence of an idea, strongly conceived and well carried out. Mr. Henschel's tempo in the slow movement still strikes us as exceptionally admirable. The Mozart pianoforte and harp concerto was excellently well played and is a delightful composition. Unfortunately, however, it is utterly unsuited to so large a hall, and even the most willing ears could not help recognizing that it made but little effect. Miss Rollwagen made a fine impression by her artistic and soulful singing of the Bruch scena, and gave the smaller songs with truly admirable effect.

The next programme is:

Overture (The Creatures of Prometheus).....Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Samson and Dalila).....Saint Saëns
First time.
Symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24, Raff
First time.
Serenade in Canonform for Strings, op. 23.....Henschel
First time.

Song.
March (Tannhäuser).....Wagner
Miss Emily Winant will be the singer.

Tit-for-tat. Felix Moschelles says the Boston Symphony orchestra is the finest orchestra without exception that he ever heard. Georg Henschel considers the portrait in Williams & Everett's gallery the best likeness of himself, and from an artistic standpoint the finest work of art of the kind that he ever saw.

It is earnestly requested that nobody will disturb both audience and players by leaving the Hall during the performance of the music.

Those obliged to leave before the close of the Concert will please do so during the last intermission — after the second movement of the Symphony.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Beethoven's fifth symphony was first played under Mr. Henschel's direction, we felt compelled in honesty to say it was ill played. Just how ill, it is of no consequence now to recall; but we are not unwilling to revive for an instant the past, that the contrast between that evening and last Saturday night may show how much Mr. Henschel has gained and grown in the discretion, taste, far insight and command of himself and of men which make up a fine conductor. The reading of this same symphony, given night before last, was a beautiful one, honorable to the orchestra, and a proof to the audience that Mr. Henschel has made a greater advance from his early position than perhaps he is himself aware of or would be inclined to admit.

The tempi were well taken and faithfully maintained; the development of the second allegro from the first one, and the acceleration into the presto, in the last movement, were fine. The entrance the double-basses in the last movement, too, was delightful; smooth, delicate, a suggestion, as it should be, of further statement to come. And all through the symphony there was such ease that the phrasing could always be clean and complete, and greater and smaller sentences were read with equal intelligence and point. The first violins,—one of whom, by the way, is wont to show a certain independence in his bowing,—seemed to weary a little toward the end, but as a whole, the performance was peculiarly free from any sign of effort on the part of players or conductor.

The novelty of the evening was a flute and harp concerto, by Mozart. When we have premised that the Music Hall is quite too big for the fair appreciation of such a work, and that the lighter harp passages must have sounded to most of the audience much like a music-box, we have taken our only exception. The three movements, an allegro, an andantino and a rondo, are thoroughly Mozartian,—each "a continuous melody," if such a thing ever was, and yet not cloying or thin. The nicest taste was manifest in the playing; neither Mr. Heindel nor Mr. Freygang made any attempt to force his instrument, trusting to the genuineness of his tone and the simplicity of his style to represent him best, and Mr. Henschel reduced the accompaniments to one-half the orchestra, although adding a little to the volume when the soloists were silent. The cadenzas were by Mr. Henschel, and they were remarkable. We heard a few weeks ago a bit of pianoforte music, written for Mr. Lang, in which Mr. Henschel had perfectly caught the spirit of Handel's time, and we had occasion lately to notice the Oriental character suggested by his "Arab Hostess" song; and now we have to record the perfect oneness of feeling with Mozart, free from anything like imitation, which was in these strikingly beautiful and unobtrusive cadenzas.

The singer was Miss Louise Rollwagen of Cincinnati, who has been heard here already in a few concerts of minor consequence. Her ample contralto voice flows evenly and without effort, although it has sometimes a pulse too near akin to a regular vibrato; it is least agreeable and resonant in its upper range, but the lower portion is interesting, although not mellow. Her style gives evidence of musical culture, and implies that its scope is not yet filled out. She sang from Bruch's "Odysseus," the melancholy monologue of Penelope at her web, with gentleness and reserve; Schubert's one-sided "Death and the Maiden," not particularly well as to the outcry of the maiden, but steadily and without exaggeration of the monotonous reply; and Schumann's "Aus alten Märchen," neatly and with some sprightliness. Mr. Henschel accompanied the two latter exquisitely.

The orchestra introduced the programme by a good rendering of Hector Berlioz's puzzling, but still impressive, "King Lear" overture, which holds the listener's attention, even though he be neither clear as to the author's intent nor satisfied with what he understands of it.

The programme for the next concert is almost entirely new. It includes Raff's "Winter" symphony, a serenade for strings, in four movements and in canon form, by Mr. Henschel, and a scene from the "Samson and Delila" of St. Saëns, to be sung by Miss Emily Winant. The "Tannhauser" march and Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture are other numbers.

At an early concert in February, Professor Carl Fältén, now of Baltimore and formerly of Frankfurt, will be heard as a solo pianist, and it is announced that he will also give a concert of chamber music shortly after.

RY 5TH, AT 8

RAMME.

to. Rondo.—

JOHAN S.

st time.)

termezzo. (Allegro giusto.)

uoco.)—

ET. op. 26.

OISTS:

OT, Jr., Violin.

E. STRASSER, Clarinet.

McCaull's No. 3, now at Haverly's to able success I have just referred. Man- has purchased a light opera named will be rehearsed by the No. 3 company enters the Provinces, playing the mean- er's tuneful opera. Much of the suc- the company now at Haverly's is due ensemble, and the handsome figures Ble principal artistes, rather than to any d musical or vocal ability.

r ladies swarm in crowds to admire or Giovanni Perugini, a young man of lashing manner, and charmingly ex-

He is a Brooklyn, N. Y. boy born of George Chatterton, which he ex- king it fair, doubtless, and therefore after a six years study in Milan and principal number is the solo "Tis I ll," which he renders with much power e press here have been fulsome in their artist, and with commendable effort eavoring to catch the words of the ell from his lips. This they have been and for their benefit I give them the

S I ALONE CAN TELL.

ole world knows, that in my heart is an image graven deep hich my song draws all its art, ill till fast in death I sleep; t my bliss is all a dream th' eyes, I love so well om on me kindly beam

200

It is earnestly requested that nobody will disturb both audience and players by leaving the Hall during the performance of the music.

Those obliged to leave before the close of the Concert will please do so during the last intermission — after the second movement of the Symphony.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Beethoven's fifth symphony was first played under Mr. Henschel's direction, we felt compelled in honesty to say it was ill played. Just how ill, it is of no consequence now to recall; but we are not unwilling to revive for an instant the past, that the contrast between that evening and last Saturday night may show how much Mr. Henschel has gained and grown in the discretion, taste, far insight and command of himself and of men which make up a fine conductor. The reading of this same symphony, given night before last, was a beautiful one, honorable to the orchestra, and a proof to the audience that Mr. Henschel has made a greater advance from his early position than perhaps he is himself aware of or would be inclined to admit.

The tempi were well taken and faithfully maintained; the development of the second allegro from the first one, and the acceleration into the presto, in the last movement, were fine. The entrance the double-basses in the last movement, too, was delightful; smooth, delicate, a suggestion, as it should be, of further statement to come. And all through the symphony such ease that the phrasing could all be read and complete, and greater and smaller were read with equal intelligence. The first violins,—one of whom, by the way, went to show a certain independence, seemed to weary a little towards the end, but as a whole, the performance was free from any sign of effort on the part of the orchestra or conductor.

The novelty of the evening was a flute concerto, by Mozart. When we heard that the Music Hall is quite too big for the appreciation of such a work, and that the harp passages must have sounded in the audience much like a music-box, we were our only exception. The three movements, allegro, an andantino and a rondo, were all thoroughly Mozartian,—each "a continuation of such a thing ever was, and yet a new thing. The nicest taste was manifested in the playing; neither Mr. Heindel nor Mr. Freygang attempted to force his instrument to the genuineness of his to the simplicity of his style to the best, and Mr. Henschel reduced the movements to one-half the orchestra, although a little to the volume when the soloist was silent. The cadenzas were by Mr. Heindel, and they were remarkable. We heard a bit of pianoforte music, by Franz Lang, in which Mr. Henschel caught the spirit of Handel's time. On the occasion lately to notice the Orie, suggested by his "Arab Hostess" story, we have to record the perfect oneness with Mozart, free from anything which was in these strikingly beautiful and obtrusive cadenzas.

The singer was Miss Louise Rollé, who has been heard here in a few concerts of minor consequence. Her contralto voice flows evenly and although it has sometimes a pulse to a regular vibrato; it is least agreeable and resonant in its upper range, but the lower portion is interesting, although not mellow. Her style gives evidence of musical culture, and implies that its scope is not yet filled out. She sang from Bruch's "Odysseus," the melancholy monologue of Penelope at her web, with gentleness and reserve; Schubert's one-sided "Death and the Maiden," not particularly well as to the outcry of the maiden, but steadily and without exaggeration of the monotonous reply; and Schumann's "Aus alten Märchen," neatly and with some sprightliness. Mr. Henschel accompanied the two latter exquisitely.

201

The orchestra introduced the programme by a good rendering of Hector Berlioz's puzzling, but still impressive, "King Lear" overture, which holds the listener's attention, even though he be neither clear as to the author's intent nor satisfied with what he understands of it.

The programme for the next concert is almost entirely new. It includes Raff's "Winter" symphony, a serenade for strings, in four movements and in canon form, by Mr. Henschel, and a scene from the "Samson and Delila" of St. Saëns, to be sung by Miss Emily Winant. The "Tannhauser" march and Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture are other numbers.

At an early concert in February, Professor Carl Fälden, now of Baltimore and formerly of Frankfort, will be heard as a solo pianist, and it is announced that he will also give a concert of chamber music shortly after.

The Fourteenth Symphony Concert,

Saturday's concert contained a novelty and an interesting repetition! The former was a flute and harp concerto by Mozart in which Messrs. Heindel and Freygang were the soloists, and which appealed most strongly to all lovers of the master. The whole concerto is indeed thoroughly Mozartian, and the solo instruments, albeit neither is strictly speaking equal to so large a hall, are treated throughout with that perfect flowing melody and delicate warbling accompaniment in which Mozart stands alone. The three movements allegro, andantino and rondo, of which the concerto consists, were all rendered with a perfection of taste rare even at these concerts, and besides the excellent and careful though unobtrusive rendering of the solos, the accompaniments, in which Mr. Henschel had wisely reduced the force of his orchestra somewhat, were most charmingly given. The work was enriched by several cadenzas introduced by Mr. Henschel himself, to which the highest praise that can be given is to say that they were almost indistinguishable in style and feeling from the body of the work.

The repetition of which I spoke above was Beethoven's fifth symphony, the playing of which aroused some unfavorable comment when it was first given by the orchestra. It does seem however as if Mr. Henschel were determined to show, now that

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,
March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 152 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

he is on the point of leaving us, just what he can do, and to make us regret more than ever that the manifest improvement shown in this as well as in other late performances of which we have spoken, should not be carried out by him. Of the fault of his earlier renderings of the symphony it would be ungraceful to speak, except to point a contrast with the really admirable performance of Saturday. The phrasing of the whole work, and the careful reading of detached and subordinate phrases pervaded the whole conception with an intellectuality which it is the true aim of conductor and orchestra to show in the rendering of such a work. I doubt if the symphony has often been better given. I certainly never remember any occasion on which it gave me more pleasure to listen to it.

The vocalist of the occasion was Miss Louise Rollwagen of Cincinnati, whom we have already had the opportunity of hearing in Boston, though not on an occasion of such importance. She possesses a fine and in the lower register a powerful and melodious contralto, but she must beware of forcing her upper notes, which has a strong tendency to produce an unpleasant tremolo, which if persisted in will eventually destroy her singing. She sang the song of Penelope from Bruch's Odysseus, Schubert's Death and the Maiden and Schumann's Aus alten Maerchen in a pleasing and straightforward manner but without any particular individuality.

A number of novelties are provided for the next concert, including Raff's "Winter" Symphony, a serenade for strings, by Mr. Henschel, and a selection from Saint Saens' Samson. Vocalist, Miss Emily Winant.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a fine concert on Saturday. The fact that the opera had left the city was clearly proven in the increased size of the audience. It is a lamentable fact that the Bostonian taste for opera far outstrips that for symphony. I believe that a large number attended the symphony concerts the first two seasons simply because they were fashionable. Now the force of the fashionable commandment—Thou shalt not miss a symphony concert—has spent itself, and the audiences are smaller than in the opening seasons of the enterprise, although the orchestra plays better, and the programmes are more interesting. Poor von Gericke! he comes from Vienna just in time to take charge of an enterprise in which public interest is waning, and lucky Mr. Henschel, he will leave it in a manner which will enable him to say that it only prospered when under his direction. But I will not croak out, "Ichabod, the glory is departed," before I am quite sure that it has really and entirely left. That it has partially gone is undoubted. The programme of Saturday's concert was:

Overture (King Lear) Berlioz
Scena from "Odysseus." (Penelope weaving a garment). Bruch
MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN.

Concerto for Flute and Harp in C (First time) Mozart

[Cadenzas by G. Henschel.]

Allegro—Andantino—Rondo. (Allegro.)

MESSRS. HANDEL AND FREYGANG.

Songs with Piano, { a. Der Tod und der Mädchen Schubert
 { b. "Aus Aulten Märchen." Schumann

MISS ROLLWAGEN.

Symphony in C minor, No. 5 Beethoven

Every bit of it interesting, and the most of it well played. Berlioz's "King Lear" overture is one of those graphic tone pictures with Titanic orchestration, on which his fame rests, but I can't help a suspicion that he makes Lear the monarch of the ranting old Bowery-Theater type. With all his worshiping devotion for Shakespeare and his exponent, Miss Smithson, combined, he certainly does not grasp the dignity of the poet, for he had another English (or Irish) idol, and that was Tom Moore? Fancy the combination—"Moore and Shakespeare!" Miss Rollwagen's best success was made in "Death and the Maiden," where the noble tones of her voice in middle and lower register were used in a chanting manner which was in the highest degree impressive. In the beautiful fairy tale from Schumann's "Dichter liebe," she was unable to render the brightness and daintiness of the first part easily, but the longing climax of the song, was finely done. In Bruch's song she showed real musical instinct and a full voice, but she has a mannerism in giving out notes in the higher register which is bad. She gives them not with a clean attack, but with a swooping portamento which is suggestive of mal de mer rather than of music.

The Mozart Concerto was an oddity. To hear so much sweetness compressed into one work was like going into a musical sugar refinery. Every bar was of melodious character, and had it not been for the contrasts of the Rondo and Mr. Henschel's own cadenzas, which were both brilliant and, at times, powerful, the work would have seemed cloying. But the performance of both the artists was of excellent character, and the virtuosity displayed proved that they are executants of great skill. The Beethoven Symphony, the most melodious, most symmetrical, and most pleasing of all the nine, was remembered by all the old concert goers, as the one which was butchered by this orchestra a year ago. When I heard the first attacks ("Destiny Knocking at the Door" Beethoven called it) I was afraid that there was to be a repetition of the dose. The opening phrases were very badly done, but they are some of the most difficult passages to begin well that can be imagined, and very soon the orchestra was together again and redeeming itself. The Andante began beautifully, the violas giving their work with thorough effect. This passage makes one wonder that the violas are not oftener used in obligato work. Their rich cousins, the violins, usurp every thing melodic. The contrabasses did well with their difficult figures in this and in the Scherzo, and the advantage gained by placing them further back in the orchestra than heretofore was plainly manifested on this occasion. The concluding movements—with the exception that some of the brass seemed out of tune—were played in a fine manner, the shading being nearly perfect, and proving that much care must have been given to it in the rehearsals. And so, from the brusque contrasts of Berlioz to the more musical but less startling effects of Beethoven, the concert was an enjoyable one, and worth a dozen poorly mounted operas, where the ensemble was sacrificed to the star system.

Next week there will be a bright crop of concerts. Mr. Hill gives us Dussek and Hummel on Monday, the usual Symphony concert comes Saturday, and the meeting of the "Clefs" at Young's, Wednesday, with Mr. B. J. Lang as master. Why this sedate musician should take the club to so heterodox a place as Young's is more than I can tell. Perhaps they can there learn to resist temptation. 6/19/24 L. C. E.

205

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (The Creatures of Prometheus.) . . . BEETHOVEN.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Samson and Dalila.) . . . SAINT-SAËNS.
(First time.)

SYMPHONY in A minor. (The Winter.) No. 11, op. 214. . . . RAFF.
(First time.)
THE FIRST SNOW. Allegro.—Allegretto.—
AT THE FIRESIDE. Larghetto.—
CARNEVAL. Allegro.—

SERENADE in Canonform for Strings, op. 23. . . . HENSCHEL.
(First time.)
Marcia.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale.

ROMANZA DELLA CIECA. (La Gioconda.) . . . PONCHIELLI.

MARCH. (Tannhäuser.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

MISS EMILY WINANT.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Samson and Dalila.) SAINT-SAËNS.

RECIT. Samson, oh what gladsome new tidings, at last comes to-night to my tent.
Yes, he comes by the Gods as a victim for my deadliest vengeance now sent.

AIR: Oh love, aid thou me in my weakness,
Send me all thy power and charms,
That he, resistless bow before me,
And be enchained by my arms.
Ah! in vain should he try to forget me,
To banish my image to scorn,
And to quench the flame of his passion,
Which for me did so fiercely burn.
He is yet mine, my slave I'll prove him,
E'en though his foe before him flies.
I, I alone will defy him.
In fetters he to-morrow lies.
For naught 'gainst love his power availeth,
And he the strongest of mankind,
Within my arms shall lose his prowess,
And death there, and destruction shall find.

ROMANZA DELLA CIECA. (La Gioconda.) PONCHIELLI.

Ah! 'tis the voice of Angels bright
Has caused my cruel chains to sever;
While my poor eyes devoid of sight,
Can see thy features never.
Yet I would offer ere we part
A token from my sad grateful heart.
This rosary I give thee,
Round it my heart-felt prayers cling.
Deign to accept the gift from me,
It will good fortune to thee bring:
And on thy head forever near,
Shall be my heart-felt prayer.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. adm

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The "local color" of Raff's new "Winter" symphony, given in Boston for the first time on Saturday evening, was quite outdone by that supplied by the resident clerk of the weather. If the great composer has expressed in his music winter as he understands it, he had best come to New England for a season, and broaden his experience. But call the symphony what one may, and find such coherency or discrepancy as one may between the title and the music, the work is still artistic, thoughtful, and often delightful. The orchestration has Raff's best quality—gentle, but not mawkish; richness of tone, harmonic variety and elaboration, and strength on occasion sufficient to dominate without domineering. And there is in every movement the author's skilful continuity of expression, not hurried to clumsiness nor broken by hesitating pauses. Yet the symphony cannot rank with the "Leonore" or the "Woods" for absolute greatness, for clearness, nor for sustained pleasure-giving character. It would seem as though the abstractness of the theme had led the writer into vaguer thoughts and less definite expressions, so that imagination does not necessarily bring before the listener what the poet desires him to see. The first and second movements, an allegro and an allegretto, are united under the caption of "The First Snow," and would seem to be rather prophetic and positive. Raff uses in the allegro a similar figure to that so often employed by David in the "Desert,"—a long, thrilling single note, across which pass short arpeggios of four or five accented notes. David meant to express the wide monotony of a sea of sand, with its thin, palpitating air, and Raff has probably intended to suggest the still monotony of a dull sky, from which comes not storm, but only sign of change. Later on in the movement there are sturdier advances made, and the threatenings of the brass instruments are contrasted with the occasional ring of the cheerful triangle, until the half-march into which these coalesce, finally ends in a kind of fluttering phrase. The allegretto is built upon a very pleasant theme, which has all the flavor of a merry song of four common metric lines, prettily accented and delicately embroidered as it passes on from instrument to instrument, until, when it reaches the bassoon, it has to contend with a really "wind-over-the-chimney" whirl in the violins; the second theme, minor and almost melancholy, is soon succeeded by the return of the first, which is now expressed in a little graver coloring. The third movement, "By the Fireside," is tranquil to a degree, and if all the household were not meant to be found dozing, or dreaming, at the very least, when it ends, we miss our guess. The fourth movement, "Carnival," begins unseasonably with an unmistakable clap of thunder, and then plicies off in a terpsichorean spirit which might spring up almost any time where folks were gay and lively. For the most part this carnival is only too temperate and well-ordered, and never indulges in any rollicking or buffoonery; toward the close there is a little demonstration on the part of the brass and some grumbling by the double-basses, but they soon settle into an easy swing, and the company apparently all go off homewards together to a kind of informal processional. The symphony was evidently enjoyed, and with good reason, for the orchestra played it beautifully, the inner parts being especially clear and full.

Mr. Henschel's serenade for strings was a new illustration of the fertility and originality of his musical invention, and of his remarkable skill in dealing with the older established forms. In his vocal writing he has manifested much fondness for the canon, and this serenade is all written in that manner. There are four short movements—a march, an andante, a scherzo and a finale. These are all brought into easy apprehension by being treated as two-part canons only, without inversions; but the treatment shows learning and acuteness enough to satisfy the critical. The themes themselves are quaint, fresh, melodious, and so strongly marked as to be followed by any good listener. The playing was vivid and enthusiastic, and every movement was sincerely applauded.

Miss Winant sang as she is wont to do, with dignity, breadth and meaning. Her selections were the "Voce di donna," from "Gioconda," in which she lost nothing even by comparison with Signora Scalchi, while the orchestra gave a true reading of the pleasant accompaniment, which Signor Vianesi's band treated too harshly, and an air from St. Saëns's "Samson and Dalila," in which the Philistine woman plumes herself upon her power over Samson, and the use she means to make of it. Dalila, as here presented, does not exactly correspond to either the Scriptural or the Handelian standard; and if Miss Winant had not thrown her best energy into the air, it would have been more the expectancy of successful coquetry than the anticipation of a triumph over a national enemy. The setting of the first part of the air, "Oh, love, aid thou me in my weakness," is beautifully sweet, and might suit with the aspirations of the purest and truest of souls, being quite too fine and high for the personage to whom it is ascribed. This portion was also rightly sung by Miss Winant, with tenderness and reserve.

The "Prometheus" overture of Beethoven and the "Tannhäuser" march of Wagner, opened and closed the concert.

Mr. Ernest Perabo will be the soloist at the next concert, playing Sterndale Bennett's fourth piano concerto, and three smaller pieces. The symphony will be Mozart's in E flat; the overture, Spontini's "Olympia," played for the first time; and the finale, Liszt's second "Hungarian Rhapsody."

er zu singen." SCHUBERT-LISZT.

LISZT.

SOIST:

ST PERABO.

210

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,

March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 151 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

211

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 21, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifteenth concert in the Music Hall course was given on Saturday night. The programme was:

Overture (The Creatures of Prometheus)...Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Samson and Dalila)...Saint-Saëns
Symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 24...Raff
Serenade in Canon form for Strings, op. 23...Henschel
Romanza della Cieca (La Gioconda)...Ponchielli
March (Tannhäuser)...Wagner

Miss Emily Winant was the singer.

Beethoven's overture and Wagner's march were the only familiar works presented. The selection from Saint-Saëns's biblical opera is peculiarly interesting as a study for the sake of comparison with Handel's musical illustrations of the scene. Dalila, in the Frenchman's work, though vaunting her power over her intended victim, calls upon Love to aid her "in her weakness." Such, at least, is the drift of the English text which Miss Winant sang. What the original is we know not. The music would better fit the longings of a Juliet for her Romeo than it does the boasts of a woman who proposes to use her charms only as instruments to her revenge. Judged as pure music, it is very sweet and tender, while the accompaniment is delicacy itself. Miss Winant sang the scene most beautifully, giving to her interpretation a refined dramatic suggestion here and there, but without sacrificing the evenness of tone and smoothness of delivery which are her most characteristic charms. About the same record is to be made concerning her performance of the prayer from "La Gioconda." The effect of this scene was heightened by the delicacy with which the accompaniment was played, a quality which was rarely detected in the first performance of the work by the orchestra of the Italian Opera Company. The symphony by Raff found admirers at once. This is a familiar experience in the case of Raff's works, and if one seeks the causes, they are easily found. In both form and treatment he is habitually so clear and so easily comprehended that the hearer gives his attention willingly and without fatigue. The forms here are always melodious, often graceful, and the orchestration shows the hand of one who having full confidence in himself uses the appliances at his hand with judgment and reserve. The suddenness of the popularity which Raff's works command gives rise to doubts of its endurance. Like other loves, as well as like money, quick to come means quick to go. One may say of this symphony, which the composer has named "Winter," that any title would have served as well. To be sure he gives us hints of his purpose in a little programme which runs thus—"The First Snow," Allegro; "At the Fireside," Larghetto; "Carnival," Allegro. No name appears for the second movement (Allegretto) which has a gavotte form. Raff is to be relieved of all charges of imitation of natural sounds in this work, unless a chromatic passage in the second movement is intended as a true picture, in the conventional manner, of the surging wind. Grace is a characteristic of the Larghetto and cheerfulness of the last Allegro. It is only cheerfulness, however, the merry-makers of Raff's Carnival being, possibly, under the surveillance of the police, and thus prevented from indulging in very wild hilarity. As usual with Raff, every idea is worked for all it is worth. Mr. Henschel's serenade is altogether charming. One could not always detect the imitation, possibly because of certain technicalities—such, for instance, as the repetition of a figure, first played on the upper strings of the violins, by violas. Then, exact imitation is not always audible on a first hearing. But the beauty of the themes and the fine skill shown in the assignment of the voices combined to make the work highly enjoyable even to those who cared least for exploits in counterpoint.

In the sixteenth concert, to be given next Saturday night, the programme is:

Overture (Olympia)...Spontini
Concerto for Pianoforte in F-minor, No. 4, op. 19...Bennett Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, Breitkopf...Mozart
Piano Solo.
Gavotte in A...Gluck-Brahms
Idyl in F, op. 16...Rheinberger
Barcarole. "Auf dem Wasser zu singen"...Schubert-Liszt
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2...Liszt
Mr. Ernst Perabo will be the pianist.

Jan 20 1884
Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The audience at the symphony concert last evening was larger than has been the rule at recent entertainments in the Henschel course. An unusually interesting programme of novelties, in which the favorite contralto, Miss Emily Winant, appeared as soloist, accounts sufficiently for the remarkably good attendance. Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture was the opening number of the concert, and the closing selection was the "Tannhäuser" march, both familiar selections being admirably played. Miss Winant sang with much expression a recitative and aria from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Dalila," which was heard for the first time here, and proved an excellent example of the composer's best style. Raff's "Winter" symphony in A minor, which had its first performance before the Boston public last night, made a very pleasant impression. Its various movements, being designated as "The First Snow," "At the Fireside" and "Carnival," the symphony may be fairly accounted as of the descriptive order. Raff's happy command of the resources of the modern orchestra is, in truth, often exemplified in the work. There is a suggestion of "Rigoletto" in the way in which the composer pictures the sweep of the winter wind; but for the most part Raff's methods are original and effective, particularly so in the closing movement. As is the case with nearly all professedly descriptive works, one has to draw largely on the imagination to thoroughly accept the musical situation as the "headlines" indicate it. Raff's symphony is not, however, less enjoyable on this account, and it can be heard more than once with pleasure. A noteworthy event was the first production of a new serenade, arranged in canon form for strings, by Mr. Henschel. It is a charming composition, musicianly in the treatment of its dainty themes, and it was received, as it deserved to be, with every mark of favor. Miss Winant sang, in addition to the Saint-Saëns number, the romance of la Cieca from "Gioconda," very finely. The entertainment was much enjoyed.

is a Chickering.

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,

March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 151 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 21. 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifteenth concert in the Music Hall course was given on Saturday night. The programme was:

Overture (The Creatures of Prometheus)...Beethoven
Recitative and Air (Samson and Dalila)...Saint-Saëns
Symphony in A minor (The Winter), No. 11, op. 214...Raff
Serenade in Canon form for Strings, op. 23...Henschel
Romanza della Cieca (La Gioconda)...Ponchielli
March (Tannhäuser)...Wagner

Miss Emily Winant was the singer.

Beethoven's overture and Wagner's march were the only familiar works presented. The selection from Saint-Saëns's biblical opera is peculiarly interesting as a study for the sake of comparison with Handel's musical illustrations of the scene. Dalila, in the Frenchman's work, though vaunting her power over her intended victim, calls upon Love to aid her "in her weakness." Such, at least, is the drift of the English text which Miss Winant sang. What the original is we know not. The music would better fit the longings of a Juliet for her Romeo than it does the boastings of a woman who proposes to use her charms only as instruments to her revenge. Judged as pure music, it is very sweet and tender, while the accompaniment is delicacy itself. Miss Winant sang the scene most beautifully, giving to her interpretation a refined dramatic suggestion here and there, but without sacrificing the evenness of tone and smoothness of delivery which are her most characteristic charms. About the same record is to be made concerning her performance of the prayer from "La Gioconda." The effect of this scene was heightened by the delicacy with which the accompaniment was played, a quality which was rarely detected in the first performance of the work by the orchestra of the Italian Opera Company. The symphony by Raff found admirers at once. This is a familiar experience in the case of Raff's works, and if one seeks the causes, they are easily found. In both form and treatment he is habitually so clear and so easily comprehended that the hearer gives his attention willingly and without fatigue. The forms here are always melodious, often graceful, and the orchestration shows the hand of one who having full confidence in himself uses the appliances at his hand with judgment and reserve. The suddenness of the popularity which Raff's works command gives rise to doubts of its endurance. Like other loves, as well as like money, quick to come means quick to go. One may say of this symphony, which the composer has named "Winter," that any title would have served as well. To be sure he gives us hints of his purpose in a little programme which runs thus—"The First Snow," Allegro; "At the Fireside," Larghetto; "Carnival," Allegro. No name appears for the second movement (Allegretto) which has a gavotte form. Raff is to be relieved of all charges of imitation of natural sounds in this work, unless a chromatic passage in the second movement is intended as a true picture, in the conventional manner, of the surging wind. Grace is a characteristic of the Larghetto and cheerfulness of the last Allegro. It is only cheerfulness, however, the merry-makers of Raff's Carnival being, possibly, under the surveillance of the police, and thus prevented from indulging in very wild hilarity. As usual with Raff, every idea is worked for all it is worth. Mr. Henschel's serenade is altogether charming. One could not always detect the imitation, possibly because of certain technicalities—such, for instance, as the repetition of a figure, first played on the upper strings of the violins, by violas. Then, exact imitation is not always audible on a first hearing. But the beauty of the themes and the fine skill shown in the assignment of the voices combined to make the work highly enjoyable even to those who cared least for exploits in counterpoint.

In the sixteenth concert, to be given next Saturday night, the programme is:

Overture (Olympia)...Spontini
Concerto for Pianoforte in E-minor, No. 4, op. 19...Bennett
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, Breitkopf...Mozart
Piano Solo.

Gavotte in A...Gluck-Brahms
Idyl in F, op. 16...Rheinberger
Barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen"...Schubert-Liszt

Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2...Liszt
Mr. Ernst Perabo will be the pianist.

Jan 20 1884
Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The audience at the symphony concert last evening was larger than has been the rule at recent entertainments in the Henschel course. An unusually interesting programme of novelties, in which the favorite contralto, Miss Emily Winant, appeared as soloist, accounts sufficiently for the remarkably good attendance. Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture was the opening number of the concert, and the closing selection was the "Tannhäuser" march, both familiar selections being admirably played. Miss Winant sang with much expression a recitative and aria from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Dalila," which was heard for the first time here, and proved an excellent example of the composer's best style. Raff's "Winter" symphony in A minor, which had its first performance before the Boston public last night, made a very pleasant impression. Its various movements, being designated as "The First Snow," "At the Fireside" and "Carnival," the symphony may be fairly accounted as of the descriptive order. Raff's happy command of the resources of the modern orchestra is, in truth, often exemplified in the work. There is a suggestion of "Rigoletto" in the way in which the composer pictures the sweep of the winter wind; but for the most part Raff's methods are original and effective, particularly so in the closing movement. As is the case with nearly all professedly descriptive works, on has to draw largely on the imagination to thoroughly accept the musical situation as the "headlines" indicate it. Raff's symphony is not, however, less enjoyable on this account, and it can be heard more than once with pleasure. A noteworthy event was the first production of a new serenade, arranged in canon form for strings, by Mr. Henschel. It is a charming composition, musically in the treatment of its dainty themes, and it was received, as it deserved to be, with every mark of favor. Miss Winant sang, in addition to the Saint-Saëns number, the romance of la Cieca from "Gioconda," very finely. The entertainment was much enjoyed.

is a Chickering.

Notes.

The fifteenth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following being the selected programme: Overture, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns; Symphony in A minor, "The Winter," No. 11, op. 214, Raff; serenade in Canon form for strings, op. 13, Henschel; romanza, "Della Cieca," "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted, and Miss Emily Winant was the soloist. It will be seen that there were a number of novelties on the programme, which was quite as interesting as it was fresh. The Raff symphony was listened to with much pleasure, although the composer has taken higher flights. Mr. Henschel's Serenade was one of that gentleman's most charming compositions. It was very melodious and graceful, and withal a musicianly composition. The Beethoven overture and the Wagner march were both well given, and, indeed, throughout the orchestra played excellently, and showed how much they have gained in precision and strength since the series of concerts commenced. Miss Winant was heard with great pleasure, and especially was this the case in the Saint-Saëns recitative and air, which was sung for the first time in this city; and she also contributed the romance "Della Cieca," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda," in which Mad. Scalchi was heard a few weeks since at the Boston Theatre. In both selections Miss Winant did herself every credit, and was warmly and deservedly applauded. For the sixteenth concert, on Saturday evening next, the following is the programme to be given: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair size, which was doubtless called out by the number of novelties that appeared on the programme. First among them was Raff's "Winter" Symphony, No. 11, op. 214, one of the set with which that composer illustrated the seasons. The work proved to be by no means the best of the author's efforts, having little strength or originality of idea, although finely scored and very musical. It might typify anything else quite as well as winter, so far as any clearness of idea is concerned. The other new work was a serenade in canon form, for strings, op. 23, by Mr. Henschel. It proved to be one of his most interesting works, very graceful and original, and remarkably fluent and rhythmical. The other orchestral selections were Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," which opened the concert, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" march, which closed it. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and sang a recitative and aria from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," its first performance in Boston, and the romanza of the blind woman from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." She sang with great taste and power, and gained an emphatic success. The programme for the next concert is to be as follows: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

LAST NIGHT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 15th concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Emily Winant as soloist and the following programme:

Overture—"The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven
Recitative and air—"Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns
Symphony in A minor—"The Winter," No. 11,
op. 214, Raff
Serenade in Canon form for strings, op. 13, Henschel
Romanza—"Della Cieca," "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
March—"Tannhauser," Wagner

It is seldom that a more interesting programme is presented at these concerts, the Saint-Saëns, Raff and Henschel numbers being heard for the first time here. The symphony proved a highly enjoyable novelty, and more than maintained the interest caused by the preceding works of this series. The movements are designated "The First Snow," allegro, allegretto; "At the Fireside," larghetto; "Carneval," allegro; and, whatever exceptions may be taken to the fitness of these names by the unimaginative hearer, the beauty, originality and charming grace of the composition cannot be denied. As a sample of "programme music" the larghetto movement is certainly the most suggestive of the quiet happiness of the fireside, the interesting dialogues given the several instruments and the plaintive hymn, all making a tone picture the beauty of which could but be instantly recognized. The allegro and allegretto are full of delicately wrought art themes, clearly defined and gracefully treated, and the final movement has quite as interesting characteristics. Mr. Henschel's contribution to the programme again proved his sterling abilities as a musician and again illustrated his fondness for the melodious methods of the old time composers. The four movements, March, Andante, Scherzo and finale, all have pleasing themes, and they are very cleverly treated, the Scherzo in particular having a vein of musical humor which indicates a strong appreciation of the mirthful side of life on the part of the composer. The Saint-Saëns recitative and air suited Miss Winant's vocal abilities most happily, and proved a very interesting composition. The "Gioconda" romanza was an equally pleasing selection, and the singer's presentation of both numbers was well worthy the generous applause which rewarded her efforts. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of the general excellence now expected from this organization, and the brilliant but impressive Wagner march gave a fitting finale to the evening's musical pleasures.

all in concert sing,
limpid fountains spring;
sweet as no tongue can tell,
ess thee like a spell.

ighten there my breast,
appy and at rest!
t my dreams display;
ke mist it melts away.

MUSICAL GAZETTE

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There were many vacant seats, owing probably to the stormy weather. The Symphony was Raff's in A-minor, No. 11, op. 214, and entitled "Winter," which was heard here for the first time. The weather was quite appropriate for the hearing of a work typifying winter and for making comparisons between the state of the climate and the manner in which it was presented in tones. There was no resemblance between the winter indoors and that outside. In fact the title of the symphony is a mere fancy, meaning nothing, and the subdivision of its movements into "The First Snow," "At the Fireside," "Carneval," however well they might indicate what the composer intended to suggest, the music failed utterly to convey any such suggestion. The work is not in Raff's happiest vein, and is far excelled by his "Im Walde" symphony. Its chief beauty lies in its orchestral and contrapuntal treatment, in which it is delightfully clear, ripe and beautiful. Its chief fault is in its monotonous repetitions of rhythms, which at length become tiresome from reiteration. The finale is the best and most effective movement. The scherzo is a pretty jingle, gracefully and crisply scored especially for the wood wind, which, by the way, is used with much brilliancy throughout. The work is one whose meaning it is difficult to grasp at a first hearing, not because it is dry, overlabored, or deep, but because of a certain perplexing uncertainty in development. It was admirably read and clearly and spiritedly played. Another novelty was a charming serenade in canon form for strings, op. 23, by Mr. Henschel. It is in four movements, is rich in effect, bright and cheerful in spirit, and equally melodious and ingenious. There is nothing of stiffness in the work, which flows with the greatest ease and shows nothing of the restraint which this form of writing forces on the composer. It was finely played and cordially applauded. The other orchestral selections were Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" march, to both which full justice was done. The soloist was Miss Emily Winant, who sang a fine recitative and air from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saëns, and the blind woman's romanza from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Miss Winant's large and sonorous voice was heard to the best advantage in both selections, which she sang with that warmth, good taste and artistic feeling that characterize all her work. The programme for the next concert is to be as follows: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F-minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Music Hall.

1883-84.

NY ORCHEST

HEL, CONDUCTOR.

NCERT.

Y 19TH, AT 8, P

AMME.

theus.)

BEET

Dalila.)

SAINT

time.)

) No. 11, op. 214.

time.)

retto.—

p. 23.

time.)

e.

IST:

Y WINANT.

PLEASE SEE 4T

the tissue of our life, chance and ly great part; the latter we guide, must blindly submit. Enough is le events do not find us wholly unurage, our good sense have already like circumstances, and our heart's e blow. The stage lays before us human sorrow. It draws us artifinot our own, and rewards our moith tears of pleasure and a noble ind experience.

the stage make us acquainted with it also teaches us to be more just nate one, and to judge him with
For it is only when we can measure tress, that we may dare to pronounce

Humanity and toleration begin to of our age! Their rays have pene-ls of justice, and still further—into nces. Does not a large share in this ng to our theaters? Is it not these own to men, and which reveal the governs their actions?

ass of men has reason, beyond all nl toward the stage. It is here that e world hear what they seldom or see what they seldom or never see—various is the service of the better ultivation; no lower merit belongs of enlightening the understanding.

and the fiery patriot first learn to a glance over the whole race of man, ith nation, age with age, and finds rger masses of the people lie prison-of prejudice and opinion, which are their happiness—how the pure rays ten a few particular minds, which a small gain at the expense of a at manner can the wise lawgiver ntage to the nation?

common channel by which the light down from the thinking, better part rom whence it extends in milder rays state. Juster ideas, more enlightened feelings, flow from hence through ople; the cloud of barbarism, of dark ears, and darkness yields to conquer-o many noble fruits of the better distinguish two. How generous has

Notes.

The fifteenth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following being the selected programme: Overture, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns; Symphony in A minor, "The Winter," No. 11, op. 214, Raff; serenade in Canon form for strings, op. 13, Henschel; romanza, "Della Cieca," "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted, and Miss Emily Winant was the soloist. It will be seen that there were a number of novelties on the programme, which was quite as interesting as it was fresh. The Raff symphony was listened to with much pleasure, although the composer has taken higher flights. Mr. Henschel's Serenade was one of that gentleman's most charming compositions. It was very melodious and graceful, and withal a musicianly composition. The Beethoven overture and the Wagner march were both well given, and, indeed, throughout the orchestra played excellently, and showed how much they have gained in precision and strength since the series of concerts commenced. Miss Winant was heard with great pleasure, and especially was this the case in the Saint-Saëns recitative and air, which was sung for the first time in this city; and she also contributed the romance "Della Cieca," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda," in which Mad. Scalchi was heard a few weeks since at the Boston Theatre. In both selections Miss Winant did herself every credit, and was warmly and deservedly applauded. For the sixteenth concert, on Saturday evening next, the following is the programme to be given: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair size, which was doubtless called out by the number of novelties that appeared on the programme. First among them was Raff's "Winter" Symphony, No. 11, op. 214, one of the set with which that composer illustrated the seasons. The work proved to be by no means the best of the author's efforts, having little strength or originality of idea, although finely scored and very musical. It might typify anything else quite as well as winter, so far as any clearness of idea is concerned. The other new work was a serenade in canon form, for strings, op. 23, by Mr. Henschel. It proved to be one of his most interesting works, very graceful and original, and remarkably fluent and rhythmical. The other orchestral selections were Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," which opened the concert, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" march, which closed it. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and sang a recitative and aria from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," its first performance in Boston, and the romanza of the blind woman from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." She sang with great taste and power, and gained an emphatic success. The programme for the next concert is to be as follows: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

LAST NIGHT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 15th concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Emily Winant as soloist and the following programme:

Overture—"The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven
Recitative and air—"Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saëns
Symphony in A minor—"The Winter," No. 11, op. 214, Raff
Serenade in Canon form for strings, op. 13, Henschel
Romanza—"Della Cieca," "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
March—"Tannhauser," Wagner

It is seldom that a more interesting programme is presented at these concerts, the Saint-Saëns, Raff and Henschel numbers being heard for the first time here. The symphony proved a highly enjoyable novelty, and more than maintained the interest caused by the preceding works of this series. The movements are designated "The First Snow," allegro, allegretto; "At the Fireside," larghetto; "Carneval," allegro; and, whatever exceptions may be taken to the fitness of these names by the unimaginative hearer, the beauty, originality and charming grace of the composition cannot be denied. As a sample of "programme music" the larghetto movement is certainly the most suggestive of the quiet happiness of the fireside, the interesting dialogues given the several instruments and the plaintive hymn, all making a tone picture the beauty of which could but be instantly recognized. The allegro and allegretto are full of delicately wrought art themes, clearly defined and gracefully treated, and the final movement has quite as interesting characteristics. Mr. Henschel's contribution to the programme again proved his sterling abilities as a musician and again illustrated his fondness for the melodious methods of the old time composers. The four movements, Marcia, Andante, Scherzo and finale, all have pleasing themes, and they are very cleverly treated, the Scherzo in particular having a vein of musical humor which indicates a strong appreciation of the mirthful side of life on the part of the composer. The Saint-Saëns recitative and air suited Miss Winant's vocal abilities most happily, and proved a very interesting composition. The "Gioconda" romanza was an equally pleasing selection, and the singer's presentation of both numbers was well worthy the generous applause which rewarded her efforts. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of the general excellence now expected from this organization, and the brilliant but impressive Wagner march gave a fitting finale to the evening's musical pleasures.

I all in concert sing,
limpid fountains spring;
sweet as no tongue can tell,
ess thee like a spell.

lighten there my breast,
happy and at rest!
let my dreams display;
let the mist it melts away.

MUSICAL GAZETTE

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There were many vacant seats, owing probably to the stormy weather. The Symphony was Raff's in A-minor, No. 11, op. 214, and entitled "Winter," which was heard her for the first time. The weather was quite appropriate for the hearing of a work typifying winter and for making comparisons between the state of the climate and the manner in which it was presented in tones. There was no resemblance between the winter indoors and that outside. In fact the title of the symphony is a mere fancy, meaning nothing, and the subdivision of its movements into "The First Snow," "At the Fireside," "Carneval," however well they might indicate what the composer intended to suggest, the music failed utterly to convey any such suggestion. The work is not in Raff's happiest vein, and is far excelled by his "Im Walde" symphony. Its chief beauty lies in its orchestral and contrapuntal treatment, in which it is delightfully clear, ripe and beautiful. Its chief fault is in its monotonous repetitions of rhythms, which at length become tiresome from reiteration. The finale is the best and most effective movement. The scherzo is a pretty jingle, gracefully and crisply scored especially for the wood wind, which, by the way, is used with much brilliancy throughout. The work is one whose meaning it is difficult to grasp at a first hearing, not because it is dry, overlabored, or deep, but because of a certain perplexing uncertainty in development. It was admirably read and clearly and spiritedly played. Another novelty was a charming serenade in canon form for strings, op. 23, by Mr. Henschel. It is in four movements, is rich in effect, bright and cheerful in spirit, and equally melodious and ingenious. There is nothing of stiffness in the work, which flows with the greatest ease and shows nothing of the restraint which this form of writing forces on the composer. It was finely played and cordially applauded. The other orchestral selections were Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" march, to both which full justice was done. The soloist was Miss Emily Winant, who sang a fine recitative and air from "Samson and Delilah," by Saint-Saëns, and the blind woman's romanza from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Miss Winant's large and sonorous voice was heard to the best advantage in both selections, which she sang with that warmth, good taste and artistic feeling that characterize all her work. The programme for the next concert is to be as follows: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F-minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Music Hall.

1883-84.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

CONCERT.

SATURDAY, 19TH, AT 8, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven.)

BEETHOVEN.

Saint-Saëns.)

SAINT-SAËNS.

Raff, No. 11, op. 214.

(time.)

Henschel.

p. 23.

(time.)

e.

LIST:

Y WINANT.

PLEASE SEE 4TH

the tissue of our life, chance and its great part; the latter we guide, must blindly submit. Enough is the events do not find us wholly un-urged, our good sense have already like circumstances, and our heart's blow. The stage lays before us human sorrow. It draws us artfully not our own, and rewards our mo- with tears of pleasure and a noble in- and experience.

the stage make us acquainted with it also teaches us to be more just mate one, and to judge him with For it is only when we can measure tress, that we may dare to pronounce Humanity and toleration begin to of our age! Their rays have pene- is of justice, and still further—into nces. Does not a large share in this ng to our theaters? Is it not these own to men, and which reveal the governs their actions?

ass of men has reason, beyond all al toward the stage. It is here that world hear what they seldom or see what they seldom or never see—various is the service of the better ultivation; no lower merit belongs of enlightening the understanding, and the fiery patriot first learn to a glance over the whole race of man, ith nation, age with age, and finds or masses of the people lie prison of prejudice and opinion, which are their happiness—how the pure rays ten a few particular minds, which a small gain at the expense of a at manner can the wise lawgiver atage to the nation?

ommon channel by which the light down from the thinking, better part com whence it extends in milder rays tate. Juster ideas, more enlightened feelings, flow from hence through ple; the cloud of barbarism, of dark ears, and darkness yields to conquer o many noble fruits of the better distinguish two. How generous has

Notes.

The fifteenth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following being the selected programme: Overture, "The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven; recitative and air, "Samson and Dalilah," Saint-Saëns; Symphony in A minor, "The Winter," No. 11, op. 214, Raff; serenade in Canon form for strings, op. 13, Henschel; romanza, "Della Cieca," "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; march, "Tannhauser," Wagner. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted, and Miss Emily Winant was the soloist. It will be seen that there were a number of novelties on the programme, which was quite as interesting as it was fresh. The Raff symphony was listened to with much pleasure, although the composer has taken higher flights. Mr. Henschel's Serenade was one of that gentleman's most charming compositions. It was very melodious and graceful, and withal a musicianly composition. The Beethoven overture and the Wagner march were both well given, and, indeed, throughout the orchestra played excellently, and showed how much they have gained in precision and strength since the series of concerts commenced. Miss Winant was heard with great pleasure, and especially was this the case in the Saint-Saëns recitative and air, which was sung for the first time in this city; and she also contributed the romance "Della Cieca," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda," in which Mad. Scatchi was heard a few weeks since at the Boston Theatre. In both selections Miss Winant did herself every credit, and was warmly and deservedly applauded. For the sixteenth concert, on Saturday evening next, the following is the programme to be given: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

Fifteenth Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience of fair size, which was doubtless called out by the number of novelties that appeared on the programme. First among them was Raff's "Winter" Symphony, No. 11, op. 214, one of the set with which that composer illustrated the seasons. The work proved to be by no means the best of the author's efforts, having little strength or originality of idea, although finely scored and very musical. It might typify anything else quite as well as winter, so far as any clearness of idea is concerned. The other new work was a serenade in canon form, for strings, op. 23, by Mr. Henschel. It proved to be one of his most interesting works, very graceful and original, and remarkably fluent and rhythmical. The other orchestral selections were Beethoven's overture to "Prometheus," which opened the concert, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" march, which closed it. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and sang a recitative and aria from Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Dalila," its first performance in Boston, and the romanza of the blind woman from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." She sang with great taste and power, and gained an emphatic success. The programme for the next concert is to be as follows: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

LAST NIGHT'S SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 15th concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Emily Winant as soloist and the following programme:

Overture—"The Creatures of Prometheus," Beethoven
Recitative and air—"Samson and Dalila," Saint-Saëns
Symphony in A minor—"The Winter," No. 11, op. 214, Raff
Serenade in Canon form for strings, op. 13, Henschel
Romanza—"Della Cieca," "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
March—"Tannhauser," Wagner

It is seldom that a more interesting programme is presented at these concerts, the Saint-Saëns, Raff and Henschel numbers being heard for the first time here. The symphony proved a highly enjoyable novelty, and more than maintained the interest caused by the preceding works of this series. The movements are designated "The First Snow," allegro, allegretto; "At the Fireside," larghetto; "Carneval," allegro; and, whatever exceptions may be taken to the fitness of these names by the unimaginative hearer, the beauty, originality and charming grace of the composition cannot be denied. As a sample of "programme music" the larghetto movement is certainly the most suggestive of the quiet happiness of the fireside, the interesting dialogues given the several instruments and the plaintive hymn, all making a tone picture the beauty of which could but be instantly recognized. The allegro and allegretto are full of delicately wrought art themes, clearly defined and gracefully treated, and the final movement has quite as interesting characteristics. Mr. Henschel's contribution to the programme again proved his sterling abilities as a musician and again illustrated his fondness for the melodious methods of the old time composers. The four movements, Marcia, Andante, Scherzo and finale, all have pleasing themes, and they are very cleverly treated, the Scherzo in particular having a vein of musical humor which indicates a strong appreciation of the mirthful side of life on the part of the composer. The Saint-Saëns recitative and air suited Miss Winant's vocal abilities most happily, and proved a very interesting composition. The "Gioconda" romanza was an equally pleasing selection, and the singer's presentation of both numbers was well worthy the generous applause which rewarded her efforts. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of the general excellence now expected from this organization, and the brilliant but impressive Wagner march gave a fitting finale to the evening's musical pleasures.

all in concert sing,
limpid fountains spring;
sweet as no tongue can tell,
ess thee like a spell.

ighten there my breast,
appy and at rest!
t my dreams display;
ke mist it melts away.

MUSICAL

Boston Symphony Concert

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night were many vacant seats, owing probably to the weather. The Symphony was Raff's in A minor, op. 214, and entitled "Winter," which was heard for the first time. The weather was quite appropriate for the hearing of a work typifying winter making comparisons between the state of the climate in the manner in which it was presented in tone was no resemblance between the winter indoors outside. In fact the title of the symphony fancy, meaning nothing, and the sublimely movements into "The First Snow," "At side," "Carneval," however well they might indicate what the composer intended to the music failed utterly to convey any suggestion. The work is not in Raff's happiest is far excelled by his "Im Walde" symphony. The chief beauty lies in its orchestral and contrapuntal treatment, in which it is delightfully clear beautiful. Its chief fault is in its many repetitions of rhythms, which at length tiresome from repetition. The finale best and most effective movement. This is a pretty jingle, gracefully and scored especially for the wood wind, which way, is used with much brilliancy throughout work is one whose meaning it is difficult to grasp at a first hearing, not because it is overlabored, or deep, but because of perplexing uncertainty in development. Admirably read and clearly and spiritedly. Another novelty was a charming serenade for strings, op. 23, by Mr. Henschel. Its movements, is rich in effect, bright and cheerful and equally melodious and ingenious. There is of stiffness in the work, which flows with the ease and shows nothing of the restraint in form of writing forces on the composer. It was played and cordially applauded. The other selections were Beethoven's "Prometheus" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" march, to both justice was done. The soloist was Miss Emily Winant who sang a fine recitative and air from "Samson and Dalilah," by Saint-Saëns, and the blind woman's romanza from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Miss Winant's large and sonorous voice was heard to the advantage in both selections, which she sang with warmth, good taste and artistic feeling that did all her work. The programme for the next concert is to be as follows: Overture, "Olympia," Spontini; Concerto for piano in F minor, W. Sterndale Bennett; Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; a group of piano solos by Brahms, Rheinberger and Liszt, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, for orchestra. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst Perabo.

And now for the weekly Teachers' Symphony Concert. This time the programme was full of novelties, but, alas, the usual quota of empty seats were still to be discerned in the auditorium. The programme was as follows:

Overture. (The Creatures of Prometheus.) Beethoven
Recitative and Air. (Samson and Dalila.) Saint Saëns
(First time.)
Miss Emily Winant.
Symphony in A minor. (The Winter.) No. 11, op. 214. Raff
(First time.)
The First Snow, Allegro.—Allegretto.—
At the Fireside. Larghetto.—
Carneval Allegro.—
Serenade in Canon form for Strings, op. 23. Henschel
(First time.)
Marcia—Andante—Scherzo—Finale.
Romanza della cieca. (La Gioconda) Ponchielli
Miss Emily Winant.
March. (Tannhauser.) Wagner

Saint Saëns' air is one of the most melodious that has appeared from his pen. In fact he seems to rely rather upon the beauty of the melody than upon his usual sumptuous scoring for effect, the accompaniment being comparatively simple, although masterly. At the close, one of the bizarre effects of his school is used, however, the wood wind in the highest notes being combined with the voice in the deepest register. Miss Winant sang with great expression, and with the purity of tone which always distinguishes her singing. But I was sorry that she sang the Romanza, for Scatchi has given it here so recently and so unapproachably that Miss Winant's rendering loses by comparison.

The Raff symphony is one of the "season" set, which are among the later, but by no means the best of the works of this composer, and it is not as strong a work as "In Summer" of the same set. But Raff had so much ease in expressing his ideas that he was able at times to make facility pass for genius. There is, for example, nothing strained about this symphony, but at the same time nothing deep. The snow storm, of course, has plenty of light figures, which are whirled about like snowflakes in a breeze, and piu mosso are plentiful throughout this and the next movement. There is also a degree of melancholy pervading the first movement, and its very opening presents a long stationary tone—a la Mendelssohn—picturing dreariness and monotony. The second part is graceful, and opens brightly with a rather trivial flute theme of florid style, which is afterward re-echoed mournfully by the bassoon in minor. Wild gusts of wind are pictured in a theatrical manner by crescendo effects and mysterious tremoli on the strings. The third movement has "long drawn out" phrases in the Wagnerian vein, but without Wagner's power, and without, on a first hearing, any very especial meaning. One is tempted to ask, as did the musician of the last century—"Ce Sonate, que me vent il?" The closing movement opens tumultuously with timpani and contrabass, and then follows a jolly and tumultuous rhythm which pictures carnival sports; but we can't get rid of the impression that the people are not having a very good time after all, certainly not so good as in the works of Schumann, or Berlioz ("Carnaval Remain"). The mirth of the movement contrasts well with the sombre style of the previous movements; however, Mr. Henschel's composition was received with enthusiasm, and it deserved the hearty applause which greeted it. Few composers can write as gracefully in this strict style, as Mr. Henschel. There is no rigidity, and apparently no straining. The first movement had a good military swing, something like the march in Raff's "Lenore," not boisterous, but still powerful. The Andante had a flowing theme, imitated at some distance by the second voice, and displayed more skill and depth than any other movement. The Scherzo was somewhat conventional, spite of its abrupt pauses, and sudden cadence. The last movement was replete with dignity and power, and the imitations in the deepest strings were effective and impressive. The playing of the orchestra was throughout of the best. You will see that the whole was a most modern concert, all the way from Samson (the John L. Sullivan of antiquity) to the crashing Wagner. L. C. E.

214

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,
March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 152 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.35. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE
DO SO DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION — AFTER MR. PERABO'S LAST SOLO.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Olympia.) SPONTINI.
(First time.)

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in F minor. . . . W. ST. BENNETT.
No. 4, op. 19.
Allegro con maestà.—Barcarole. (Andante cantabile.)—Presto.—

SYMPHONY in E flat. (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition.) . . . MOZART.
Adagio. Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Finale. (Allegro.)—

PIANO SOLO.

a) GAYOTTE in A. GLUCK-BRAHMS.
b) IDYL in F. op. 6. RHEINBERGER.
c) BARCAROLE. "Auf dem Wasser zu singen." SCHUBERT-LISZT.

HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2. LISZT.
(Orchestrated by K. Mueller-Berghaus.)

SOLOIST:

MR. ERNST PERABO.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

220

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,
March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 151 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHIEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Several of Elia's most delicious essays are devoted to exposing the fallacy of popular proverbs, and showing that often the vox populi is such and preterea nihil. Mr. Ernst Perabo's appearance at the symphony concert on Saturday evening last, was a living proof of the truth of Charles Lamb's position, and a charming contradiction to the ancient dictums about a prophet being honorless in his own country, and about absence from sight being equivalent to oblivion. For Mr. Perabo, who is so seldom heard nowadays in a grand concert, that many of the public might be excused for not knowing him, was greeted with the warmest of receptions, and was applauded with unmistakable heartiness of pleasure at every convenient opportunity. It was gratifying to see so large a recognition of a man whose merit and whose modesty are both so great, and are also so easily obscured by the reticence—we might almost say the evasiveness—of his artistic nature. Mr. Perabo has one quality in common with that great artist, Professor Baermann,—that he plays his music for its own sake, as if in love with it and in devotion to it, with only afterthoughts for himself as a player or for the mechanical excellence of the instrument. The thought and its expression, in proper color, emphasis and grace, weigh first with him, and hence, while he sometimes sacrifices the tone of the pianoforte, he never derogates from its expressive powers. His selections were, with orchestra, the beautiful F minor concerto (No. 4, opus 19) of William Sterndale Bennett,—St. Bennett, as he appeared on the bill,—and, as solos, a Gluck gavotte arranged by Brahms, an idyl of Rheinberger, and Liszt's transcription of the favorite Schubert barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu Singen." Bennett has often been thought to have a trace of Mendelssohn in his compositions, but to us he always brings more a suggestion of Gade. Both of them, perhaps, have influenced him so far as their music—like so much of his—wakens imaginations of the coasts and caves and voices of the sea in its most fairy-like and poetic aspects. Of the three movements of this concerto—an allegro con maestà, a barcarole, andante cantabile, and a presto,—all are beautiful and bewitching. There is a tender contrast of feeling between the two themes of the first movement,—one sweetly sad in its minor mode, and the other of pastoral turn and major tone. The barcarole is no tripping, tinkling, dancing boatsong for a chorus of merrymakers, but a soft strain, that might be scarcely more than whispered from lovers' lips to lovers' ears as one happy pair should float smoothly and far over the lagoons in a splendid Venetian night. Mr. Perabo's playing here was exquisitely delicate, and the music at last melted into the softest of sounds with a reluctant ralentando, as though he could not bear to leave it. There was real poetry and imagination in the reading, and it was no slight test for the orchestra to be obliged to try and follow him without breaking the spell; but indeed they did not, and the note repeated in its way his slight accentuations with fine appreciation. The final presto was brilliantly delivered, and qualified with many nuances due to the player's keen and sensitive insight. The three smaller pieces were each delightful and complete in its way, and Mr. Perabo was recalled enthusiastically.

The symphony was Mozart's third, in E flat, known perhaps better than any other of his writing, and always heard with fresh interest and pleasure. Mr. Henschel gave a thoroughly enjoyable reading of it, recognizing himself and making every hearer recognize the peculiar individuality of the movements—an individuality which, though never overcharged, is perhaps as marked as in any symphony there is. We were especially pleased with the andante, in which Mozart has shown that he did not live too early to know how much may be done by strings alone, and to which the orchestra gave richness of volume and smooth steadiness. The evening began with a performance of Spontini's "Olympia" overture, set down as the first, although it would seem as though our grandfathers would have found it just to their taste, and must have played it in some of their coteries or concerts. There is much sweet music in it, and some strength, although not much demonstration of this. One rather melancholy portion may suggest, perhaps, the naturally pensive mood of the unhappy queen, bound to an unsympathetic rock by discounteous pirates, after her desertion by an unappreciative husband; while the cheery, semi-martial figure which contrasts with that, doubtless implies her comfortable departure, when rescued by Orlando Furioso, and her progress towards marriage with one of the kings of Ireland. But be this as it may, the overture did not seem antiquated, and was interestingly played.

A Hungarian rhapsody arranged for orchestra inevitably suggests Mr. P. S. Gilmore and his band, even though the arrangement be not made by the eminent author of "Columbia," but by so skillful and considerate a hand as that of K. Müller-Berghaus. When these things of Liszt are taken from the pianoforte and given to a mass of instruments, all the coarseness and cheapness which is in them come out, and cannot be lost sight of, in spite of all the music which there may be in them. The orchestra played the number two, with which the programme ended, ferily, and sent the audience away stimulated up to a warmth quite suitable for so wintry a night.

The only novelty at this week's concert will be a Bohemian dance for orchestra, by Godard; the other numbers being Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, an overture by Mendelssohn, and a concerto and smaller things for violoncello, to be played by Mr. Fritz Giese.

Herr Wilhelm Gerleke, who may with confidence be accepted as the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, is a musician of eminent abilities and just in the prime of life, being about 45 years of age. For the past eight years he has directed the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House, which numbers about 100 musicians, and he is also director of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, having succeeded Brahms in the latter position. His record is well known among the leading musicians of Vienna, and Herr Stengel, the husband of Mme. Sembrich, who was attached to the Vienna Conservatory of Music, holding a professorship in that institution, commends Herr Gerleke as a man eminently fitted to assume the duties for which he has been selected by Mr. Higginson. It is not unlikely that the orchestra may enlarge its field of labors under its coming directorship.

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

Rocky advocate

The sixteenth symphony concert of the season took place in Music Hall Saturday night. The programme was as follows:

Overture (Olympia).....	Spontini
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor.....	W. St. Bennett
Symphony in E flat (No. 3, Breitkopf's edition).....	Mozart
Piano Solo
(a) Gavotte in A.....	Gluck-Brahms
(b) Idyl in F, op. 6.....	Rheinberger
(c) Barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen".....	Schubert-Liszt
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....	Liszt

The Spontini overture which is a sweet and charming musical composition was rendered with a great deal of delicacy and feeling, and the effect was very pleasing. The symphony (Mozart's third, in E-flat) was equally well played. It is one of Mozart's best known efforts, and, though so often given as to have become familiar with all lovers of music, it is one of those works that never grow old. On the contrary, it is always heard, when skillfully interpreted, with fresh delight. Rendered as it was on Saturday night, it is impossible to listen to it without admiration. The intensely earnest and consequently stirring rhapsody of Liszt was given by the orchestra with so much spirit and such an appreciative feeling as to sway the audience as a strong wind sways the forest, and arouse it to a high pitch of enthusiasm. The chief attraction of the evening, however, was the magnificent playing of Mr. Ernst Perabo. Long known to the Boston public as one of its most skillful and accomplished pianists, he never did himself greater justice, his selections more credit, or the piano itself more honor than on this occasion. He seemed to lose sight of art in his profound sympathy with the thought, the feeling, and the spirit of the numbers he was interpreting. He had no need to struggle with his instrument to make it do his bidding, but evoked from it at will all that it is capable of yielding. Indeed, had it been a part of himself, it could not have responded more sensitively to his every behest. In the beautiful F-minor concerto of William Sterndale Bennett—a work that may well rank high among modern musical productions—he was at his very best. Conscious of the real merit and power of the composition, he threw himself entirely into it, and held his listeners spell-bound. It is said that Humphrey Marshall, listening once to the eloquent S. S. Prentice, was so carried away when the orator reached a certain impassioned and magnificent climax that he broke in upon the silence that instantly succeeded with the words, "die Prentice, die, you will never have so good a chance." Now it would be a great calamity to have Mr. Ernst Perabo die at present, but the audience must have felt very much as Marshall did, when the gifted pianist reached the close of his superb effort. In the "Gavotte," the Rheinberger "Idyl" and the Schubert "Barcarole,"—his solo selections, Mr. Perabo retained his mastery over his audience and left them wondering and entranced. The whole entertainment was a continuous thrill of pleasure. For the seventeenth concert on Saturday evening next there will be given overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; concerto for 'cello, Volkmann; symphony in F (pastorale), Beethoven; a group of 'cello solos, and Danse des Bohémiens, B. Godard. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sixteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was:

Overture to "Olympie".....	Spontini
Concerto in F minor.....	Sterndale-Bennett
Symphony in E-flat.....	Mozart
Pianoforte solos—
a. Gavotte.....	Gluck-Brahms
b. Idyl.....	Rheinberger
c. Barcarole.....	Schubert-Liszt
Rhapsody No. 2.....	Liszt
[Orchestrated by Müller-Berghaus.]

Mr. Ernst Perabo was the pianist.

It was good to hear the Spontini overture; it is a work which belongs to a school of orchestral writing which could at no time have been called great, by any high standard, and which is now wholly a thing of the past. Except as an historical curiosity the overture to "Olympie" can hardly be called interesting. But it is something more and better than interesting; no matter how slight the musical form in which it is fashioned, it is the work of a truly great man, and the noble nature of the composer, his true depth of sentiment, his love of the beautiful and simply sublime can still be felt in it. It is still to be recognized as the outcome of genuine genius. The Mozart E-flat symphony, albeit neither on so grand a plan as the "Jupiter" (in C major), nor so utterly unique in its perfection, so wholly outside of the range of any composer save Mozart alone, as the symphony in G-minor, is still one of the composer's very great works. In elegance of style, beauty of outline and wealth of musical thought it is a gem of the purest water. It was played with admirable precision, fire and delicacy. Indeed, the performance may be accounted one of the orchestra's most splendid triumphs. Mr. Perabo, whose silence during the last few years has been regarded sometimes with wonder, always with regret, had a perfectly well-earned ovation. When this excellent artist feels a positive enthusiasm for a work, he throws himself into his task with a whole-souled fervor which leaves nothing to be desired. If one may be inclined to wonder a little how a composition like Bennett's F minor concerto can gain such supremacy over a musician's nature as to excite such an enthusiasm in him as to induce him positively to idolize it for a while, one can still not regret that an artist like Mr. Perabo can be found to expend so much of his vitality upon a charming work, and show it to us in so wholly sympathetic a light. Much good may be said of this concerto; it is genuine music, excellently written, full of grace and sensibility. Great music it surely is not, but it never tries to be great, and contents itself with being truly spontaneous and beautiful on a modest plane. Mr. Perabo's playing of it was simply admirable. Such playing is difficult to describe, for there are certain phases of musical sentiment which are so true, which spring from so deep a fountain, that one is tempted to respond to them with all sorts of splendid superlatives, and yet one feels that such terms of admiration are all too vulgar and commonplace for the purpose. One can use such words as wonderful, superb, sublime, about the more lofty flights of music, but for beauty and feeling in their more modest aspects one hesitates to employ epithets which seem to crush rather than express the feeling that prompts them. To say that Mr. Perabo made all the formal and emotional beauty of the composition fully patent to his listeners sounds cold. But we can say nothing more, for fear of falling into mere rhapsodizing, and the genuine enthusiasm his playing aroused in us must remain unexpressed on paper. Not less beautiful were his playing of the smaller solo pieces. Perhaps he found a little more in the Schubert Barcarole than there really is in the composition, and played it a thought too elaborately. But it was plain enough that the over-elaboration was not merely wilful on his part, and that he played the music just as he felt it.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last evening before a very good audience. Spontini's brilliant overture to "Olympie" opened the concert. It was followed by Sterndale Bennett's masterly and beautiful concerto No. 4 in F-minor, the piano part of which was interpreted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, whose playing on this occasion was exquisite in finish, taste and sentiment, and uncommonly brilliant and impressive in execution. We have never heard Mr. Perabo when he played with more refinement, delicacy, warmth of color and power than he manifested at this concert. There was a frank straightforwardness in his work, a freedom from all affectation, and a purity of feeling that were thoroughly delightful. Nothing could have been more artistic than his reading of the dainty andante of this concerto. It was beautifully phrased throughout, and was given with a caressing tenderness generally that was quite fascinating in effect. The opening allegro was played with great breadth and dignity of style, and the difficult finale with a sweep and an animation that were fairly exciting. Mr. Perabo was rewarded with the most hearty applause, and was recalled with the greatest enthusiasm. Later in the concert he played a Gavotte by Gluck transcribed by Brahms, an Idyl by Rheinberger, and Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Auf dem Wasser," and each in a manner fully worthy of comparison with his earlier achievement of the evening. He was again applauded with the utmost heartiness and again recalled. The symphony was Mozart's in E flat, No. 3, of Breitkopf's edition. It obtained a sympathetic and thoughtful reading at Mr. Henschel's hand, and was admirably played. The opening allegro in particular was especially well interpreted. The concert ended with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, scored for orchestra by Mueller-Berghaus. It is effective in the orchestra, but is over-vulgar and sensational. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture in C, Op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for 'Cello, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), Beethoven; a group of 'cello solos, and Danse des Bohémiens, B. Godard. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist.

Notes. Journal

At the Music Hall on Saturday night, the sixteenth of the Symphony concerts was given, Mr. Henschel conducting, and the piano soloist being Mr. Ernst Perabo. The following is the programme which was interpreted: Overture ("Olympia") Spontini; concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, W. St. Bennett; symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition) Mozart; piano solo; (a) gavotte in A, Glück-Brahms, (b) idyl in F, op. 6, Rheinberger; (c) barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," Schubert-Liszt; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt. The great event of the evening was the playing by Mr. Perabo of Prof. William Sterndale Bennett's concerto. This was given in a most superior manner, the performer entering fully into the spirit of the work, and presenting a clear cut, highly intellectual and finished technical rendition. The work itself is a most charming one, and is full of beauties. They were all brought out at their best by Mr. Perabo, and the delight he afforded the audience was infinite. Mr. Perabo has for years stood in the front rank of our local pianists, and he never asserted his claims to the position more bravely than he did on Saturday night. While the other selections in the programme which were set down for him did not call for the display of that amount of ability as did the concerto, they were nevertheless played with great delicacy and excellent effect. The audience was quite warm in its applause, and Mr. Perabo deserved it all and more too. Spontini's "Olympia" overture, and the Mozart symphony were finely played by the orchestra, as indeed was the rhapsody of Liszt. Indeed the orchestra improves with every appearance, and its work has well-nigh reached a state of perfection. For the seventeenth concert on Saturday evening next there will be given overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; concerto for 'cello, Volkmann; symphony in F (pastorale), Beethoven; a group of 'cello solos, and Danse des Bohémiens, B. Godard. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, attracted a large audience. The programme was as follows. Mr. Ernst Perabo being the soloist: Overture ("Olympia") Spontini; concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, W. St. Bennett; Symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition) Mozart; piano solo, (a) Gavotte in A, Glück-Brahms; (b) Idyl in F, op. 6, Rheinberger; (c) Barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," Schubert-Liszt; Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt. The chief event of the evening was Mr. Perabo's performance of Sterndale Bennett's beautiful concerto, which was given in a style that showed every technical and intellectual merit. The player, accepted, as he is, as one of the foremost exponents of masterly piano-playing in this city, was never heard to better advantage than in this work, and deservedly aroused the highest enthusiasm in his audience. The composition in question is a work remarkable for calling upon every resource of power and emotion in an artist, and it must with justice be said that Mr. Perabo met its every requirement, from the delicate andante to the robust opening allegro movement and the exciting and difficult finale. His playing of the other selections set down for him was not less excellent, although not calling for such a complete and comprehensive exercise of his powers as did the concerto. The work of the orchestra was excellent throughout. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture in C, Op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for 'Cello, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), Beethoven; a group of 'cello solos, and Danse des Bohémiens, B. Godard. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Harold
The Sixteenth Programme. Mr. Ernst Perabo, Soloist.

The 16th programme of the present season was presented last evening at Music Hall by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, the soloist being Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, and the selections:

Overture ("Olympia").....Spontini
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor....W. St. Bennett
Symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition).....Mozart
Piano Solo.

(a) Gavotte in A.....Glück-Brahms
(b) Idyl in F, op. 6.....Rheinberger
(c) Barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen,".....Schubert-Liszt
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt

The distinguished success made by Mr. Perabo was the event of the evening, and the generous applause which rewarded all his efforts was honestly earned by the player. It is seldom that a more enjoyable selection of pianoforte numbers is made than that of this occasion, and the fitness of the works to the characteristics of the pianist was also especially noticeable. The concerto by Bennett has a fascinating beauty in all of its movements, but the charm of the "barcarole" is beyond all telling, and the full measure of its musical worth was given in the player's interpretation of this portion of the composition. The graceful duet for the piano and flute was rendered with charming effect, and the entire interpretation by Mr. Perabo was a notable event of the season. The player's abilities were no less noticeable in the solo numbers. In the "Gavotte" the themes were given with a clearness and delicacy which could hardly have been improved upon, the phrasing of the Rheinberger "Idyl" was an artistic bit of work of the most enjoyable character, and the beauty of the Schubert-Liszt "barcarole" was made equally prominent by the pianist's interpretation. The merits of the artist and his personal popularity were alike shown in the enthusiasm displayed by the audience in its applause. In listening to Mozart's tuneful measures, which appeal so directly to the musical intelligence of the hearer, and convey so clearly and distinctly the thought and intention of the composer, it was difficult not to picture this old composer as a listener to the compositions of his latter day brother musicians. Would he, after hearing a symphony by Dvorák, Brahms or Rubinstein, imitate Socrates, in his criticism upon the writings of Herodotus, the philosopher, and say "What I understand I find to be excellent, and therefore I assume that to be of equal value which I cannot understand." Or would he refuse to admit as of value the involved and obscure writings of such composers? Of the lasting worth of such a melodious work as the symphony of the evening there can be but one opinion, and the enjoyment it gave the audience was quickly shown by the applause which followed each of the movements. The grand old "Olympia" overture, though heard for the first time, was quite as enjoyable as the symphony, and for the same reason, its themes being clearly presented and treated with admirable effect. The orchestral setting of the Liszt "rhapsody" gave a brilliant finale to the concert programme, and the work of the orchestra was of such even excellence throughout that adverse criticism is uncalled for.

....Perhaps one of Mr. Perabo's double recalls at Saturday night's symphony concert was for last season when he did not play.

MUSIC. Corrier

July 27, 84

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last evening began with a charmingly melodious and symmetrical though rather formal overture by Spontini, which was played with just the daintiness required by its school. Much of the interest of the concert centred in the piano playing of Mr. Ernst Perabo, an artist who is heard altogether too seldom in public, in Boston, when his abilities are taken into consideration. In Bennett's concerto his success was marked, but the second movement may be classed as the best performed of the work, for the pianist seems at his best in poetical and refined emotional passages rather than in braura work, and this caused the last movement to be the least even of the concerto. In the three solos subsequently played, Mr. Perabo deserves praise. There was little attempt at display or individualization on his part, but the composer's intention was carefully brought out. The Schubert Barcarolle for example, was given a better rendering than Joseffy vouchsafes to it; the composer's tempo "mässig geschwind" was repeated, and it was less a piece of virtuosity than a little tone poem of peaceful enjoyment on the water, but the finale was somewhat blurred. The Mozart Symphony in E flat was generally well rendered, save that the finale seemed to us rather too dashing for a Mozartian allegro. The fiery, Liszt Rhapsody, with Maeller-Berghaus's sumptuous orchestration, was given with an elan that carried everything before it. The pressure upon our columns forbids more extended analysis. Next week comes the Pastoral Symphony, that worthy pioneer of modern programme music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Ernst Perabo at the Piano—His Characteristics as a Soloist.

The novelty on the programme of the symphony concert last evening was an overture by Spontini. It is not a particularly striking work, but it was well received. The soloist was Mr. Ernst Perabo, whose many friends gave him a cordial welcome. His first selection was the F minor concerto of W. St. Bennett, a very interesting and beautiful composition. Too much cannot be said of the manner in which the orchestra performed their part in the rendition of this number. Mr. Perabo, however, lacks breadth and power for the treatment of concertos. He fails to make the piano a solo instrument, except in those places where the orchestra is subdued to pianissimo passages. By reason of his sentimental style of playing, his technique lacks clearness, and oftentimes a whole group of notes was inaudible. This peculiarity appeared in his later numbers, where he played alone. His interpretation of an idyl by Rheinberger, and the transcription of a Schubert song by Liszt, would have been delightful in a parlor; but in the latter number, particularly, the accompaniment to the melody was blurred and wholly robbed of its individuality. Mr. Perabo undoubtedly enters heart and soul into his playing, but he seems to forget that he is playing for others to hear. Consequently, however fine the artistic impulse that stirs his performance, he falls short of the highest demands. The symphony was Mozart's No. 3 in E flat. The closing number was that remarkable Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 of Liszt. The orchestration of Mueller-Berghaus is more than original; it is startling, fantastic, even comical.

The orchestra performed it magnificently, a long gradual crescendo being particularly noticeable for its perfect shading.

The programme for next Saturday is the following:

Overture in C op. 101.....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello, op. 33.....Volkmann
Symphony in F (pastorale), No. 6, op. 33.....Beethoven
Cello solo with piano.
(a) Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2.....Chopin
(b) Papillon.....D. Popper
Danse des Bohémiens (Le Tasse).....B. Godard
(First time.)
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Giese.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

John
Seventeenth Programme. Mr. Fritz Giese, Soloist.

The 17th concert of the present season's series by the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Fritz Giese, 'cello player, was the soloist, and the selections were as follows:

Overture in C, op. 101.....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello, op. 33.....Volkmann
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68.....Beethoven
Cello solo, with piano.
(a) Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2.....Chopin
(b) Papillon.....D. Popper
Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse").....B. Godard

Mr. Giese has never been heard here under such favorable circumstances, and he seemed inspired by the surroundings as well as by the marked favor which he won in the opening movement of the concerto. His playing of the concerto was one of the most masterly efforts in this line heard here in later years, and the enthusiasm which the audience showed upon its conclusion was fully warranted by the merits of the performance. The Chopin nocturne was presented with a beauty of expression rarely equalled by the best violinists, and the bright Popper number was given with delightful effect. No doubt the possession of such an instrument as that used by this artist has much to do with the purity and richness of the tone given out in his playing, but none but a player of the best ability can give such pleasure as was experienced in listening to the 'cello numbers on this occasion. Mr. Henschel kindly took the piano part in the solo numbers, and added not a little to the success of the 'celloist by so doing. The symphony was played with a charming grace throughout its several movements, making the pastoral scenes depicted by the composer easily apparent to the hearer, and the melodious overture was played with equal success. The Godard "Danse" was heard for the first time, and did not prove a remarkable effort in this line of composition. Of course, "the line must be drawn somewhere," but why such a poor selection of this sort should be admitted to these programmes, to the exclusion of the merry measures by Strauss, which find a place on almost all continental programmes, remains an unsolved conundrum.

Now that the dreadful danger has passed, and the reputation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction, is unblemished beyond a doubt, it will do no harm to give publicity to the fact that it was at one time contemplated to add a Strauss waltz to its repertoire of this season. This waltz was to be given in some of the provincial cities visited by the orchestra, and, though the reason for abandoning the plan has not gained publicity, it is presumable that the enormity of the evil which might follow such a new departure deterred Mr. Henschel from carrying out his plan. Boston can still hold up her head as the centre of musical culture, and deplore, with propriety, the wickedness of Brooklyn and its Philharmonic society.

At the Music Hall on Saturday night, the sixteenth of the Symphony concerts was given, Mr. Henschel conducting, and the piano soloist being Mr. Ernst Perabo. The following is the programme which was interpreted: Overture ("Olympia") Spontini; concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, W. St. Bennett; symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition) Mozart; piano solo; (a) gavotte in A, Glück-Brahms, (b) Idyl in F, op. 6, Rheinberger; (c) barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," Schubert-Liszt; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt. The great event of the evening was the playing by Mr. Perabo of Prof. William Sterndale Bennett's concerto. This was given in a most superior manner, the performer entering fully into the spirit of the work, and presenting a clear cut, highly intellectual and finished technical rendition. The work itself is a most charming one, and is full of beauties. They were all brought out at their best by Mr. Perabo, and the delight he afforded the audience was infinite. Mr. Perabo has for years stood in the front rank of our local pianists, and he never asserted his claims to the position more bravely than he did on Saturday night. While the other selections in the programme which were set down for him did not call for the display of that amount of ability as did the concerto, they were nevertheless played with great delicacy and excellent effect. The audience was quite warm in its applause, and Mr. Perabo deserved it all and more too. Spontini's "Olympia" overture, and the Mozart symphony were finely played by the orchestra, as indeed was the rhapsody of Liszt. Indeed the orchestra improves with every appearance, and its work has well-nigh reached a state of perfection. For the seventeenth concert on Saturday evening next there will be given overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; concerto for 'cello, Volkmann; symphony in F (pastorale), Beethoven; a group of 'cello solos, and Danse des Bohémiens, B. Godard. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, attracted a large audience. The programme was as follows. Mr. Ernst Perabo being the soloist: Overture ("Olympia"), Spontini; concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, W. St. Bennett; Symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition) Mozart; piano solo, (a) Gavotte in A, Glück-Brahms; (b) Idyl in F, op. 6, Rheinberger; (c) Barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," Schubert-Liszt; Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt. The chief event of the evening was Mr. Perabo's performance of Sterndale Bennett's beautiful concerto, which was given in a style that showed every technical and intellectual merit. The player, accepted, as he is, as one of the foremost exponents of masterly piano-playing in this city, was never heard to better advantage than in this work, and deservedly aroused the highest enthusiasm in his audience. The composition in question is a work remarkable for calling upon every resource of power and emotion in an artist, and it must with justice be said that Mr. Perabo met its every requirement, from the delicate andante to the robust opening allegro movement and the exciting and difficult finale. His playing of the other selections set down for him was not less excellent, although not calling for such a complete and comprehensive exercise of his powers as did the concerto. The work of the orchestra was excellent throughout. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture in C, Op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for 'Cello, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), Beethoven; a group of 'cello solos, and Danse des Bohémiens, B. Godard. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Sixteenth Programme, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Soloist.

The 16th programme of the present season was presented last evening at Music Hall by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, the soloist being Mr. Ernst Perabo, pianist, and the selections:

Overture ("Olympia").....Spontini
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor.....W. St. Bennett
Symphony in E flat (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition).....Mozart
Piano Solo.
(a) Gavotte in A.....Glück-Brahms
(b) Idyl in F, op. 6.....Rheinberger
(c) Barcarole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen.".....Schubert-Liszt
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt

The distinguished success made by Mr. Perabo was the event of the evening, and the generous applause which rewarded all his efforts was honestly earned by the player. It is seldom that a more enjoyable selection of pianoforte numbers is made than that of this occasion, and the fitness of the works to the characteristics of the pianist was also especially noticeable. The concerto by Bennett has a fascinating beauty in all of its movements, but the charm of the "barcarole" is beyond all telling, and the full measure of its musical worth was given in the player's interpretation of this portion of the composition. The graceful duet for the piano and flute was rendered with charming effect, and the entire interpretation by Mr. Perabo was a notable event of the season. The player's abilities were no less noticeable in the solo numbers. In the "Gavotte" the themes were given with a clearness and delicacy which could hardly have been improved upon, the phrasing of the Rheinberger "Idyl" was an artistic bit of work of the most enjoyable character, and the beauty of the Schubert-Liszt "barcarole" was made equally prominent by the pianist's interpretation. The merits of the artist and his personal popularity were alike shown in the enthusiasm displayed by the audience in its applause. In listening to Mozart's tuneful measures, which appeal so directly to the musical intelligence of the hearer, and convey so clearly and distinctly the thought and intention of the composer, it was difficult not to picture this old composer as a listener to the compositions of his latter day brother musicians. Would he, after hearing a symphony by Dvorák, Brahms or Rubinstein, imitate Socrates, in his criticism upon the writings of Herodotus, the philosopher, and say "What I understand I find to be excellent, and therefore I assume that to be of equal value which I cannot understand." Or would he refuse to admit as of value the involved and obscure writings of such composers? Of the lasting worth of such a melodious work as the symphony of the evening there can be but one opinion, and the enjoyment it gave the audience was quickly shown by the applause which followed each of the movements. The grand old "Olympia" overture, though heard for the first time, was quite as enjoyable as the symphony, and for the same reason, its themes being clearly presented and treated with admirable effect. The orchestral setting of the Liszt "rhapsody" gave a brilliant finale to the concert programme, and the work of the orchestra was of such over-excellence throughout that adverse criticism is uncalled for.

...Perhaps one of Mr. Perabo's double recalls at Saturday night's symphony concert was for last season when he did not play.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last evening began with a charmingly melodious and symmetrical though rather formal overture by Spontini, which was played with just the daintiness required by its school. Much of the interest of the concert centred in the piano playing of Mr. Ernst Perabo, an artist who is heard altogether too seldom in public, in Boston, when his abilities are taken into consideration. In Bennett's concerto his success was marked, but the second movement may be classed as the best performed of the work, for the pianist seems at his best in poetical and refined emotional passages rather than in braunura work, and this caused the last movement to be the least even of the concerto. In the three solos subsequently played, Mr. Perabo deserves praise. There was little attempt at display or individualization on his part, but the composer's intention was carefully brought out. The Schubert Barcarolle for example, was given a better rendering than Joseffy vouchsafes to it; the composer's tempo "mässig geschwind" was repeated, and it was less a piece of virtuosity than a little tone poem of peaceful enjoyment on the water, but the finale was somewhat blurred. The Mozart Symphony in E flat was generally well rendered, save that the finale seemed to us rather too dashing for a Mozartian allegro. The fiery, Liszt Rhapsody, with Maeller-Berghaus's sumptuous orchestration, was given with an elan that carried everything before it. The pressure upon our columns forbids more extended analysis. Next week comes the Pastoral Symphony, that worthy pioneer of modern programme music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Ernst Perabo at the Piano—His Characteristics as a Soloist.

The novelty on the programme of the symphony concert last evening was an overture by Spontini. It is not a particularly striking work, but it was well received. The soloist was Mr. Ernst Perabo, whose many friends gave him a cordial welcome. His first selection was the F minor concerto of W. St. Bennett, a very interesting and beautiful composition. Too much cannot be said of the manner in which the orchestra performed their part in the rendition of this number. Mr. Perabo, however, lacks breadth and power for the treatment of concertos. He fails to make the piano a solo instrument, except in those places where the orchestra is subdued to pianissimo passages. By reason of his sentimental style of playing, his technique lacks clearness, and oftentimes a whole group of notes was inaudible. This peculiarity appeared in his later numbers, where he played alone. His interpretation of an Idyl by Rheinberger, and the transcription of a Schubert song by Liszt, would have been delightful in a parlor; but in the latter number, particularly, the accompaniment to the melody was blurred and wholly robbed of its individuality. Mr. Perabo undoubtedly enters heart and soul into his playing, but he seems to forget that he is playing for others to hear. Consequently, however fine the artistic impulse that stirs his performance, he falls short of the highest demands. The symphony was Mozart's No. 3 in E flat. The closing number was that remarkable Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 of Liszt. The orchestration of Mueller-Berghaus is more than original; it is startling, fantastic, even comical.

The orchestra performed it magnificently, a long gradual crescendo being particularly noticeable for its perfect shading.

The programme for next Saturday is the following:

Overture in C op. 101.....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello, op. 33.....Volkmann
Symphony in F (pastorale), No. 6, op. 33.....Beethoven
Cello solo with piano.
(a) Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2.....Chopin
(b) Papillon.....D. Popper
Danse des Bohémiens (Le Tasse).....B. Godard
(First time.)
Soloist, Mr. Fritz Giese.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventeenth Programme, Mr. Fritz Giese, Soloist.

The 17th concert of the present season's series by the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Fritz Giese, 'cello player, was the soloist, and the selections were as follows:

Overture in C, op. 101.....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello, op. 33.....Volkmann
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 33.....Beethoven
Cello solo, with piano.
a Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2.....Chopin
b Papillon.....D. Popper
Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse").....B. Godard

